START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

JANUARY 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-014

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATION: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 14

Volume 28-30

BSO-POPS
1910-1911
to
BSO-POPS
1911-1912

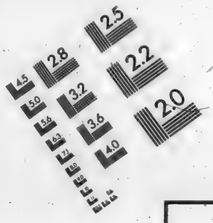
2.0 mm

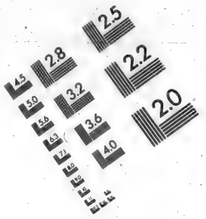
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

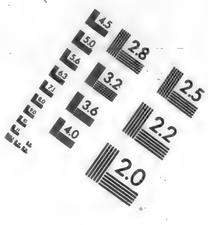
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

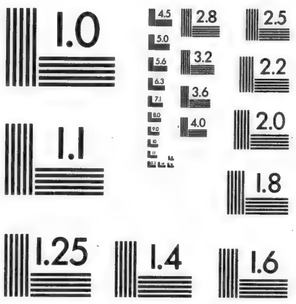






150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

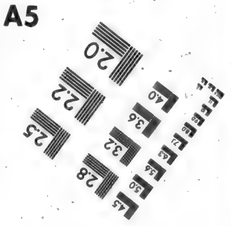
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

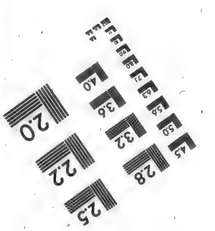
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

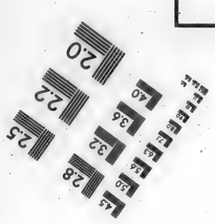
2.5 mm

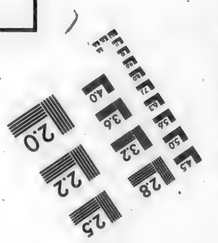
A5





A4





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 28

BSO
Pops

1910 - 1911

HILL, SMITH & Co.

STATIONERS AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET,
BOSTON.

Job No. F1777
Duplicate this book by sending the above number.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY,
SEPTEMBER 3, 1910

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A New Concert Master, Changes in the Personnel of the Band, and a Membership Larger Than in Any Year Past—The Thirtieth Season to Begin Oct. 7—Further Announcements Awaiting Mr. Fiedler's Communications—A Seasonable Note Concerning "Orchestra Hunger"

Within the next fortnight a complete announcement of the plans for the thirtieth season of the Symphony concerts will be offered. Although the details of the season are practically settled, a few matters await a final message from Mr. Fiedler, who is now in Hamburg. The series will begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, the customary rehearsal, followed by the concert on Saturday evening, Oct. 8.

Mr. Witek, the new concert master, who has been during the summer with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra at Scheviningen, Holland, will return to America, sailing from Bremen Sept. 13, to arrive in Boston with an ample margin of time for undertaking his new duties. As he has been engaged for a term of years, he comes prepared to make Boston his place of residence during that incumbency. Mr. Fiedler sails from Bremen on the 20th of this month.

For the first time since its organization, the personnel of the Symphony Orchestra will, next winter, exceed one hundred men. Hitherto the highest number of active members has been ninety-nine. This season it will be 101. The two additional members are a new first trombone player, who will relieve Mr. Hampe of a part of his work, and a fifth bassoon player, a "utility" man—understudy, as the stage would say—to prevent the embarrassments consequent on the illness of a regular player. Otherwise, and virtually, the orchestra remains the same as last year. The violas will have a new member, a new player has been added to the second violins, to the double bassos a new leader, and Mr. Goldstein has been transferred from the second violin to the first, to make good the vacancy left by Mr. Emmanuel Fiedler's retirement. It should be appended that, according to announcement last spring, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the veteran violoncello virtuoso, resumes his place in the band beside Mr. Warnke at the first desk.

The season is still too young for the announcement of soloists. Signor Busoni is to be among the number for the Southern tour and probably Mischa Elman will be heard here. The list will be no less notable than in former years. It is likewise early to forecast the financial prospects of the season, but New York furnishes an unintentional testimonial by a subscription list for the two series of concerts there practically sold out before the first of June. The auction sales of the Boston series will declare the prospects for the season locally.

More than ever as autumn approaches and the Symphony concerts, we who live in Boston and know their privileges come to recognize them as one of the fruits of the season rolled round in earth's diurnal course. They have come, at length, to be as welcome as the changes of the weather, and as indispensable. Who, that is used to them, has not felt, in September and mentioned to someone else who has felt the same pang, what is denoted as "orchestra hunger"?

JOURNAL—SUNDAY,
SEPTEMBER 4, 1910.

SYMPHONY SEASON BEGINS OCT. 7

The thirtieth season of Symphony concerts is close at hand. The first public rehearsal comes on Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, and the first concert on Saturday evening, Oct. 8. The regular auction sales begin on Monday, Sept. 26, the other dates being Tuesday, the 27th; Thursday, the 29th, and Friday, the 30th.

A total number of 117 concerts, exclusive of the two pension fund concerts, will be given by the orchestras this year, and for the first time in the history of the orchestra the first concert of the season will be given outside of Boston, in Northampton, Oct. 5, when the orchestra will take part in the exercises attending the inauguration of the new president of Smith College.

Mr. Fiedler is now in Hamburg, after a summer spent in Switzerland, and sails for this country Sept. 20. Complete information has not come from him yet, but it is promised that the orchestra has never offered so brilliant a group of soloists as will be offered this season, and Mr. Fiedler has shown even more skill than usual in the selection of the work which will be performed.

Mr. Witek, the new concert master, after a summer spent in Scheviningen, Holland, as concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, has returned to Berlin to make his final preparations for his departure for this country.

SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON,
SEPTEMBER 4, 1910.

The Symphony Orchestra.

For the first time since it was organized the Boston Symphony orchestra this year will have a personnel of over 100 men. Mr. Fiedler has engaged in Germany a new first trombone to relieve Mr. Hampe of some of his work. Mr. Hampe, who has been the first trombone of the orchestra for many years, has been troubled for the last two or three seasons with rheumatism, and it is, therefore, necessary to have a musician to alternate with him. Along the same lines Mr. Fiedler has engaged a new bassoon player, in case of illness of any of the four bassoon players of the orchestra.

Mr. Witek, the new concert master, has just left Scheviningen, Holland, where he has been with the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, and sails from Bremen for this country Sept. 13, arriving here the 20th.

A number of works with choruses will be given during the regular Symphony season, notably Liszt's "Dante" symphony and Delius' "Appalachia." These have been made possiole by the alliance last spring between the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Cecilia Society. As in the two past seasons, Mr. Fiedler will give Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the 24th concert.

The Symphony concerts begin early in October, the first public rehearsal being on the 7th and the first concert on the 8th. This will bring the last concerts in the end of April. The auction sales of seats come early, the dates being Monday, Sept. 26; Tuesday, Sept. 27; Thursday, Sept. 29, and Friday, Sept. 30.

Last season was in every respect the most successful the orchestra has ever had, and this season, the 30th, promises to be even more so. A total of 117 concerts has been arranged.

The members of the orchestra are beginning to drift back to town. Last night Mr. Strube's season at Bar Harbor came to an end, and the 22 men with him get back to Boston tomorrow. The orchestra will come together for the Worcester festival in the last week of September.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 4, 1910.

Concerts by Symphony Orchestra Soon to Begin.

The auction sales of Symphony seats come early this year, the dates being Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept 26, 27, 29 and 30. The first public rehearsal will be on Oct 7 and the first concert Oct 8. Next year the whole Symphony season will be put back one week, as happens about every five years.

The final announcements of the plans for the season are not quite ready as some more data is looked for in the near future from Mr Fiedler, who is back in Hamburg after a summer spent in Switzerland, but it is safe to say that the orchestra has never in the past offered a more brilliant group of soloists and Mr Fiedler is showing his usual catholicity of taste in his selection of the works that will be performed.

For the first time in its history the personnel of the orchestra will be over 100. The two additions of the present year are a first trombone, who will relieve Mr Hampe of some of his work and a utility bassoon, to be used in case of illness in that group of instruments. In the past with only four bassoons some embarrassing situations have arisen when one of them happened to be ill.

The number of changes in the orchestra is not great. Of course, first of all there is the new concert master, Mr Witek, who after having spent the summer in Schevinigen, Holland, with the Philharmonic orchestra, has returned to Berlin to prepare for his departure to this country. He sails from Bremen on Sept 13 and as he has been engaged for a term of years he comes this early in order to establish himself in a home over here.

There will be a new man in the percussion department; a new man among the violas and one or two others, but the orchestra remains substantially the same.

The members are gradually returning to Boston from their various summer engagements and a number of those who went abroad are now on the ocean. Mr Strube's season in Bar Harbor closed last night and the men who have been with him return the first of this week.

As in the past for many years the orchestra—or the major part of it—will be brought together for the first time for the Worcester festival in the last week of this month.

GLOBE—TUESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 13, 1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony orchestra, received yesterday a cablegram from Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, announcing that he was sailing from Bremen today for New York, where he is due to arrive a week from today.

Mr Witek comes to this country accompanied by his wife, who is a talented musician and a pianist of considerable reputation in Germany. Mr Witek is coming this early in the season in order to find a house for himself, as he expects to make his home in Boston permanently. Conductor Max Fiedler is due to sail from Bremen next Tuesday.

[2]

SYMPHONY TO BEGIN OCT. 5

Orchestra Plans 117 Concerts for Coming Season

With the approaching season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will enter upon its greatest year since the first concerts in the old Music Hall. One hundred and seventeen concerts will be given in the course of the winter. The personnel of the orchestra has in a few instances been altered—in addition to the engagement as concertmeister of Anton Witek of the Berlin Philharmonic—and slightly augmented. For the average concert of the season, when special works do not call for additional players, the orchestra will number 101 or 102.

The first concert of the season, for an exception, will take place out of town, at Northampton, Mass., Oct. 5, during the ceremonies attendant upon the induction into office of Professor Seelye's successor at Smith College. At the first Boston concert on October 7. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist. The usual number of Symphony players, Gustav Strube conducting, will take part at the Worcester Festival before the Boston season commences.

On the 13th of this month Concertmeister Witek will sail for Boston with his family and his furniture, for Mr. Witek, who has signed a three years' contract, intends to go right in for housekeeping. (In Europe, it is said, Mr. Witek gave out such astounding reports of his Boston salary that Mr. Fiedler was deluged with other "offers" for Germany by that time was well persuaded that America was a land where grew dollars 'stead of hay.)

Mr. Fiedler will sail for these shores on the 20th of the month and he has prepared some exceptionally interesting programmes. On account of the close association of the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra which now exists, many works which have hitherto been much desired for performance, but were practically an impossibility without the co-operation of a chorus, will be given. Further announcements of the Symphony season will soon be forthcoming.

Post Sept 5

THE SUNDAY HERALD, SEPTEMBER 11, 1910.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Novelties for the Season Include Works of Importance.

Mr. Elis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has received from Mr. Fiedler, its conductor, the list of the principal works for performance during the season of Symphony concerts which will begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 7. The list is interesting. As usually happens it is more than likely that some of the novelties announced will not be played, and that others not announced will be on the programs.

The familiar works are as follows:

Bach, suite in D major and the first and third Brandenburg concertos. Beethoven symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; the "Egmont," "Coriolanus" and Leonore No. 3 overtures, and the great Fugue for strings, opus 133, which has not been played here by an orchestra. Berlioz, "Harold in Italy," with Mr. Ferir as solo viola, the "King Lear" and "Roman Carnival" overtures with the "Love Scene" and "Scherzo" from "Romeo and Juliet," three familiar pieces from "The Damnation of Faust." Bossi, "Intermezzi Goldoniani; Brahms', symphonies No. 1 and 3; first serenade and "Academic" overture. Bruckner, fourth or "Romantic" symphony. Fuchs, first Serenade for strings; Goldmark, "Sakuntala" overture. Handel, Concerto Grosso in D minor and in D major. Haydn, symphony in E flat major. Liszt, "Dante" symphony, with the choral ending. Mozart symphonies in G minor and C major (Jupiter) and the Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra, which has never been played here at a Symphony concert. Mendelssohn, "Italian" symphony and the "Melusine" overture, Saint-Saens, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre." Schubert, C major symphony. Schumann, the E flat and D minor symphonies, the "Manfred" overture and overture, Scherzo and Finale. Weber, the three familiar overtures.

Other familiar works announced are:

D'Indy, "Istar" variations; Franck, symphonic poem "Le Chasseur Maudit"; Humperdinck, "In a Moorish Cafe"; Loeffler, symphonic poem "La Mort de Tintagiles"; MacDowell, "Indian" suite; Reznicek, overture "Donna Diana"; Reger, variations with a double Fugue, and his serenade; Rimsky Korsakoff, "Antar"; Sgambati, symphony in D major and "Te Deum"; Sibellius, symphony No. 1 and "Finlandia"; Strauss, symphony in F minor, "Death and Transfiguration," "A Hero's Life" and "Don Quixote"; Tschaikowsky, "Manfred," E minor and "Pathetic" symphonies, "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the "Voyvode" symphonic ballade and suite No. 2.

The novelties include some works of prime importance. In addition to those by Beethoven and Mozart, which have already been mentioned, Debussy will be represented by his latest orchestral work, "Iberia," which caused great discussion in Paris last season. Mahler's second symphony with solo and chorus, which practically makes a full program of itself is also promised and Rachmaninoff's second symphony, which was played in America for the first time last year, will be heard. Richard Strauss' tone poem "Macbeth" will find a place on one of the early programs.

Other novelties are as follows:

Arensky, set of variations for strings on a theme by Tschaikowsky; Bantock, three Dramatic Dances; Debussy, "Ronde de Printemps"; Delius, "Appalachia," with chorus; "Brigg-Fair," "Dance Rhapsody" and "In a Summer Garden"; Enesco, two Roumanian Dances; Glasounoff, suite "Au moyen age"; Hadley, "The Culprit Fay"; Halm, a comedy overture and a concerto for orchestra, piano and organ; Lladoff, "Baba Jaga"; Mandl, "Overture to a Gascon Comedy"; Nicode, two scherzos from "Gloria"; Noren, suite "Vita"; Palmgren, a suite "From Finland"; Scriabine, "Poeme de l'extase"; Weiner, serenade.

As has already been announced, the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction on Monday, Sept. 26; the $10 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 27; the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 29, and the $10 seats on Friday, Sept. 30.

JOURNAL—TUESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 13, 1910.

CONCERT-MASTER SAILS

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, received yesterday a cablegram from Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra, announcing that he was sailing from Bremen today for New York. Mr. Witek comes to this country accompanied by his wife, who is herself a pianist of considerable reputation in Germany. Mr. Witek expects to make his home in Boston permanently. Conductor Max Fiedler is due to sail from Bremen a week from today.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 11, 1910

Symphony's Greatest Season

Unprecedented Number of Concerts—Band Strengthened and Increased—Exceptional Interest in Programmes

The coming season at Symphony Hall promises to be the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra. The orchestra will be larger than ever before this winter, averaging 101 or 102 at each concert, and 117 concerts, the biggest season in the orchestra's career, will be given. The band has been materially strengthened since last season. A partial list of the music to be performed, which includes an exceptional number of interesting novelties, is at hand.

These novelties are by composers of every school and nationality. Mr. Fiedler from the beginning has distinguished himself in his programmes. He has not been the partisan of this or that composer. He has not permitted his rare enthusiasm and understanding of Strauss, for instance, to quench his curiosity in examining the works of Debussy or D'Indy. At least two composers unknown in this city will have a hearing for the first time in the course of the next 24 concerts. Mr. Fiedler was the first conductor of the Boston orchestra to bring to a hearing works by the modern Englishmen. For the winter, there is a new work by Granville Bantock and four new pieces by Fritz Delius, whose nocturne for orchestra, "Paris," was food for reflection on the part of reviewers at least, last season.

The Russians will be given much attention. Heading the list of the novelties is Arensky's "Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky" for string orchestra, one of the late works of the composer. Glazounov is represented by an orchestral suite unknown here, "From the Middle Ages." This suite was played by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in 1906 in New York. The movements of the suite are named respectively, "The Crusaders," "Troubadour's Serenade," "Scherzo," "Love Scene."

The scherzo represents a street theatre where the dance of death is being played. The love scene discourses of a pair who converse with pleasant emotion in an old castle while the ocean roars without. This suite was published in 1908. There is also a suite, "Scenes de Ballet."

Liadoff's "Baba Yaga" will be played for the first time in Boston. This piece is called by the composer a "Musical Tableau, after a popular Russian tale, for grand orchestra." The score is prefixed by a quotation from A. Afanasieff: "Baba Yaga descends to the yard, whistles, and before her appears a mortar, a pestle and a broom. Baba Yaga starts off, seated in the moratr, pushing it with the pestle and effacing her traces with the broom. Soon a noise is heard in the forest; the trees shake, the dry leaves crackle." The music is in the form of a scherzo. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" will be played after a lapse of some seasons. The work, in the estimation of many, ranks with or above the famous "Scheherazade."

"A Poeme de L'Extase," by Alexander Scriabine, has had one performance in this country, by the Russian Symphony Society, Dec. 10, 1908. The composer was then in New York and his composition had been published the same year. In Russia Scriabine and Rachmaninoff are considered the most representative composers. What will probably go down to posterity as Tschaikowsky's greatest work, his "Manfred Symphony," will be played, also the great "Symphonic Pathetique; the overture, "Romeo and Juliette," with the unforgettable cantilena; the early symphonic poem, after a tale of Pushkine, "The Voyvode," the second suite for string orchestra, only part of which has been heard here.

The French composers are represented, first of all, by one of the most heroic figures in modern music, Hector Berlioz: the symphony "Harold in Italy," the overtures, "King Lear" and "The Roman Carnival," the "Scene d'Amour" and Scherzo from "Queen Mab"; three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust." Debussy's "Iberia" will have its first performance in America. The suite, which after the two collections of pieces for the piano, "Images I." and "Images II.," is called "Images III.," is, as may be inferred from the title, a series of impressionistic pictures of Spain. These pieces were performed for the first time in Paris last spring. "Rondes de Printemps" refers, presumably, to the suite for orchestra, piano and voices which Debussy sent back to the institute from Rome in 1887. Thus the piece comes between the "L'Enfant Prodigue," which won the composer the Prix de Rome in 1884, and "La Demoiselle Elue" which followed the Roman sojourn. "Printemps" shocked the officers of the institute, first, because it was written in F sharp major, second, because the voices were given an instrumental role, though one of great beauty and distinction. So this music was not published until 1904, which, in spite of the disgust of the officer, is rather surprising, for the measures seem to glow with contagious freshness and spirit, with the coloring of one who had already, even in those early days, sensed in nature a beauty rare and hitherto unknown. The "Petite Suite," in lighter vein, which is also scheduled, was played in part by Mr. Strube at one of the Pop concerts last spring. The exceedingly imaginative Nocturnes for orchestra and women's voices will again be heard.

D'Indy's "Istar" variations, which form one of the most remarkable works in modern music, will be played, and Franck's symphony poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit." Charles M. Loeffler's superb poem after Maeterlinck, "Le Mort de Tintagile," will be heard after too long an absence from the symphony lists. Two of Saint-Saens symphonic poems, well-made trifles, much newer when they were written than today, are listed, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and the "Danse Macabre."

* * * *

The Strauss music will include the Symphony, the tone-poems "Macbeth," "Death and Transfiguration," "Hero's Life" and "Don Quixote." "Macbeth" is the first of the great tone-poems wherein Strauss commenced to display his transcendent individuality. It is by no means a work of mature genius, but there are in it mighty and portentous pages, and the singular conclusion is assuredly an inspiration of genius. Bruckner's 4th Symphony, the "romantic," is perhaps the most generally understod and appreciated of all that master's gigantic compositions. Busoni's orchestral suite, "Turandot," which was played with much success last winter in New York, will be given hearing here.

As for the classics, there will be two of the Bach "Brandenburg" concertos; the first and third symphonies of Brahms; Symphonies 2, 3, 5, 7, and 9, Beethoven; and the fugue for the string orchestra, an elaboration, if we are not mistaken, of a movement either a part of, or intended for, one of the late string quartets; two "concerti grossi" by Handel; one of the Haydn symphonies in E flat, and, of course, many other well known masterpieces.

Liszt's "Dante" symphony, with female chorus, will form an important item of the season's entertainment. On account of the close association of the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra during the coming season, many works which have hitherto been much desired for performance, but were practically impossible without the aid of a large and very efficient chorus, will be given. Mahler's second symphony, which made a mixed and forceful sensation last spring in Paris, will be one of these. Halm, whose symphony for strings proved a very unusual work last season, will be represented this winter by "A Comedy Overture" and a concerto for orchestra, piano and organ. There should have been added to the list of classics Mozart's symphonies in G minor and C major, and an adagio and fugue for string orchestra as yet unknown here, also Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony and overture, "Melusine." Two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" will be new to this city. A new work by Noren, the composer of the famous "Kaleidoscope" variations, and a symphony, Op. 27, by Rachmaninoff, should be among the most interesting of the new things. Reger will contribute the great variations upon a theme by Hiller, and a serenade. The Schumann symphonies in E flat and D minor, the Schubert C major symphony will head the list of works by those composers. A new serenade by Leo Weiner will be played. There will be the customary selections and overtures by Wagner and Weber.

There is hardly any more vital music being written today than that of Sibelius, the Finn. Four novelties by him will be given: The overture, "Karelia"; the beautiful and mournful elegy, "The Swan of Tuonela"; the suite, "Swanvit"; the stirring piece, "Finlandia," and last, but not least, the wild poem of Finland, the First Symphony, by which Dr. Muck first introduceed Boston to Sibelius. Italy is represented by Bossi and his "Intermezzi Goldoniani" for strings; Sgambati, with his Te Deum and Symphony in D. For Americans, there are MacDowell—the "Indian Suite"—and Henry Hadley, with the work which won him the prize for American composition a year ago, "The Culprit Fay." This work requires a chorus as well as orchestra.

There are two Roumanian rhapsodies by Enesco, a composer known here only on the programmes of the Longy Club. The novelties by Delius are "Appalachia," a set of variations for chorus and orchestra upon a old slave song of the middle Mississippi Valley; "Brigg Fair," "Dance Rhapsody" and "In a Summer Garden." A suite, "From Finland," by Palmgren, will introduce a compatriot of Sibelius. Another unknown name on the list is that of Richard Mandl, "Overture to a Gascon Comedy." The soloists will soon be announced.

The first concert of the season, for an exception, will take place out of town, at Northampton, Mass., Oct. 5, during the ceremonies attendant upon the induction into office of Professor Seelye's successor at Smith College. At the first Boston concert on Oct. 7 Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist. The usual number of Symphony players, Gustav Strube conducting, will take part at the Worcester Festival before the Boston season commences.

On the 13th of this month Concertmeister Witek will sail for Boston with his family and his furniture, for Mr. Witek, who has signed a three years' contract, intends to go right in for housekeeping.

Mr. Fiedler will sail for these shores on the 20th of the month and he has prepared some exceptionally interesting programmes.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 11, 1910.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Works Promised For Symphony Season.

Novelties by Strauss, Debussy, Delius, Sibelius and Mahler.

Production of "Bohemian Girl"—Current Gossip.

Another musical season is at hand. Within the week comes the list of pieces—there are over 100—from which Mr. Fiedler will make his programs for the Boston symphony.

There are to be novelties of importance. For one of them we are to hear Mahler's second symphony. It is scored for 115 instruments, a mixed chorus and two solo voices, a soprano and an alto. Doubled choirs of brass and percussion in the distance account for the added size of the band.

This symphony was played for the first time in America Dec 8, 1908, at Carnegie hall, N Y, by the New York symphony orchestra, directed by the composer.

Debussy's "Iberia" and "Rondes de Printemps." two of the three numbers from his new orchestral suite, "Images" may also be anticipated with interest. These are his first pieces for orchestra in five years. After a period in which he gave little to his publisher but groups of piano pieces, the "Images" were announced and "Iberia," the second of them, itself consisting of three parts, was performed by Mr Pierne at the Colonne concerts in Paris Feb 20 last. The three nocturnes heard here season before last will be repeated, and the petite suite is to be done for the first time.

Mr Fiedler has shown favor to the two moderns of increasing reputation, Delius and Sibelius. The former at one time came to this country, sojourned in Florida, raised oranges and listened to the negroes sing about their cabin fires. His "Appalachia" Edward Burlingame Hill calls a "series of variations on a large scale, based on an old slave song." It employs a solo baritone and a mixed chorus. Here, as in the choice of other works to be done, the new alliance with the Cecilia to be effected this year is apparent.

Delius' English rhapsody, "Brigg-Fair," and his orchestral poem, "In a Summer Garden," were contemplated last season. These three, together with the Dance-Rhapsody, will make a new quartet of works by this composer of the intensely personal idiom and vivid style, remembered for his "Paris" last year.

The "Swan of Tuonela" on sbbjcts from "Kalevala," the national epic of Finland, and the "Swanehvit" (Swan-white") suite, both by Sibelius, were announced for last year. The latter, a recent work (op 54), is from the incidental music to a fairy play by August Strindberg. The suite was performed for the first time at a promenade concert of Henry Wood's orchestra, London, Sept 29 of last year.

The overture "Karelia" (op 10) is the third Sibelius novelty to be heard. His first symphony and "Finlandia" will be repeated.

From Reger there will be the serenade and his Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller, both of which the orchestra has played.

This season will complete the list of the Strauss tone-poems by a performance of "Macbeth." It has been less heard of than "Don Juan," yet those may be found who pronounce it a better proportional work. Strauss wrote it in 1886-7, when he was 22 years old. It is purely psychological in nature and projects only the soul combat of the hero.

Of the composer's other work, "Don Quixote," "Hero's Life and Death" and "Transfiguration" are to be repeated for the tone-poems. The F minor symphony will be added.

The parts for the Beethoven Fugue for string orchestra, op 133, which could not be obtained last year, have been secured and make possible a Beethoven novelty.

For the repetitions of the established Beethoven, the 2d, 3d, 5th, 7th and again the 9th symphonies are to be noted, and the Leonore No. 3, the Egmont and Coriolanus overtures.

Another novelty of interest will be the suite "Turandot," by Busoni, the pianist. It first existed as incidental music to Gozzi's fairy play of the name. The suite was played for the first time by the Philharmonic society (Mr Mahler) at Carnegie hall, New York, the 10th of last March. The composer has been invited to conduct it in person this season at concerts by the Cincinnati and the Theodore Thomas (Chicago) orchestras.

Three American composers are represented, if Mr Loeffler may be styled as such, and his long identification with Boston, if not his early education, warrants it. He, by his "La Mort de Tintagiles," Mr MacDowell by his Indian suite, and Henry Hadley by his rhapsody, "The Culprit Fay." This last was awarded the $1000 prize in the competition conducted by the National federation of musical clubs at its session in Grand Rapids, Mich, a year ago last May.

The annual auction sale for orchestra seats will be held at Symphony hall on the mornings of Sept 26, 27, 29 and 30, beginning at 10.

[3]

POST, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEBER 14, 1910

CONCERT MASTER OF SYMPHONY COMING

C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday received a cablegram from Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, announcing that he was sailing from Bremen for New York, where he is due to arrive a week from today. Mr. Witek comes to this country accompanied by his wife, who is herself a talented musician and a pianist of considerable reputation in Germany. Mr. Witek is coming this early in the season in order to find a house for himself, as he expects to make his home in Boston permanently. Conductor Max Fiedler is due to sail from Bremen a week from today.

RECORD, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10. 1910

WINTER'S MUSICAL NOVELTIES

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has sent to Mr. Ellis the list of works which he expects to perform during the coming season. He announces Beethoven's great Fugue for string orchestra, opus 133, one of the last works of the master which has yet to have its first performance in Boston, and he has found an Adagio and Fugue by Mozart that has never been played.

In the matter of novelties he has managed to get together a list that sounds very attractive. Debussy's new suite, performed in Paris last year, called "Iberia" will be one of the novelties. Others will be Richard Strauss's "Macbeth," the first of his tone poems, which has never been played in Boston. Three Dramatic Dances by Bantock and four works by Delius—"Appalachia," a work for chorus and orchestra, inspired by Delius's residence in Florida, his "Brigg-Fair," his "Dance-Rhapsody," and his little piece, entitled "In a Summer Garden." Another work new to Boston which should be of great interest is Gustav Mahler's Second Symphony with solo and chorus. The only works of Mahler's that have been done here is his Fifth Symphony which Mr. Gericke performed five years ago.

Other novelties that Mr. Fiedler promises are a set of Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky for string orchestra by Arensky; Busoni's new suite "Turandot;" two Roumanian Rhapsodies by Enescó; Glazounoff's suite, "Au Moyen Age;" Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay;" a comedy-overture and a concerto for orchestra, piano and organ by Halm; Liadoff's little piece, "Baba Jaga;" an overture to a Gascon comedy by Richard Mandl; two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria;" Noren's suite "Vita;" Palmgren's suite "From Finland;" three unknown works by Sibelius; the overture "Karelia;" "The Swan of Tuonela" and the suite, "Swanevit;" Scriabine's "Poeme de l'extase;" Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E-Minor; and a Serenade by Leo Weiner, a young composer of Chicago who is in a sense a protege of Conductor Scott of the Theodore Thomas orchestra.

Of course, the backbone of the season will be made of the classics and of these Bach will be represented by his Suite in D-Major and two Brandenburg concertos; Beethoven by his 2d, 3d, 5th, 7th and 9th symphonies and his "Egmont," "Coriolanus," and "Leonore No. 3" overtures; Berlioz by his "Harold in Italy" symphony with Mr. Ferir as solo viola; his "King Lear" and "Roman Carnival" overtures, the Love Scene and Scherzo, "Queen Mab" from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and the three familiar excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust;" Brahms by his first and third symphonies, his first serenade and the "Academic" overture; Fuchs by his first serenade and Goldmark by his "Sakuntala" overture; Handel by the two Concerto Grossi; Haydn by his E-flat symphony; Liszt by the "Dante" symphony with female chorus; Mozart by his G-Minor and "Jupiter" symphonies; Mendelssohn by his "Italien" symphony and "Melusine" overture; Saint-Saens by his "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre," Shubert by his C-Major Symphony; Schumann by his E-Flat and D-Minor symphonies, his "Manfred" overture and his Overture, Scherzo and Finale; Tschaikowsky by his "Manfred" Fifth and "Pathetic" symphonies, his "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the "Voyvode" symphonic Ballade, and his second suite; Wagner by numerous excerpts from the music dramas and Weber by the "Freischuzz," "Euryanthe" and "Oberon" overtures.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1910.

NOVELTIES DURING SYMPHONY SEASON

Beethoven's Great Fugue for String Orchestra Among Them.

SEAT SALE OPENS MONDAY, SEPT. 26

Aborn Opera Company to Give Big Production of "The Bohemian Girl."

Among the novelties announced by Conductor Fiedler for the coming Symphony season are Beethoven's great fugue for string orchestra, opus 133, one of the last works of the master, which has yet to have its first performance in Boston, and an adagio and fugue by Mozart that has never been played. Among the other novelties will be Debussy's "Iberia;" Richard Strauss' "Macbeth," the first of his tone poems, which has never been played in Boston; three dramatic dances by Bantock and four works by Delius—"Appalachia" (a work for chorus and orchestra, "Brigg-Fair," "Dance-Rhapsody" and a little piece entitled "In a Summer Garden;" Gustav Mahler's second symphony for solo and chorus; a set of variations on a theme by Tschaikowsky, for string orchestra, by Arensky; Busoni's new suite, "Turandot;" two Roumanian rhapsodies by Enesco; Glazounoff's suite, "Au moyen age;" Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay;" a comedy-overture and a concerto for orchestra, piano and organ, by Halm; Liadoff's "Baba Jaga;" an overture to a Gascon comedy, by Richard Mandl; two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria;" Noren's suite, "Vita;" Palmgren's suite, "From Finland;" three unknown works by Sibelius, the overture "Karolia," "The Swan of Tuonela" and a suite, "Swanevit;" Scriabine's "Poeme de l'Extase;" Rachmaninoff's symphony in E-minor, and a serenade by Leo Weiner, a young composer of Chicago.

The names new to Boston Symphony programs among the composers, besides Weiner, who has been alluded to, are Enesco, who is a Roumanian; Richard Mandl; Palmgren, a Finn like Sibelius, and Scriabine, who, with Glazounoff and Rachmaninoff, leads Russian music of today.

The backbone of the season will be made of the classics, and of these Bach will be represented by his suite in B major and two Brandenburg concertos; Beethoven by his second, third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies and his "Egmont," "Coriolanus" and "Leonore No. 3" overtures; Berlioz by his "Harold in Italy" symphony, with Mr. Ferir as solo viola; his "King Lear" and "Roman Carnival" overtures, the love scene and scherzo, "Queen Mab," from his "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and the three familiar excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust;" Brahms by his first and third symphonies, his first "Serenade" and the "Academic" overture; Fuchs by his first "Serenade," and Goldmark by his "Sakuntala" overture; Handel by two "Concerti Grossi;" Haydn by his E flat symphony; Lizst by the "Dante" symphony, with female chorus; Mozart by his G minor and "Jupiter" symphonies; Mendelssohn by his "Italian" symphony and "Melusine" overture; Saint-Saens by his "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Dance Macabre;" Schubert by his C major symphony; Schumann by his E flat and D minor symphonies, his "Manfred" overture and his "Overture Scherzo and Finale;" Tschaikowsky by his "Manfred," fifth and "Pathetic" symphonies, his "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the "Voyvode" symphonic ballade and his second suite; Wagner by numerous selections and Weber by the "Freischuetz," "Euryanthe" and "Oberon" overtures.

Other works which have hardly taken their place in the classics and yet are familiar to the Boston audiences include Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," Bruckner's "Romantic" symphony, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, Franck's symphonic poem, "Le chasseur maudit"; a movement from Humperdinck's "Moorish Suite," Martin Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Reznicek's overture, "Donna Diana"; Reger's "Variations" and "Serenade," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," Sgambati's symphony in D major and "Te Deum," Sibelius' symphony No. 1, and Richard Strauss' symphony in F minor, "Death and Transfiguration," "A Hero's Life," and "Don Quixote."

The seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 26, and Tuesday, Sept. 27. The seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 29, and Friday, Sept. 30.

RECORD, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The auction sale of seats for the thirtieth season of Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony hall on Monday, Sept. 26, at 10 a.m., and the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On the following morning at the same hour the $10 seats will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday morning, Sept. 29, at 10 a.m., and on Friday, Sept. 30, at the same hour the $10 seats for the concerts will be sold. The rules of past years will be in force. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice;

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1910

MUSICAL NOVELTIES IN THIS WINTER'S PROGRAMME

Dr. Fiedler Makes Announcement Regarding the Symphony—Debussy, Strauss, Bantock, Mahler and Delius to Be Heard.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has sent to Mr. Ellis the list of works which he expects to perform during the coming season. He announces Beethoven's great Fugue for string orchestra, opus 133, one of the last works of the master which has yet to have its first performance in Boston, and he has found an Adagio and Fugue by Mozart that has never been played.

In the matter of novelties he has managed to get together a list that sounds very attractive. Debussy's new suite, performed in Paris last year, called "Iberia" will be one of the novelties. Others will be Richard Strauss's "Macbeth," the first of his tone poems, which has never been played in Boston. Three Dramatic Dances by Bantock and four works by Delius—"Appalachia," a work for chorus and orchestra, inspired by Delius's residence in Florida, his "Brigg-Fair," his "Dance-Rhapsody," and his little piece, entitled "In a Summer Garden." Another work new to Boston which should be of great interest is Gustav Mahler's Second Symphony with solo and chorus. The only works of Mahler's that have been done here is his Fifth Symphony which Mr. Gericke performed five years ago.

Other novelties that Mr. Fiedler promises are a set of Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky for string orchestra by Arensky; Busoni's new suite "Turandot;" two Roumanian Rhapsodies by Enesco; Glazounoff's suite, "Au Moyen Age;" Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay;" a comedy-overture and a concerto for orchestra, piano and organ by Halm; Liadoff's little piece, "Baba Jaga;" an overture to a Gascon comedy by Richard Mandl; two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria;" Noren's suite "Vita;" Palmgren's suite "From Finland;" three unknown works by Sibelius; the overture "Karelia;" "The Swan of Tuonela" and the suite, "Swanevit;" Scriabine's "Poeme de l'extase;" Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E-Minor; and a Serenade by Leo Weiner, a young composer of Chicago who is in a sense a protege of Conductor Scott of the Theodore Thomas orchestra.

Of course, the backbone of the season will be made of the classics and of these Bach will be represented by his Suite in D-Major and two Brandenburg concertos; Beethoven by his 2d, 3d, 5th, 7th and 9th symphonies and his "Egmont," "Coriolanus," and "Leonore No. 3" overtures; Berlioz by his "Harold in Italy" symphony with Mr. Ferir as solo viola; his "King Lear" and "Roman Carnival" overtures, the Love Scene and Scherzo, "Queen Mab" from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and the three familiar excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust;" Brahms by his first and third symphonies, his first serenade and the "Academic" overture; Fuchs by his first serenade and Goldmark by his "Sakuntala" overture; Handel by the two Concerto Grossi; Haydn by his E-flat symphony; Liszt by the "Dante" symphony with female chorus; Mozart by his G-Minor and "Jupiter" symphonies; Mendelssohn by his "Italien" symphony and "Melusine" overture; Saint-Saens by his "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre," Shubert by his C-Major Symphony; Schumann by his E-Flat and D-Minor symphonies, his "Manfred" overture and his Overture, Scherzo and Finale; Tschaikowsky by his "Manfred" Fifth and "Pathetic" symphonies, his "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the "Voyvode" symphonic Ballade, and his second suite; Wagner by numerous excerpts from the music dramas and Weber by the "Freischuzz," "Euryanthe" and "Oberon" overtures.

As already announced the auction sales take place in the last week of September. The $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, the 26th; the $10 seats on Tuesday, the 27th; the $18 seats for the concerts on Thursday, the 29th, and the $10 seats on Friday, the 30th.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has sent to Mr. Ellis the list of works which he expects to perform during the coming season. He announces Beethoven's great Fugue for string orchestra, opus 133, one of the last works of the master, and he has found an Adagio and Fugue by Mozart that has never been played.

In the matter of novelties he has managed to get together a list that sounds very attractive. Debussy had a new suite performed in Paris last year which was called "Iberia." This will be one of the novelties. There will be many others.

Of course the backbone of the season will be made of the classics and of these Bach will be represented by his Suite in D-major and two Brandenburg concertos; Beethoven by his 2d, 3d, 5th, 7th and 9th symphones, and his "Egmont," "Coriolanus," and "Leonore No. 3" overtures; Berlioz by his "Harold in Italy" symphony, with Mr. Ferir as solo viola; his "King Lear" and "Roman Carnival" overtures, the Love Scene and Scherzo "Queen Mab" from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and the three familiar excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust."

As already announced the auction sales take place in the last week of September.

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1910

News of Music

HAD Mr. Fiedler and the Symphony Orchestra forty-eight instead of twenty-four pairs of concerts for the new season, and had the conductor extended the list of chosen pieces accordingly, there would still be some to discover and to regret omissions. Thus, a correspondent, who is particularly versed in French music, notes that d'Indy's "Souvenirs," still unheard here, Ravel's "L'Heure Espagnole," poorly performed by amateurs last winter, and Dukas's revised symphony, are all missing from the conductor's list, and laments accordingly. Still another fears that Mr. Fiedler is neglecting American composers, since he omits any piece by Mr. Chadwick or Mr. Converse. A third grieves for the lack of Reger's concerto for violin, and so on and so forth with other individual curiosities and likings. The regretful should remember that conductors' lists are very flexible things and that seven months of concerts give room for much—quite as much in the way of new music as even the receptive public of Symphony Hall can understand and enjoy.

Mr. Fiedler, according to his present plans, will sail from Bremen a week from today. His ship is due in New York on Wednesday, Sept. 28. He will come at once to Boston and begin rehearsals with the orchestra on Monday, Oct. 3. Mr. Witek, the new concert-master, will precede his chief by a week. He comes, it is understood, with a view to several years of continuous service.

Apropos, again, of unfamiliar French music, Mr. Wood has lately played at the Promenade Concerts in London the ballet music from Franck's opera, "Hulda," that, his disciples like to say, conductors have strangely neglected. Side by side with Franck's dances went Tschaikowsky's from the ballet of "The Nut-Cracker," and the Times drew this comparison between them: "Tschaikowsky's piquant tunes and apt coloring say so precisely what he means that the most prosaic listener must be captivated by them. Franck's suggestive and elusive style makes continual calls on the imagination of the hearers, and a 'popular' audience cannot respond very fully to such calls. The pictures which Franck's dance tunes bring before one are shadowy compared with those of Tschaikowsky, so much so that one would almost fear to see them acted out upon the stage; but they are also full of the most delicate beauty. None is more beautiful than the passage in which winter's rugged dance is interrupted by the approach of spring, and a great crescendo dispels the cold coloring of the wintry music and gives place to a number of tender touches of orchestration."

The competition for the prize, offered by the Metropolitan Opera House two years ago for an opera by an American composer, closes next Thursday. It is within the power of the judges to extend the period for the reception of manuscripts by eighteen months. The judges, however, have not yet been named, and in fairness to the composers who have complied with the original terms of the competition, they can hardly alter these requirements. Already several scores have been submitted.

Mischa Elman, the violinist, who has reached the age for service in the Russian Army, has been excused from such duty, "on artistic grounds," by the Minister of War. Mr. Kreisler in Austria and Mr. Marteau in France were not so fortunate in their time.

More discoveries by Miss Pavlova—The American claque amazed me. The claqueurs sit up in the top boxes armed with great wooden spoons, which they wield at command, and the public follow their lead. It is said that the audience does n't know when they should applaud." [The Petersburg Viedonosti.

ADVERTISER, FRIDAY SEPTEMBER 16, 1910

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO GIVE 117 CONCERTS

Probably the Largest Number of Engagements of Kind Ever Filled by Any Similar Body in the World.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has issued the annual booklet, which shows the engagements of the orchestra for the season of 1910-1911. There are a total of 112 concerts booked, to which will be added two Pension Fund concerts and three concerts with the Cecilia society, making a grand total of 117 concerts, which is the largest number of concerts that has ever been given by the orchestra in a season, and probably is the largest number of regular Symphony concerts ever given by any orchestra in the world with the space of seven months.

Curiously enough the first concert of the season is out of town, in Northampton, on Oct. 5. This has happened but once before—in the second year of the orchestra—when the first out of town concert of the season; in fact, the first out of town concert by the orchestra was given in Newport.

The bookings show the regular 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Providence, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, four in New Bedford, three each in Worcester and Hartford, and one each in Northampton, Brockton, New Haven, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Syracuse, Albany and Waterbury, Conn.

HERALD, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SEASON

More Concerts Arranged Than Ever Given by the Orchestra.

Manager C. A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony orchestra has issued the annual booklet, which shows the engagements of the orchestra for the season of 1910-1911. There are a total of 112 concerts booked, to which will be added two pension fund concerts and three concerts with the Cecilia Society, making a total of 117 concerts, which is the largest number that has ever been given by the orchestra in a season, and probably is the largest number of regular Symphony concerts ever given by any orchestra in the world within the space of seven months.

Curiously enough, the first concert of the season is out of town, in Northampton, Mass., on Oct. 5. This has happened but once before—in the second year of the orchestra—when the first concert of the season, in fact, the first out of town concert by the orchestra was given in Newport.

The bookings show the regular 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Providence, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, four in New Bedford, three each in Worcester and Hartford, and one each in Northampton, Brockton, New Haven, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Syracuse, Albany and Waterbury, Ct.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1910.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—

SYMPHONY HAS NEW CONCERT MASTER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has arranged for a busy season and for the first time the players will number over one hundred. Anton Witek, who has succeeded Prof. Willy Hess as concert master, is expected in Boston in a few days. He studied under Bennewitz at Prague and in 1894 was appointed concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin.

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1910

News of Music

THE detailed schedule of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the new season, while it swells the number of them to 117, the largest in the history of the Band, indicates few departures from the routine of recent years. The concerts at Christmas time happen to fall on the afternoon of Friday, Dec. 23, and the evening of Sunday, Dec. 24; and Holy Week brings the usual shifting of the afternoon concert from Good Friday (April 14) to Holy Thursday (April 13). This year the concerts will begin early, on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 7 and 8, and end early, on Friday and Saturday, April 28 and 29. The usual journeys to New York, Philadelphia and other cities to the south are appointed for November, December, January, February and March; and the annual expedition to the Middle West for the last days of January and the first of February, with Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Syracuse and Albany for the chosen cities. To Pittsburg, the orchestra has not gone in years. Incidentally, the schedule makes known the dates of the concerts of the joint forces of the Cecilia and the orchestra. They are Thursdays, Dec. 1, and Feb. 16, and Good Friday, April 14, when, in all probability, Bach's "Passion Music" will be performed for the first time in a musical generation in Boston.

According to Mme. Nordica, her announced appearances at the Boston Opera House as Isolde, Gioconda and in other of her familiar parts, will take place in January.

RECORD, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1910

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO GIVE 117 CONCERTS

Probably the Largest Number of Engagements of Kind Ever Filled by Any Similar Body in the World.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has issued the annual booklet, which shows the engagements of the orchestra for the season of 1910-1911. There are a total of 112 concerts booked, to which will be added two Pension Fund concerts and three concerts with the Cecilia society, making a grand total of 117 concerts, which is the largest number of concerts that has ever been given by the orchestra in a season, and probably is the largest number of regular Symphony concerts ever given by any orchestra in the world with the space of seven months.

Curiously enough the first concert of the season is out of town, in Northampton, on Oct. 5. This has happened but once before—in the second year of the orchestra—when the first out of town concert of the season; in fact, the first out of town concert by the orchestra was given in Newport.

The bookings show the regular 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Providence, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, four in New Bedford, three each in Worcester and Hartford, and one each in Northampton, Brockton, New Haven, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Syracuse, Albany and Waterbury, Conn.

[4]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

THE MUSIC PICKED FOR THE NEW YEAR

The Wide Range and Due Proportion of Mr. Fiedler's List—The Chosen Classics, Elder and Younger—Liszt's "Dante" Symphony and Other Interesting Revivals—Mahler, Debussy, Strauss and Rachmaninoff to Provide the Larger New Pieces—The Conductor's Proteges—The Plentiful Brood of the Unknown and the Struggling—The Promise of the Whole List

MR. Fiedler, unlike some of his predecessors in the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra, makes well in advance his plans for each new year and, as the outcome proved last winter, adheres surprisingly to them under the varied exigencies of seven months of crowding work. Already he has sent to Boston the list of pieces from which he will shape his programmes for the new season, and it is as complete and diversified as that of last autumn. Conductors come and go; a new generation of listeners now sits in many of the places in Symphony Hall; the musical times change and we change with them; but the policy—and almost the tradition—of the concerts in the range of the music to be played seems now established beyond peradventure. The older classics must have their due place, and Mr. Fiedler announces a suite and two concertos from Bach; Beethoven's second, third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies, and the overtures, "Leonore" (No. 3), to "Egmont," and to "Coriolan"; two concertos out of Händel; a symphony by Haydn; two symphonies—one, the "Jupiter"—of Mozart; Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and his overture to "The Fair Melusina"; Schubert's symphony in C-major; Schumann's in E-flat and in D-minor, with the Overture, Scherzo and Finale to "Manfred"; and finally, the three perennial overtures of Weber. There are overlooked and neglected, as well as hackneyed and overplayed, pieces by these elder composers, and an ambitious conductor is bound each year to make his discoveries among them. Mr. Fiedler's are the Fugue for string orchestra of Beethoven's last years and an Adagio and Fugue of Mozart.

The Younger Classics

After the elder classics, by the range and the precedent of the programmes, come the younger, and from them Mr. Fiedler has picked Berlioz's symphony of "Harold," his overtures, "Carneval" and to "King Lear"; the familiar fragments from his "Damnation of Faust" and the "Love-Scene" and the "Queen Mab" scherzo from his music for "Romeo and Juliet"; Brahm's first and third symphonies, one of his Serenades and his "Academic" overture; Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre" and Omphale's Wheel"; Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" and "Pathetic" symphonies, his overture to "Romeo and Juliet," and his Sunite for strings; and, finally from Wagner, the Venusberg music in "Tannhäuser," the apotheosis of Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung," the Good Friday Spell in "Parisfal," the Siegfried Idyll and the Kaisermarsch. Among the modern classics a dutiful conductor, under the obligation of the concerts, must also make his discoveries, revivals and innovations, and Mr. Fiedler's choice has fallen upon Liszt's "Dante" symphony, seldom heard anywhere and unheard here for twenty years; Franck's romantic tone-poem "The Wild Huntsman," Rimsky Korsakoff's richly Oriental "Antar"—the music of an Arab hero—Tschaikowsky's "symphonic ballad" of "The Voyvode" and his second Sunite, hitherto known here only in fragments. To the Kaisermarsch, moreover, Mr. Fiedler purposes to add the choral close.

The Established Moderns

Next comes the turn of the established composers of our immediate time and they will afford Mr. Fiedler what promise to be his most notable new pieces: Mahler's monumental second symphony for orchestra, chorus and solo voices; two of Debussy's "Images" for orchestra—"Iberia" and "Rondes de Printemps"—Rachmaninoff's symphony in E-minor that the Russian was eager to conduct here last year, and "Macbeth," the only one of Strauss's tone-poems still unheard at the Symphony Concerts. For familiar pieces out of this same group, d'Indy has yielded the glowing "Istar" variations; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," "A Hero's Life" and "Don Quixote," that Mr. Fiedler has already brought to eloquent performance, and the early symphony that now has almost an "historical" interest in the evolution of the composer. From Reger, the conductor has chosen the puissant variations and fugue and the lighter Serenade, last played in Dr. Muck's time; from Debussy the Nocturnes and the Little Suite; from Loeffler, the grimly vivid tone-poem, "The Death of Tintagiles;" from MacDowell, the Indian Suite—both too long unheard in our concerts—and from Sgambati, the Italian who would fain write German-wise, an orchestral Te Deum and the symphony in D-major. A suite and a set of dances by Glazounoff, Reznicek's overture to "Donna Diana" and a fragment of Humperdinck's "Moorish" suite are likewise of this group.

The Proteges

It is the privilege of every conductor to have his chosen composers, of present or past generation, whose music he is eager to make known to his hearers or to bring to fuller and more appreciative understanding. Mr. Fiedler, like Dr. Muck before him, would establish Bruckner in a just esteem, and thus we shall hear his "Romantic" symphony. Mr. Fiedler began his propagation of the curiously knit and warmly imaginative music of Delius with the "Paris" that he led under adverse circumstance last winter. Now, he purposes to go forward with Delius's variations on a Negro folk song, "Appalachia," the rhapsodies "Brigg Fair" and "In a Summer Garden" and a fantasia of glorified dance tunes. The conductor is as eagerly energetic with the grim and melancholy music of Sibelius, and he plans a repetition of the stern second symphony and of "Finlandia" and first performances here of "Karelia," the incidental music to Strindberg's fairy play of "Swan-White," and the tone-poem of "The Swan of Tuonela." The English Bantock is another of these particular admirations and from him come three "dramatic" dances.

The Struggling and the Unknown

For a final category from which a conductor of the Symphony Concerts should make his choice, remains the music of unknown, little known, or youthful and promising composers of the hour. A conductor—and his hearers—should be generous with them. Chaff they often yield, but the grain of individuality and imagination is sometimes in them. Mr. Fiedler's choice of their work is at least wide-ranging; Arensky's variations for string orchestra; Busoni's suite "Turandot"—for the pianist is composer, too; Bossi's "Intermezzi" in the mood of Goldoni's comedies that Dr. Muck tried and that symphony concerts in Germany repeat; two rhapsodies by Enesco, the Roumanian composer who lives and works in Paris; Hadley's rhapsody "after" Drake's poem, "The Culprit Fay" for the share of the younger American composers; an overture, and a concerto for orchestra, piano, and organ by Halm, whose music Mr. Fiedler brought out of obscurity last spring; Liadoff's orchestral sketch "Baba Jaga" for a neo-Russian piece; Mandl's "Overture to a Gascon Comedy"; two scherzi from the huge orchestral and choral piece, "Gloria" of the Belgian composer, Nicodé; a Suite by Noreni, whose pictorial variations went the rounds of orchestral concerts three years ago; a Finnish suite by Palmgren; the curious "Ecstatic Poem" of the Parisianized Russian, Scriabine; and a Serenade, that pleased Chicago last year, by Leo Weiner.

Suggestions and Reflections

So much for enumeration of a long list that even now, with performance weeks and months away, suggests its points of comment. For the most part, Mr. Fiedler's choice of elder classics is duly discreet; but, if Beethoven's Choral Symphony is to be kept an occasional piece, to be performed with more or less pomp and circumstance, it is a mistake to repeat it for a third consecutive year. Symphony orchestras in Germany do so repeat it. Here in Boston, it has been kept out of the repertory for quasi-festival performance. The Choral Symphony is epic; and epics, in music or in verse, lose a little of their might when they become things of custom. Nor need Mr. Fiedler fear that his public will forget the eloquent power of his reading. The conductor loves the highly-colored and impassioned "romantics." His temperament meets theirs half way; and hence perhaps the promised abundance of Berlioz, and the biennial repetition of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and of Weber's three overtures. On the other hand, the excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas are relatively few, because already Mr. Fiedler has once and twice run nearly the full course of them. To these romantic ardors and to the potently imagined performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony last spring, we probably owe the "Dante" symphony that should be the most striking revival of the new year.

Oftenest Mr. Fiedler's choice of newer or wholly novel music speaks warmly for itself. A discriminating and deserving part of the public of the concerts will gladly hear again the variations of d'Indy and Reger and Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, and make acquaintance with Rachmaninoff's symphony. No conductor that the orchestra has known clothes Strauss's music with such graphic power as does Mr. Fiedler. The new "Images" of Debussy, first performed in Paris last spring, were sure to have their place this winter at the Symphony Concerts. Be they of a waxing or a waning Debussy—they so debate them in Paris—the unique position of the composer and the curiosity over all he writes demanded speedy performance of them. For Delius's music, the listener must learn almost a new idiom, and Mr. Fiedler would evidently have the teaching thorough. Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, MacDowell's suite and Mr. Hadley's rhapsody are only just share in the programmes for American composers. Doubtless some of Mr. Fiedler's youngsters and his "unknowns," as the sporting phrase goes, will disappoint; but they who would keep music a living art crave information of them, and nobody but a musical Pecksniff cares for perpetual commerce with masterpieces. One contemporary masterpiece, happily, stands above all else that is new on Mr. Fiedler's list—Mahler's mightily imagined and majestically sustained symphony. He has come back at last to our programmes, and by every sign of the music in itself and of performance elsewhere, to conquer.

H. T. P.

JOURNAL—FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1910.

ANTON WITEK, WHO BECOMES CONCERT MASTER OF SYMPHONY

HAS SUCCEEDED PROF. WILLY HESS

Anton Witek, Symphony's New Concert Master, on Way Here.

Anton Witek, who has succeeded Professor Willy Hess as concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, is expected in Boston in a few days. It is his first visit to this country. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian by birth. He studied under Bennewitz at Prague and in 1894, at the age of 22, was appointed concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, a position which he has held ever since. He has been described as a "serious, solid, thoroughly grounded musician," and not as a virtuoso; yet he has been successful season after season in his tours through northern Europe as a concert soloist.

Mme. Witek is also a well known musician.

The Symphony Orchestra, it is announced, will be larger than ever this season, owing to additions to the woodwind. For the first time the players will number more than 100.

The auction sale of seats for the coming season opens Monday, Sept. 26.

Manager C. A. Ellis has issued the annual booklet, which shows the engagements of the orchestra for the season of 1910-1911. There are one hundred and twelve concerts booked, to which will be added two pension fund concerts and three concerts with the Cecilia Society, making a grand total of one hundred and seventeen concerts, which is the largest number ever given by the orchestra in a season and probably is the largest number of regular symphony concerts ever given by any orchestra in the world with the space of seven months. The first concert of the season is in Northampton on Oct. 5. This has happened but once before—in the second year of the orchestra—when the first out of town concert of the season, in fact the first out of town concert by the orchestra, was given in Newport.

ADVERTISER. SATURDAY SEPTEMBER 17, 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The auction sale of seats for the thirtieth season of Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony hall on Monday, Sept. 26, at 10 a.m., and the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On the following morning at the same hour the $10 seats will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday morning, Sept. 29, at 10 a.m., and on Friday, Sept. 30, at the same hour the $10 seats for the concerts will be sold. The rules of past years will be in force. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Mr. Fiedler has already made his announcement of the works he intends to play, and from this it will be a comparatively easy task for him to give a series of as brilliant programmes as those which have characterized his past two years in Boston.

JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1910.

CONCERT MASTER OF THE SYMPHONY HERE

Anton Witek and Madame Witek Anticipate Pleasurable Stay in Boston.

Anton Witek, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mme. Witek, piano soloist, are in Boston. They are residing at Hemenway Chambers, where they will remain until they find a house which will meet their requirements for a stay of five years or more.

The new violinist and his wife arrived at the Back Bay station on the express from New York at 8.30 last night. They went directly to the Hemenway Chambers, where apartments had been engaged for them.

They had not dined, but before they went into the dining room, they offered this information for the benefit of those interested in their arrival; Mme Witek doing the talking, as her English is nearer perfect than that of her husband:

"It is too soon to offer any opinion on the music of your country, as this is our first visit to America. We are pleased to be here, of course, or we should not have come, but I cannot say how we shall like Boston as yet. I believe we shall; I hope so."

Anton Witek has come to Boston from the Berlin Philharmonic, where he has been concert meister for sixteen years, since he was 22 years old. He studied at the conservatory at Prague, under Benewitz, when that master of the violin was the head of the institution.

In addition to his work as concert master here, he will be heard in many solo numbers, making his debut the latter part of November. He has been heard as a soloist in the capitals of Europe, and has a long and varied repertoire, a part of which he will play with the orchestra, which this season will numbey more than 100 pieces.

While there will be no quartet work in which he will take part, there will be a trio made up of Witek, Mme. Witek, at the piano, and Herr Malkin, 'cellist.

POST, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1910

WITEK TO MAKE HOME IN BOSTON

Anton Witek, who succeeds Willy Hess as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in this city in a few days, and is expected to reach New York from Bremen today.

Mr. Witek, who has been during the summer with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra at Schevininger, Holland, will arrive in Boston with an ample margin of time for undertaking his new duties. As he has been engaged for a term of years, he comes prepared to make Boston his place of residence during that incumbency.

MELBA IN BRILLIANT LIST OF SOLOISTS AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Geraldine Farrar Another Star Who Will Sing Here.

An unusually brilliant list of soloists is announced for the coming winter's series of Symphony concerts under Max Fiedler.

Six remarkable singers have been engaged to head the list. These are Madame Melba, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Miss Emmy Destinn, Madame Jeanne Jomelli, sopranos; Madame Kirkby-Lunn, contralto, and Charles Gilibert, baritone.

Madame Melba, who has not been heard with the orchestra for three years, will make what is positively her only appearance in Boston on this occasion.

She is now engaged on a concert tour through Canada which lasts until the end of October. Then she sings a number of times with the orchestra and finally just before she returns to Europe, in the latter part of December, she will make a limited number of appearances in Chicago with the new Chicago Opera Company and in New York with the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The mere announcement that Miss Farrar has been engaged as soloist is sufficient to bring joy to the souls of her thousands of friends in Boston. Since she was here last year she has increased her fame by a series of performances of "Tosca" at the Opera Comique in Paris and by her performance of Zerlina in Mozart's "Don Giovanni" at the Mozart Festival in Salzburg this last summer.

Emmy Destinn, who shares with her the lyrico-dramatic roles of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has sung with the orchestra but once—two years ago—when she made a profound impression. She is to create the leading role in Puccini's new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," this winter.

Mme. Jeanne Jomelli will make her first appearance here with the orchestra, but her appearanecs in Boston have made for her many admirers. Mme. Kirkby-Lunn is one of the greatest living contraltos, and is well known in Boston, although it is some years since he has sung here with the orchestra. As for Mr. Gilibert, he has a public of his own here, and his exquisite art never fails to create the greatest enthusiasm.

The pianists will be Josef Hofmann, Ferruccio Busoni and Carlo Buonamici. Hofmann has not played in Boston for a number of years. Next to Paderewski he commands today the greatest audiences in Europe and in America.

Busoni will be agreeably remembered for his superb performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto at the Symphony last season. Mr. Buonamici one of the most admired of our local pianists.

The auction sales will be governed by the same rules that have been in force in past years. Monday, Sept. 26, the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold and the $10 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 27. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 29, and the $10 seats on Friday, Sept. 30.

The sales will be held as usual in Symphony Hall and all of them will begin promptly at 10 o'clock. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

One Violinist American.

The two visiting violinists will be Mischa Elman and Francis McMillan. Elman today is unquestionably the most popular violinist in the world. Mr. McMillan is an American, and will make his first appearance with the orchestra. He gave a concert here two years ago, when he made a most favorable impression.

From the ranks of the orchestra will come Anton Witek, the new concert-master. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian, 38 years old, who for the past 61 years has held the post of concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra. He comes to America with an enviable reputation, and unquestionably will uphold the traditions created by his distinguished predecessors at the first desk of the violins.

But three weeks remain before the opening of the 30th season of Symphony concerts and a week from Monday the annual auction sales begin. The season calls for the usual 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings, the series being broken six times by the trips of the orchestra, five of which take it to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn and one to the Middle West.

News of Music

TO scrutinize the announcements of the Symphony Orchestra for the new season is to notice with some amusement a change in the designation of the men that compose it. The band used to consist of ninety-eight "performers"; now it contains one hundred "musicians." Thus are the virtuosi of the orchestra freed by official title from the term that oftener designates the entertainers of a vaudeville theatre or the acrobats and the equestrians of a circus. They deserved such liberation and though they are hardly purists or connoisseurs in the language of announcements, the new nomenclature will please them. But what, what is to become of the ancient and honorable "wheeze" in descriptions of audiences at local concerts: "Many musicians and a few members of the Symphony Orchestra were present."

Mr. Witek, the new concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, who arrived in Boston yesterday to begin his work, purposes to form a Trio, as he did in Berlin, to perform pieces for pianoforte, violin and violoncello. He himself will be the violinist, his wife the pianist; and Mr. Malkin of the orchestra, the violoncellist. Since the Adamowski Trio ceased to give concerts here, there has been no such "concert party," as the English say, in Boston, while the dissolution of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet, because of the departure of Mr. Hess, has left room for a new venture like Mr. Witek's.

THE SYMPHONY "SOLOISTS"

The Singers, the Pianists, the Violinists and the Violoncellists Who Are to Appear at the Concerts This Season—The High Quality of the List—A Few Changes in the Orchestra Itself

SIX singers, three pianists, four violinists and two violoncellists make the list of fifteen "soloists" who are to appear at the Symphony Concerts between next October and next May. Precedent has now become established policy, and, as in the past four years, the "assisting artists" have been chosen from singers of high operatic ranks, from virtuosi of established international reputation or, in one case, of well-grounded local standing, and from the leaders of the choirs of the orchestra itself. Thus, for singers, Covent Garden yields Mme. Melba and Mme. Kirkby-Lunn; the Metropolitan, Miss Farrar and Miss Destinn; the Manhattan, as it used to be, Mr. Gilibert; and, by exception, the concert-room in general, Mme. Jomelli. The pianists of international note are Mr. Hoffmann and Mr. Busoni, with Mr. Buonamici, who is not less a virtuoso of high technical skill, quick feeling, and imaginative temperament because he happens to live and work in Boston. The violinists are Mischa Elman for established place; Mr. Macmillen for rising attainment; and Mr. Witek, the new concert-master, and Mr. Noack for the deserving virtuosi of the orchestra itself. From it, too, come the violoncellists—the veteran Schroeder, who has returned to his old place, and the younger Warnke. So much for the list, and to-it in time, if Mr. Fiedler undertakes Mahler's second symphony and Beethoven's Choral Symphony, will be added the singers that both pieces require.

Of the "women singers," as the old advertisements used to say, Mme. Melba, who has returned to America for a short concert tour and a few appearances with the Metropolitan and the Chicago opera companies, will sing in Boston only at a pair of Symphony Concerts. And Mme. Melba's voice is now in a golden prime that cannot endure indefinitely, while she herself grows more inclined to forget Europe and America for the Australia she would school in opera. Miss Farrar, again, will make no concert tour this season, and she will come to the Symphony Concerts in November when her sensitive voice is unfatigued by the exacting work of the Metropolitan. It, too, has set Miss Destinn free, as it could not or it would not do last year, to sing with the orchestra, and the delicate clarinet quality in the shadings of her tones and the intelligence and the finesse of her singing invite the concert-room, as her voice now is, quite as much as they do the opera house. When Mme. Kirkby-Lunn came first to America, she was a richly sonorous contralto voice and little else. Now, by years of work at Covent Garden and in the concert-room she has made herself a singer also of warm feeling and discriminating intelligence. In recent years, the list of "soloists" for the Symphony Concerts has been curiously deficient in "men singers." Few of the tenors and the baritones of the opera houses meet the different and, in some respects, more exacting conditions of concerts; and the few that do have been unavailable. Next winter, fortunately, Mr. Gilibert will be free to bring his mastery of adroit and expressive diction again to the concert-room where it most shines. If the Symphony Orchestra oftenest draws its singers from the opera houses, it is because few concert singers meet its standards. This year, it has found one such, Mme. Jomelli, already known to the public of oratorio and of the casual concert, of worth.

Comparatively few of the international pianists and the international violinists will visit America this season. Some of those that came over sea last winter did not fare well, and plentiful reaction after excessive action is the way of our musical world. Mr. Busoni, whom America rediscovered last year, will make amends for long absence by speedy return, and a pair of Symphony Concerts is, of course, reserved for him. Another pair will bring back a pianist who has mistrusted his public in Boston so mistakenly that he has not appeared since the years ripened him into a pianist of feeling and imagination as well as of high technique—Josef Hofmann, no longer cool, but now impassioned. A third pair will pay to Mr. Buonamici the compliment that he has deserved since with new powers of understanding, sympathy and execution, he returned to public appearances last autumn.

The wandering violinists are as cautious as the pianists, and only two of them will make the American venture this season—Mr. Elman, already one of the three or four living violinists of the first rank, and to most of us of singular personal appeal; and Mr. Macmillen, who is now ready to win the heartier approval of a public that liked his beginnings. The orchestra, however, can easily replace the doubting virtuosi who hesitate to cross the sea, and Mr. Witek, by right of his post as concert master and by the capacities that have given him it, will play a concerto. So, too, will Mr. Noack, of the very pure and very finely shaded tone with which he surprised his hearers last winter. The violoncellists, too, will come from the orchestra, and at the first pair of concerts Mr. Schroeder will celebrate his return by the playing of a concerto, while later in the winter Mr. Warnke will have his turn.

The coming of Mr. Witek and the return of Mr. Schroeder make the two notable changes in the personnel of the orchestra itself. Besides, a new leader will succeed Mr. Keller in the double basses, and a new viola player, a new second violinist, and two players upon the instruments of percussion will replace other departed members of the band. Mr. Fiedler has further decided to raise the number of the bassoons from four to five, and of the trombones from three to four. Thus, the orchestra will stand at one hundred players.

Dividing Line Between Light and Grand Opera

Said to be defined often in America by price paid for seats. Distinction, although fine, definite when analyzed.

JOSEF HOFMANN.
(Copyright by Gessford, New York.)
A boy prodigy in Boston in the eighties; appears at one of the Symphony concerts.

MME. MELBA.
Most renowned of the Symphony soloists; she is organizing an opera company for Australia.

FRANCIS MACMILLEN.
American violinist who has won a name in Europe; makes first return appearance in Boston.

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a vast amount of work planned for the coming season. Manager C. A. Ellis has issued the booklet which shows the engagements of the orchestra. There are to be given 112 regular symphony concerts and in addition to these there will be two concerts for the benefit of the pension fund and three in connection with the Cecelia society. This is the largest number of concerts the orchestra has ever undertaken. The schedule calls for the usual 24 rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, 10 concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Providence, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, four in New Bedford, three each in Worcester and Hartford and one each in Northampton, Brockton, New Haven, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Syracuse, Albany and Waterbury, Conn.

The Boston season begins Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, and ends Saturday evening, April 29.

The auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts will be governed by the same rules that have been in force in past years. Monday, Sept. 26, the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold and the $10 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 27. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 29 and the $10 seats on Friday, Sept. 30. The sales will be held as usual in Symphony hall and all of them will begin promptly at 10 o'clock. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold.

Mr. Fiedler has already announced the works he intends to perform. His soloists will be Mme. Melba, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Miss Emmy Destinn, Madame Jeanne Jomelli, sopranos; Madame Kirkby-Lunn, contralto; and Charles Gilibert, baritone. Madame Melba, who has not been heard with the orchestra for three years, will make her only appearance in Boston on the occasion when she sings with the orchestra. She is now engaged on a concert tour through Canada which lasts until the end of October. Then she sings a number of times with the orchestra and finally, just before she returns to Europe, in the latter part of December, she will make a limited number of appearances in Chicago with the new Chicago Opera Company and in New York with the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The pianists will be Josef Hofmann, Ferruccio Busoni and Carlo Buonamici.

The violinists will be Mischa Elman and Francis MacMillen.

From the ranks of the orchestra will come Anton Witek, the new concert-master. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian, who for the past 16 years has held the post of concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra. He comes to America with a high reputation as an artist, and unquestionably will uphold the traditions created by his distinguished predecessors at the first desk of the violins. Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master, is also announced as soloist.

Other soloists announced are Alwin Schroeder, who after an absence of seven years returns to the orchestra to share the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Warnke, and Mr. Warnke himself.

Changes other than those indicated in the orchestra are few, but the engagement of an extra bassoon and an extra trombone brings the number of musicians to 100.

In addition to these new members of the wind choirs, there will be a new leader of the double bass section, a new viola, two new members in the percussion department and a new second violin.

Pietro Mascagni, who has been at Castellarquato, near Piacenza, putting the finishing touches to his new opera, "Ysobel," has returned to Rome. He has cabled Liebler & Co. that the work he has been composing for them is completed, and he expects to begin rehearsals on Oct. 1 with Miss Bessie Abott and the artists who have been engaged to support her.

The company engaged by Liebler & Co. for "Ysobel" has been selected by Signor Mascagni, and includes some of the best known singers in Italy.

BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1910.

CONCERT-MASTER'S "SAMPLES."

All is not harmony within the breast of the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He already has been taught the difference between the Bismarckian brand of "protection" and the American. Super-explicit in his "declaration" of the contents of his twenty pieces of luggage, he underwent a five-hour grilling by Commissioner Loeb's sleuths, which had made him both a wiser and sadder man. It seems to have been thought that he was coming to act as a promoter of German export trade and hence laden with samples. His real errand was to charm the Boston ear, and incidentally have about him in his new home some furnishings that would remind him of kin beyond the sea. But the Loeb Philistinism was not appreciative.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1910.

(Copyright, 1909, by A. Dupont.)
MISS EMMY DESTINN.
Famous creator of soprano roles, who will appear in Boston opera and Symphony concerts.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1910.

Great List of Soloists To Thrill at Symphony

Soloists who are to ap pear here this season.

THE list of soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season reads like the roster of the world's greatest opera company. They include Nellie Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Emmy Destinn, Jeanne Jomelli, sopranos, Kirby-Lunn, contralto, and Charles Gilibert, baritone. Most of these will appear during the season with the Boston Opera Company, but there is all the difference in the world between concert singing and opera, and the most famous star of all, Nellie Melba, will be heard only with the orchestra in Boston this season. The pianists will be Josef Hofmann, Ferruccio Busoni and Carlo Buonamici; violinists, Mischa Elman and Francis McMillan, and there will be other distinguished soloists.

Jomelli's Appearance.

Jeanne Jomelli will make her first appearance here with the orchestra, and it is some years since Mme. Kirby-Lunn has sung here with the Boston Symphony. Gilibert is immensely popular in Boston, where his admirable diction and delightful mannerisms make him a favorite.

Mischa Elman and Francis McMillan will be the two visiting violinists of the season. It is the first appearance of McMillan with the orchestra. He is still very young and since his concert here two years ago should have advanced greatly in his art.

Anton Witek, the new concert-master, who, for the past sixteen years was concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, will be heard in solos during the year, as will Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master. Alwin Schroeder and Warnke will be heard in compositions for the cello and orchestra. . . .

The auction sale of seats for the tieth season of Symphony concerts wil gin at Symphony Hall on Monday, 26, at 10 o'clock, and the $18 seats the rehearsals will be sold. On the lowing morning at the same hour the seats will be auctioned. The $18 seats the concerts will go on sale Thur morning, September 29, at ten, and on day, September 30, the $10 seats wil sold. The rules of previous years wil in force. The tickets will be delivere the hall and must be paid for as soo bought or they will immediately be re

THE SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, SEPT. 18, 1910.

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS OF THE 1910-1911 SEASON

MME. JEANNE JORNELLI

EMMY DESTINN

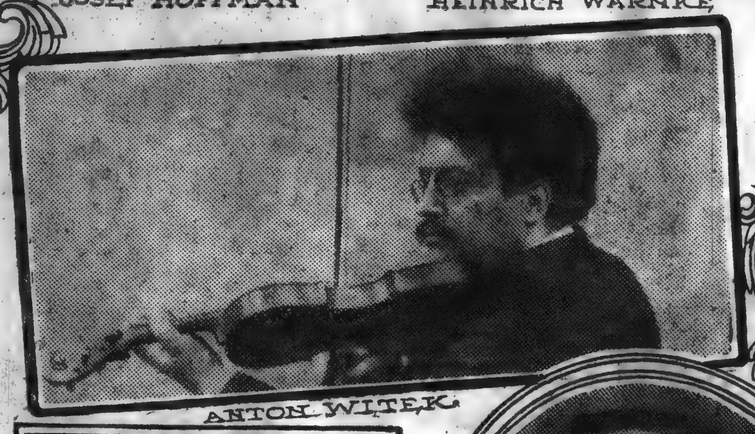
MELBA

GERALDINE FARRAR

JOSEF HOFFMAN

HEINRICH WARNKE

FRANCIS MACMILLEN



ANTON WITEK

MME. KIRKBY-LUNN

FERRUCCIO BUSONI

CHARLES GILIBERT

MISCHA ELMAN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS NEW SOLOISTS

Season's Indications Point to Increased Subscriptions and Great Success.

The 30th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Monday morning, Sept. 26, when the auction sales of seats will open at Symphony Hall. There is every indication that the season of 1910-1911 will, at least, be as good as 1909-1910 and there is no reason to fear that it will not show an improvement. Certainly the season of 1910-1911 for the Orchestra outside of Boston will be even more successful than a year ago for everywhere indications point to an increased subscription.

Neither Mr. Fiedler nor the management has spared pains or money to make the 24 programs as attractive as possible. The list of works published a week ago, will enable the conductor to build programs that should arouse keen interest. The management has provided a list of soloists more brilliant even than that of last year. Especially is this true in the matter of singers. Musicians who excel in instrumental music will be scarce in America this year. Last year the season was generally disastrous for wandering virtuosi. Neither Josef Hofmann nor Mischa Elman would have considered an American tour this winter had not each of them been assured of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The retirement of Willy Hess brings to America for the first time Anton Witek of Berlin. Much is expected of him. Only 38 years old for 16 years he has been the concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra. He has made a name for himself on the continent and in England as a solo violinist. Mr. Witek was born in Saaz, in Bohemia, on Jan. 7, 1872, and was a pupil in the Prague Conservatory.

Alwin Schroeder, after an absence of seven years, will share the first desk of the 'cello section with Mr. Warnke and will divide with him the solo work.

The engagement of two additional musicians will bring the membership of the orchestra for the first time to 100. A new first trombone will share the work with Mr. Hampe. Another bassoon player, a nephew of Mr. Sadony, has been engaged as "utility" man, so there will now be five bassoons. A new leader of the double bass has been engaged, a new viola and a new second violin, while the retirement of Emanuel Fiedler from the first violins promotes from the second violins Herman Goldstein.

The orchestra, or at least the major part of it, will assemble for the first time in the last week of this month for the Worcester festival. The first rehearsal of the year is called for Monday, Oct. 3.

The auction sales of tickets will follow the established custom of the past year. On Monday, Sept. 26, at 10 o'clock, the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold; on Tuesday, Sept. 27, the $10 seats will be sold; on Thursday, Sept. 29, the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold; on Friday, the 30th, the $10 seats for the concerts will be sold. The rules of past years will be in force. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the [illegible] must be Particularly brilliant is the list of singers: Mme. Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Emmy Destinn, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, sopranos; Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, contralto, and Charles Gilibert, baritone. It will be three years since Mme. Melba has been heard in Boston, and her appearance this year with the orchestra in Symphony Hall will be positively the only chance to hear her in this city. She arrived in this country in August, and is now engaged in a concert tour in Canada. In the latter part of October she will fulfil engagements with the orchestra. She will then appear with the Chicago opera company in Chicago and with the Metropolitan opera company in New York, and sailing for England about the first of 1911. Mme. Melba has been spending much of the last two or three years in Australia, where she has very large interests. She is arranging to take thither a year from this fall a grand opera company. Her appearance here with the orchestra is likely to be the only chance Boston will have to hear for several years the most beautiful female voice in the world.

Since Miss Farrar and Miss Destinn were last here they have won fresh laurels. At the season of the Metropolitan Opera Company in Paris last spring, Miss Destinn was the principal woman singer at the opening performance and Paris again gave unqualified approval of her art. Additional interest is attached to her appearance here for she will create the principal woman's part in Puccini's new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West." Miss Farrar is so secure in the affections of the Boston musical public that the reannouncement of her coming insures a full house. In the past summer Miss Farrar won great praise in Paris as Tosca at the Opera Comique and at the Mozart Festival at Salzburg last August, when she sang Zerlina in "Don Giovanni."

Mme. Jomelli, a sterling singer has never sung here with the orchestra, although her appearances with the Handel and Haydn and at other concerts have won for her many friends. Mme. Kirkby-Lunn likewise is well known and well liked here. Mr. Gilibert is always welcome.

Josef Hofmann has not been in Boston for a number of years. Today he is one of the two or three really great pianists of the world. Ferruccio Busoni was here last year, both with the orchestra and in recital, and his performance with the orchestra of the "Emperor" Concerto were features of the season; Carlo Buonamici, well known as a resident of this city, is an admired pianist and easily able to take a commanding position. Recognition of Boston talent by the management of the orchestra is always grateful to the public.

Mr. Elman enjoys a greater popularity in America than any violinist now actively before the public. Francis McMillan, an American, will make his first appearance with the orchestra. He has had genuine success in Europe, and he won applause here in his own concert. There will be much interest in Anton Witek, the orchestra's new concert master. Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, made a very favorable impression last winter. Messrs. Schroeder and Warnke, 'cellists, have scores of admirers in this city.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1910

A correspondent writes to this department rejoicing that in Mr. Gilibert, a man's voice is at last to be heard among the "soloists" this season at the Symphony Concerts. He is not content, however, with one, and he has read that Mr. Clément, the justly distinguished tenor of the Opéra-Comique, who sang last winter at the Metropolitan, will return to America to appear in concerts. Now Mr. Clément is less the singing-actor of music-drama than a singer for singing's sake with a voice that has charm rather than power, and with a diction and artistry that are exquisite to hear. In a word, his are the qualities that shine quite as much in the concert-room as in the opera house. By these titles our correspondent believes, Mr. Clément should have a place at the Symphony Concerts.

ADVERTISER, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1910

HAD LONG SESSION WITH CUSTOMS OFFICERS

Concert Master Witek Had Been Told to Declare Everything and Result Was 5 Hours' Work.

Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the Symphony orchestra, who with Mrs. Witek has arrived in Boston, will not soon forget his experience with the U. S. customs. He was off the ship Kronprinz Wilhelm at New York Tuesday morning shortly after 8 p.m. and he finally got away from the pier at 1 p.m., long after all the rest of the passengers had departed.

It seems that Mr. Witek, who has come here to live, had brought with him many things that he will use in his house here, although his furniture and the like has been sent direct to Boston.

Before he left Germany he went to the American consulate in Berlin for instructions as to his declarations and they impressed upon him the need of declaring every single article at its full value, assuring him at the same time that as he was coming to America for the first time to reside here he would not have any duties to pay.

He followed his instructions to the letter and Mr. Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra, who went over to meet him, says that never in his life has he seen the look of dismay come over the face of a man as that which came on the face of the custom inspector when he saw this tremendous declaration.

Because everything had been declared it was necessary that all of the 20 pieces of luggage that Mr. and Mrs. Witek had should be examined thoroughly. By 1 p.m. everybody was completely tired out and there were still some formalities to be gone through about Mr. Witek's violins and a trunk, so it was decided to ship these on in bond to Boston and finish the examination here.

Neither Mr. Witek nor Mr. Sauerquell have any criticism to make on the courtesy of the inspectors at the pier in Hoboken but they say that a more thorough examination could not be made anywhere.

Mr. and Mrs. Witek are temporarily at the Hemenway chambers.

HERALD, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1910.

MADE HONEST DECLARATION

Anton Witek Has Trying Experience with United States Customs.

Anton Witek, the new concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, who, with Mrs. Witek, arrived in Boston Tuesday evening, will not soon forget his experience with the United States customs. He was off the ship Kronprinz Wilhelm Tuesday morning shortly after 8 o'clock, and he finally got away from the pier at 1 o'clock.

It seems that Mr. Witek, who has come here to live, had brought with him many things, and before he left Germany he went to the American consulate in Berlin for instructions as to his declarations and they assured him that as he was coming to America for the first time to reside here, he would not have any duties to pay.

He followed his instructions to the letter and because everything had been declared it was necessary that all of the 20 pieces of luggage that Mr. and Mrs. Witek had, should be examined thoroughly. By 1 o'clock everybody was completely tired out, and there were still some formalities to be gone through about Mr. Witek's violins and a trunk, so it was decided to ship these on in bond to Boston and finish the examination here.

Mr. and Mrs. Witek are temporarily at the Hemenway Chambers.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1910

UNDOUBTEDLY Mr. Anton Witek's arrival in America this year and his peculiar procedure on arrival have been the objects of interest and even of smiles from hundreds and thousands of Boston people, including many who will never again pay any attention to Mr. Witek's doings or listen to his music. For Herr Witek, bewildered by the many conflicting tales as to the proper way to get his lares et penates upon American soil, took counsel of the American embassy in Germany and followed literally the advice he received there, stoically "declaring" everything he had brought with him up to the last flatiron, for Mr. Witek brought along his household goods. Imagine the labor of such a declaration and the sheets of paper covered! No wonder it required five hours to finish the customs inspection, and weary must have been Herr Witek and the inspectors and appraisers. Disgusted, too, no doubt was the Symphony concert master with the awful law, and the customs people with the entrant's unprecedented obedience to the provisions of the law. Few Americans bother to list the things they bring home from a summer's tour. Even the most conscientious do no more than "lump" them into a dozen or so convenient classes. The great majority make very vague declarations, and some convert these formal declaration papers into more or less personal epistles to the collector, who, hapless man, never sees them. This year, of course, has seen much greater agitation among returning Americans than ever before. Wherever one went about the ship on the last days of a voyage he found men and women engaged in seriously studying two documents — the circular issued by the customs department and the declaration blank which they must fill out and sign.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Soloists of Coming Symphony Season.

In List Are Grand Opera Singers and Instrumentalists of Fame.

"Bohemian Girl" Revival at Boston Opera House.

Manager Charles A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony orchestra has announced his soloists for the coming season. The singers are Mme Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Emmy Destinn, Mme Jomelli, sopranos; Mme Kirkby-Lunn, contralto, and Charles Gilibert, baritone. The pianists are Josef Hofmann, Carlo Buonamici and Busoni; the violinists, Elman, Francis McMillan, concert master Witek and assistant concert master Noack. Alwin Schroeder, who returns to share the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr Warnke, will be heard in solo, as will also Mr Warnke. In all six singers, three pianists, four violinists and two 'cellists.

Boston has heard Mme Melba but little during recent years. Her last appearance here was Jan 26, 1907. It is said that she will take an opera company to Australia a year from this fall, and will perhaps not return to America in the next two seasons. The management adds that Mme Melba's appearances with the orchestra will be her only public performances in Boston this year.

Miss Farrar has made her day of singing with this orchestra a time of gladness, when observers of modes and millinery, as well as lovers of song, hasten to Symphony hall.

At her debut here with the Boston orchestra last season, Miss Destinn at once established herself as a concert singer of distinction. Mme Jomelli has not sung before at these concerts, but is known to Boston through appearances with the Handel and Haydn society and with Mme Liza Lehmann.

Mme Kirkby-Lunn has not been heard with the Symphony orchestra since Jan 3, 1903. The finished art of Mr Gilibert is familiar here through his participation in concerts and Mr Hammerstein's performances of opera.

Of the pianists, Mr Buonamici, the only artist from Boston, outside the orchestra, is again justly chosen as soloist. Josef Hofmann has not been heard in several seasons. Mr Busoni went up and down among us last year.

Of the four violinists to be heard in solo performances, Francis McMillan, the American, will play with the orchestra for the first time, as will Anton Witek, the new concert master.

Mischa Elman, released from his period of service in the Russian army, will return. Mr Noack, the second concert master, will again be heard.

During the season there will be in Boston the usual 24 public rehearsals, and the 24 Saturday evening concerts. The first of these will occur Oct 7 and 8, respectively, and the last, April 29 and 30.

The orchestra will give a total of 117 concerts. It will make the usual five trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, and at the end of January will make the usual western trip, giving concerts in Pittsburg, Toledo, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Syracuse and Albany.

A few changes have been made in the personnel. For the first time 100 men will be engaged throughout the season.

The departure of Willy Hess and the succession of Mr Witek is the prinicpal change. The new concert master has occupied the same chair in the Berlin Philharmonic for the last 16 years. He is a graduate of the Prague conservatory and is 38 years old.

Alwin Schroeder, whose absence has been felt in the interim since his former membership in the orchestra, returns to share the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr Warnke. Both will be heard in solo performances.

Herman Goldstein is promoted from the second violins to the firsts to fill the vacancy left by Emanuel Fiedler's retirement. There will be a new second violin, a new viola, a new principal of the double basses, a new trombone, a new bassoon and two new men in the percussion.

As usual, a part of the orchestra will play for the Worcester festival the last week of this month. The first regular rehearsal will occur Monday, Oct 3.

The annual auction sale of seats will occur Monday and Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week. The seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be sold upon the first two days, the $18 seats on Monday (beginning at 10) and the $10 seats on Tuesday.

The $18 Saturday evening concert seats will be sold on Thursday and the $10 concert seats on Friday.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD AT THIS SEASON'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

TRANSCRIPT—WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1910

CONTRARY to expectation, Mr. Fiedler did not arrive in New York yesterday to resume his work with the Symphony Orchestra. At the last moment he was able to change his ship—fortunate man!—and he departed from Hamburg only last Sunday aboard the Deutschland. She should land him in New York next Saturday, barely forty-eight hours before the first rehearsal of the orchestra for the new year.

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1910.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEAT SALE TODAY

The sale of $18 Symphony seats will begin at Symphony Hall today at 10 o'clock. The management reports that the sale of seats for the rehearsals was very satisfactory. The prices brought by the concert seats are always very much lower than those brought by rehearsal seats.

Tomorrow, at the same hour, the remaining seats in the hall, on which the upset price is $10, will be sold.

MONITOR
SEPTEMBER 29, 1910

SELLS THOUSAND ODD TICKETS FOR SYMPHONY DATES

Today the auctioneer disposed of a thousand odd seats at the third day's sale of tickets for the Symphony Hall orchestra concerts.

The series sold today were the $18 Saturday evening concerts. The proceeds exceeded $30,000. Prices paid were well above the average, the highest figure reaching $52 exclusive of the upset price, and the lowest $4.50. The competition was vigorous and generous, and enabled Mr. Jackson to sell quickly.

Friday the $10 tickets for the same concerts will be sold, beginning at 10 a. m.

ADVERTISER, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS TO BE SOLD TODAY

The sale of $18 seats for the 24 Symphony concerts of the season of 1910-1911 will begin at Symphony Hall at 10 a.m. As in the case of $18 seats for the rehearsals, the seats to be sold on the floor include row JJ and the whole of the first balcony except the last five rows in the center.

The management reports that the sale of seats for the rehearsals was very satisfactory, showing a normal and healthy increase in the prices. The prices brought by concert seats are always very much lower than those brought by rehearsal seats, and unquestionably many very good bargains can be picked up today.

Tomorrow at the same hour the remaining seats in the hall on which the upset price is $10 will be sold. These seats comprise the last nine rows of seats on the floor under the balcony; the last five rows of seats in the first balcony and the entire second balcony.

POST, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1910

HIGHEST PRICE PAID WAS $32

Bids for Symphony Tickets for Friday Rehearsals

The bidding yesterday morning at Symphony Hall, when the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon Symphony rehearsals were sold, was on the average of about as strong as last season. On Monday the ticket agents were out in force. Yesterday, by contrast, the buyers consisted almost entirely of individuals, many of them professionals, who had evidently brought a certain amount of money, and no more, to spend. Hence the prices were from the beginning on a very even scale, from the beginning of the sale.

The highest price paid was $32 for the centre of the first row in the first balcony. The highest price last year, at this sale was $26. Two seats on the floor went as low as $8.50, though the average of the last row there was $10.

The seats bordering on the two middle aisles invariably fetched from $2 to $5 more than the seats between, but these were almost the only marked variations in the price. Three aisle seats toward the back on the floor, which sold at $30 each, were exceptions to this. The bids became gradually lower as the rows on the chart receded; as it was, however, there was not the expected falling off at the last which some perhaps expected. Then those who could pay more than the established premiums asserted themselves. A seat in the last row sold for $16, while the last seat was $11.50. Some people who had sat out the auction went home seatless.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1910.

REALIZE $150,000 BY AUCTIONS OF SYMPHONY SEATS

The four days' sale of seats for the Symphony hall orchestra concerts, which concluded today with the disposal of the $10 Saturday evening tickets, realized nearly $150,000.

Altogether 1000 seats were sold today, the bidding starting at 10 a. m. The highest price paid was $16 and the lowest $4. The competition for these seats was slow at first, but improved considerably toward the end of the auction.

The list of artistes for the series is an attractive one, and includes Mme. Melba, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mischa Elman and Emmy Destinn.

JOURNAL—FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1910.

MORE THAN $30,000 IN SYMPHONY SALE

More than $30,000 worth of seats for the Saturday night Symphony concerts were sold at auction yesterday at Symphony Hall. The upset price of these tickets was $18, and the highest premium above this which was reached was $52 and the lowest premium the auctioneer got was $4.50. This morning the $10 tickets for the same series of concerts will be sold at auction.

[9]

GLOBE—FRIDAY.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1910.

PREMIUM RECORD $52.

Best Price Brought at Yesterday's Auction of Saturday Night Symphony Seats Was $70.

The record price of a seat for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts at yesterday's auction sale was $70, of which $52 constituted the premium. The purchaser paid a premium of $46 on the adjoining seat, bought afterward. The seats were in row M.

The seats in the front rows opened at prices lower than usual in recent years, but the best premiums in front rows were about the same as usual. The premiums obtained yesterday will average about the same as those of last year.

EMMY DESTINN
COPYRIGHT-1909-A DUPONT.

JOSEF HOFMANN
COPYRIGHT BY GRUPFORD

GERALDINE FARRAR

MELBA

ANTON WITEK
CONCERTMASTER

FRANCIS MACMILLEN

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

The Soloists Selected—Famous Singers, Instrumentalists, Known and Unknown in This City, Soon to Appear

The first public rehearsal and the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, season 1910-'11, will take place on Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, at 2:30 o'clock, and Saturday evening, Oct. 8, at 8 o'clock. These concerts will inaugurate the last season of the third decade of the orchestra's existence, which there is every reason to believe will prove one of the most brilliant in its history. The orchestra will profit by the engagement of two extra players, another bassoon and another trombone, and some changes in other departments. It is now the largest orchestra in which the players contract for exclusive services in the world.

The programmes for the first concerts of the season have been mailed by Mr. Fiedler to Mr. Ellis, and they will be published as soon as received. As usual, there has been careful selection of soloists for the season, and the list is particularly strong in singers.

Nellie Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Emmy Destinn, Jeanne Jomelli, sopranos; Mme. Kirby-Lunn, contralto, and Charles Gilibert, baritone, will appear. Mme. Melba, who has not sung with the orchestra since three years past, will make "positively her only appearance" in Boston this season at Symphony Hall. She is now engaged on a concert tour through Canada, until the end of October. She will sing a number of times with the Boston orchestra, and finally, just before her departure for Europe, will make a limited number of appearances in Chicago with the Chicago Opera Company and in New York with the Metropolitan Opera Company. Next fall Mme. Melba plans to take a grand opera company to Australia. It is probable that she will not be heard again in this country until the season of 1912-13.

The Singers

Miss Farrar, since her first appearance in this city in the spring of 1907 with the Metropolitan Opera Company, has gained in increasingly large and appreciative following in her native city. This has been justified by Miss Farrar's artistic development. Few singers have been so warmly praised in Germany as she for her Zerlina in Mozart's "Don Giovanni" at the Mozart Festival in Salzburg last summer.

Last season it was impossible to secure Miss Destinn as a soloist, for her duties at the Metropolitan did not permit of a concert appearance in Boston. Miss Destinn's return this season will be eagerly anticipated, for the deep impression which she made at a Symphony concert two years ago is well remembered. It is of interest that she will create this winter the principal role in Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West."

Mme. Jomelli will sing for the first time with the Symphony Orchestra. She has gained many followers in Boston. Mme. Kirby-Lunn, whose Fricka was one of the features of the Metropolitan visit to this city in 1908, will appear with the orchestra after an absence of some years. The art of Mr. Gilibert is familiar here, and much admired.

Other Soloists

The pianists will be Josef Hoffman, Ferrucio Busoni and Carlo Buonamici. Hoffman has not played in Boston for some years. He is one of the few who have out-lived and made good the promise of a glorious youth. Mr. Busoni becomes more transcendental with the passing of the years. Mr. Buonamici, one of the most admired of resident pianists, has not appeared with the orchestra for some seasons, and his return will be especially welcomed.

The violinists, besides Mr. Witek, the new concertmeister, and Mr. Noack, second concertmeister, will be Francis MacMillen, the American, who plays with the orchestra for the first time, and Mischa Elman, undoubtedly, at present, the most popular violinist in the public eye. Mr. Elman, too, is one who has put to flight sombre predictions of the fall of the youthful prodigy.

Mr. Witek is a Bohemian, 38 years of age, who for the past 16 years has held the position of concertmeister of the Berlin Philharmonic. He comes to America with an enviable reputation as an artist, and it is expected that he will honorably uphold the high traditions established by distinguished predecessors. Mr. Noack's appointment is strongly indorsed by his solo performance last winter.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, will return after an absence of seven years from the orchestra, to share the first 'cello desk with Mr. Warnke. Both of these players will be soloists, Mr. Schroeder making the first appearances of the season on the 7th and 8th of next month.

The changes in the orchestra, other than those already mentioned, are few. There will be a new leader of the double basses, a new viola, a new second violin.

Sale of Seats

The auction sale of seats for the 13th season will begin at Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Sept. 26, at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On the following morning at the same hour the $10 seats will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday morning, Sept. 29, at 10 o'clock, and on Friday, Sept. 30, at the same hour, the $10 seats for the concerts will be sold. The rules of past years will be in force. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY

SEPTEMBER 24, 1910

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT DEVOTED TO SCHUMANN

The auction sales of seats for the Symphony concerts will occupy the greater part of next week at Symphony hall. On Monday at 10 a.m. the $18 seats for the rehearsals are placed on sale and on Tuesday, the $10 seats. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold and on Friday the $10 seats. Interest in the concerts and the soloists seems this year to be even unusually keen and the management expects the sale to be at least as good as that of last year.

Manager Ellis has received from Mr. Fiedler the first five programmes which will be played before the orchestra departs on its November trip to the South. During the past summer Europe and principally Germany has been full of commemorations of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Schumann and Mr. Fiedler at his first concert duly celebrates this anniversary. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder. At the second concert Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor will be played and at the third Scriabine's symphony which he calls "Le Poeme de l-extase." The soloist at the second concert will be Francis MacMillan, and at the third concert the soloist will be Gilibert, while Miss Geraldine Farrar will make her only appearance with the orchestra at the fifth concert.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,

BOSTON, MASS., TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1910.

SYMPHONY CONCERTMASTER DUE IN BOSTON IN A FEW DAYS

(Photo by Chickering.)

ANTON WITEK, NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTMASTER.

Successor of Willy Hess in musical organization that has become famous in this country and in Europe for its excellent performances.

ANTON WITEK, who succeeds Willy Hess as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will arrive in this city in a few days, and is expected to reach New York from Bremen today. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian and has been successful season after season in tours through northern Europe.

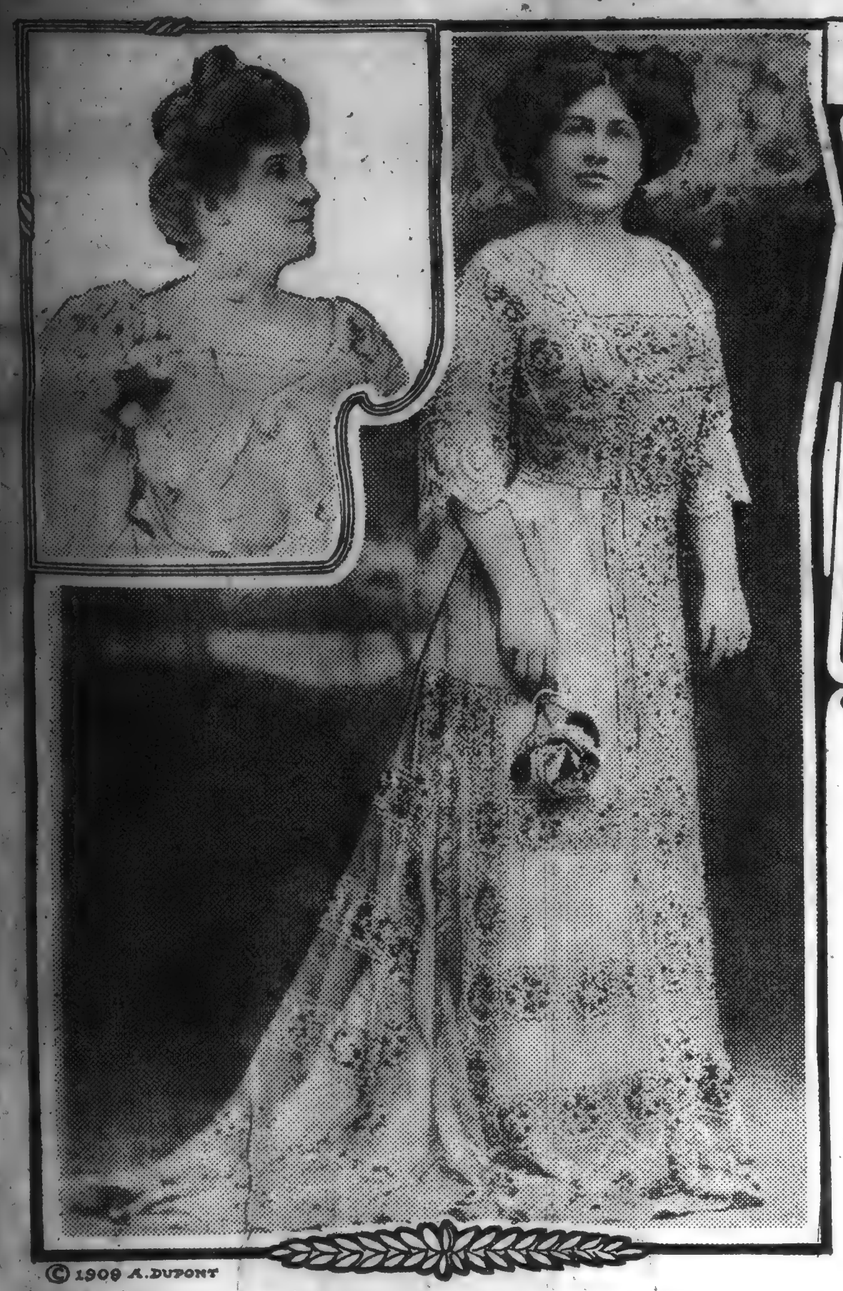
Mr. Witek, who has been during the summer with the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra at Scheviningen, Holland, will arrive in Boston with an ample margin of time for undertaking his new duties. As he has been engaged for a term of years, he comes prepared to make Boston his place of residence during that incumbency.

For the first time since its organization, the personnel of the Symphony orchestra will, next winter, exceed 100 men. Hitherto the highest number of active members has been 99. This season it will be 101. The two additional members are a new first trombone player, who will relieve Mr. Hampe of a part of his work, and a fifth bassoon player, a "utility" man—understudy, as the stage would say—to prevent the embarrassments consequent on the illness of a regular player. Otherwise, and virtually, the orchestra remains the same as last year.

[10]

THREE SONGBIRDS WHO WILL BE HEARD IN HUB THIS YEAR DURING THIRTIETH SEASON OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mme. Melba. Emmy Destinn. Geraldine Farrar.



© 1909 A. DUPONT

© BY A. DUPONT

SYMPHONY BEGINS IN THREE WEEKS

Auction Sale of Seats for Concerts Opens Sept. 26.

NOTED SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD HERE

Big Revival of "The Bohemian Girl" at Boston Opera House by Aborn Company.

But three weeks remain before the opening of the thirtieth season of Symphony concerts and a week from tomorrow the annual auction sales begin.

The season calls for the usual twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The Boston season will begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, and end on Saturday evening, April 29.

The auction sales will be governed by the same rules that have been in force in past years. Monday, Sept. 26, the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold and the $10 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 27. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 29, and the $10 seats on Friday, Sept. 30. The sales will be held in Symphony Hall and will begin promptly at 10 o'clock. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Mr. Fiedler has already made his announcement of the works he intends to play, and from these it will be a comparatively easy task for him to give as brilliant a series of programs as those which have characterized his past two years in Boston. The management has provided the most brilliant list of soloists possible to secure this year. It is especially strong in singers. These are Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Emmy Destinn, Mme. Jomelli, sopranos; Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, contralto, and Charles Gilibert, baritone. Mme. Melba, who has not been heard with the orchestra for three years, will make what is positively her only appearance in Boston this season when she sings with the orchestra.

Since Miss Farrar was here last year she has increased her fame by a series of performances of "Tosca" at the Opera Comique in Paris, and her performance of Zerlina in Mozart's "Don Giovanni" at the Mozart Festival in Salzburg this last summer.

The pianists will be Josef Hofmann, Ferruccio Busoni and Carlo Buonamici. Hofmann has not played in Boston for a number of years. Busoni will be agreeably remembered for his superb performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto at the Symphony last season. He, too, is one of the few great pianists of the day. Mr. Buonamici is one of the most admired of Boston's pianists and is decidedly an artist to be reckoned with. It is several years since he appeared with the orchestra.

The two visiting violinists will be Mischa Elman and Francis McMillan. Elman today is unquestionably the most popular violinist in the world. Mr. McMillan is an American and will make his first appearance with the orchestra. He has already taken high rank abroad.

From the ranks of the orchestra will come Anton Witek, the new concert-master, and Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master. The other two soloists announced are Alwin Schroeder, who after an absence of seven years, returns to the orchestra to share the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Warnke, and Mr. Warnke himself.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES

Mr. Fiedler's Chosen Pieces for the First Five Pairs of Concerts—Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony the Chief New Piece—A Commemorative Schumann Concert and a Concert of Two Symphonies—Miss Farrar, Mr. Gilibert, Mr. Macmillen and Mr. Schroeder for "Assistance"

MR. Fiedler, who is now on the Atlantic, en route from Germany to New York, has handed to the management of the Symphony Orchestra the programmes of the five pairs of concerts that begin the new season and carry it to the first journey to the cities southward. They provide for the concerts of Oct. 7 and 8, 14 and 15, 21 and 22, 28 and 29, and Nov. 4 and 15. They assemble such assisting singers as Miss Farrar and Mr. Gilibert, Mr. Macmillen for a violinist and Mr. Schroeder for a violoncellist; and they include one of the notable new pieces already announced, for performance, Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, and another that is equally novel but of less anticipatory zest; Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy." By way of innovation in his programme-making, Mr. Fiedler has allotted two symphonies and no other music to one pair of concerts and devoted another pair, the first of the year, to the commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Schumann. Dated and detailed, the five programmes run:

I.

Oct. 7 and 8

(In memory of the one hundredth birthday of Robert Schumann, June 8, 1910)

Schumann: Overture, "Manfred," Op. 115.
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, Op. 97 (Rhenish).
Concerto for violoncello with orchestra, Op. 129.
Overture, "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

II.

Oct. 14 and 15

Rachmaninoff: Symphony in E minor, Op. 27 (first time).
Goldmark: Violin Concerto in A-minor, Op. 28.
Weber: Overture, "Oberon."
Soloist, Francis Macmillen.

III.

Oct. 21 and 22

Beethoven: Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36.
Aria
Scriabine: "Le Poème de l'Extase" (first time).
Songs
Sibelius: "Finlandia."
Soloist, Charles Gilibert.

IV.

Oct. 28 and 29

Brahms: Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Op. 68.
Tschaikowsky: Symphony in E minor, No. 5, Op. 64.

V.

Nov. 4 and 5

Strauss: Symphony in F minor, Op. 12.
Isouard: Air from "Jeannet et Colin" (1814).
Mozart: Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra (first time).
Mozart: Concert Aria, "Misero! O sigmo, O son desto?"
Berlioz: Overture, "Carneval Romain."
Soloist, Miss Farrar.

The auction sales of seats for the Symphony concerts will occupy the greater part of next week at Symphony hall. On Monday at 10 o'clock the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals are placed on sale, and on Tuesday the $10 seats. Then comes an interim of a day; on Thursday the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $10 seats.

Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has received from Mr. Fiedler the first five programs which will be played before the orchestra departs on its November trip to the South. During the past summer German orchestras have celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann; and Mr. Fiedler at his first concert will commemorate this anniversary with a Schumann program. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who returns to the orchestra after an absence of six years. The second and third concerts will each have a novelty: The second, Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor; the third, Scriabine's Symphony, "Le Poeme de l'extase." Scriabine belongs, like Rachmaninoff, to the Russian school. The soloist at the second concert will be Francis MacMillan, the American violinist, who makes his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra; at the third concert the soloist will be the French baritone, Charles Gilibert. Miss Geraldine Farrar will make her only appearance with the orchestra at the fifth concert. Miss Farrar's first number will be an air from an opera comique by Nicolo Isouard, "Jeannet et Colin," which was first produced in Paris in 1814. Her second aria will be from Mozart: "Misero! o sogno, o son desto?"

* * *

Program of the first pair of concerts, Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, and Saturday evening, Oct. 8.

In memory of the one hundredth anniversary of the birthday of Robert Schumann, June 8, 1910: Overture, "Manfred," op. 115, Schumann; symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, op. 97 (Rhenish), Schumann; concerto for violoncello with orchestra, op. 129, Schumann; overture, "Genoveva," op. 81, Schumann; soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

* * *

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Auction Sale of Seats Begins Tomorrow—Some Notable Features.

The annual auction sale of seats for the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place at Symphony Hall Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday. Tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, and on Tuesday at the same hour the $10 seats will be put on sale. Thursday morning at 10 o'clock the sale of the $18 seats for the concerts will begin, and Friday morning at the same hour the $10 seats will be sold. For the rehearsals, every seat in the house will be sold except those in the second balcony, which are sold at 25 cents each on the afternoon of the rehearsals. For the concerts, every seat in the house will be sold.

Mr. Ellis has received from Mr. Fiedler the programs of the five concerts which precede the first southern trip in November. The first concert will be a memorial to Schumann, the 100th anniversary of whose death has been celebrated generally throughout Europe during the past summer. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who returns to the orchestra after an absence of eight years. Francis MacMillan, the American violinist, at the second concert will make his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra. Charles Gilibert, baritone, will be the soloist at the third concert; the fourth concert will have none, and at the fifth Miss Geraldine Farrar will make her only appearance with the orchestra in Boston this year. The second and third concerts will bring two important novelties, both Russian.

The programs are as follows:

OCT. 7, 8.

Schumann—Overture, "Manfred," op. 115.
Schumann—Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, op. 97 (Rhenish).
Schumann—Concerto for 'cello with orchestra, op. 129.
Schumann—Overture, "Genoveva," op. 81.
Soloist—Alwin Schroeder.

OCT. 14, 15.

Rachmaninoff—Symphony in E minor, op. 27.
Goldmark—Violin concerto in A minor, op. 28.
Weber—Overture, "Oberon."
Soloist—Francis MacMillan.

OCT. 21, 22.

Beethoven—Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 36.
Aria.
Scriabine—"Le Poeme de l'extase."
Songs.
Sibelius—"Finlandia," op. 26, No. 7.
Soloist—Charles Gilibert.

OCT. 28, 29.

Brahms—Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.
Tschaikowsky—Symphony in E minor, No. 5, op. 64.

NOV. 4, 5.

Strauss—Symphony in F minor, op. 12.
Isouard—Air from "Jeannot et Colin."
Mozart—Adagio and fugue for string orchestra.
Mozart—Aria, "Misero! O Sogno, O Son Desto."
Berlioz—Overture, "Carneval Romain."
Soloist—Miss Geraldine Farrar.

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1910.

WIFE OF CONCERT MASTER HAS WON FAME AS PIANISTE

MME. ANTON WITEK,
Wife of new concert master of Symphony Orchestra.

While her husband has attained fame as a violinist Mme. Anton Witek, wife of the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is no less renowned through Europe as a wonderful pianiste. She, assists and counsels her husband in the many phases of his work.

Mme. Witek is of very pleasing presence, with beautiful white hair, and speaks English with just a slight German accent. A linguist of marked ability, she professes her love for the deep German of her homeland.

Mme. Witek will no doubt be in great demand at society functions this coming season, as her native criticisms of American customs, and her innate sense of humor, should make her a warm favorite among Boston's leaders.

"I think your park system is beautiful," she exclaimed yesterday, with a wave of her hand toward the Fens just outside her window at Hemenway Chambers, "and I shall enjoy, so, so much a ride through it all. Boston seems to be a charming city."

From RECORD-HERALD

Address Chicago, Ill.

Date

The novelties which will be offered this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the patrons of its concerts are numerous and interesting. Certain works which will be presented to the eastern audiences for the first time have already been made familiar to audiences in Chicago. Among these will be numbered Hadley's orchestral rhapsody, "The Culprit Fay," Liadow's musical picture, "Baba Yaga" and Leo Weiner's graceful serenade for small orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston organization, has also chosen for performance Debussy's latest orchestral work, "Iberia"; Mahler's second symphony with solo and chorus, Fritz Delius' "Appalachia," "Brigg Fair," "Dance Rhapsody" and "In a Summer Garden," Bantock's three dramatic dances, Heinrich Noren's suite, "Vita"; Scriabine's "Poeme de l'extase," Arensky's variations for strings on a theme by Tschaikowsky, Mandl's "Overture to a Gascon Comedy," Glasounow's suite, "Au Moyen Age"; two scherzos from Nicode's choral symphony, "Gloria"; a comedy overture and a concerto for piano, organ and orchestra by Halm and Palmgren's suite, "From Finland."

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Anton Witek, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and successor to Willy Hess as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday, the 20th, from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. Max Fiedler, the conductor, comes a week later on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse.

The usual five concerts will be given in Philadelphia Monday evenings, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. Owing to the increases in the wind choirs this year the personnel of the orchestra for the first time will be more than 100 men.

Estab 1884

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date SEP 14 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY DATES ANNOUNCED

First Concert Will Be Held At The Lyric On November 9.

ANTON WITEK WILL HAVE HESS' PLACE

New Concertmeister Was Formerly Connected With The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Announcement of the usual five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Lyric was made today. The dates selected for the concerts are:

November 9.
December 7.
January 11.
February 22.
March 22.

The personnel of the soloists has not yet been made public.

It was also announced today that Willy Hess, for years concertmeister of the Orchestra and one of the leading living violin virtuosi, will no longer be in his accustomed place. Mr. Hess' successor, Anton Witek, is a musician of distinguished ability. Mr. Witek, who was formerly connected with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, is expected to arrive in New York from Bremen next Tuesday.

Max Fiedler, who will continue his work as director of the Orchestra, is expected to arrive in this country on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse the latter part of the month. The season of the Orchestra will open in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 7.

Large as the Orchestra always has been, it has been increased by additions to the wind choirs, and for the first time in its history numbers more than a hundred musicians.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY DATES

Orchestra Will Be Composed Of More Than 100 Men This Season.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the following dates for the series of five Baltimore concerts to be given at the Lyric this winter:

November 9. February 22.
December 7. March 22.
January 11.

All of the Baltimore concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings.

The orchestra's season will be opened in Boston October 7. Because of the increase in the wind choirs this year the personnel of the organization for the first time will be more than 100 men.

Anton Witek, who recently left the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra to become the successor to Willy Hess as concertmeister of the Boston Symphony, is expected to arrive in New York next Tuesday from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. Mr. Max Fiedler, the conductor, is expected to arrive from Europe a week later on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra offers its usual Philadelphia series of five concerts on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. Owing to the increases in the wind choirs this year the personnel of the orchestra for the first time will be more than 100 men.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

SEP 15 1910

MUSICAL NOTES.

Anton Witek, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and successor to Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in New York on the Kronprinz Wilhelm on Tuesday. Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, is due to arrive a week later. The season in Boston will open on Friday afternoon, Oct. 7. The usual ten concerts will be given in New York on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the dates being Nov. 10 and 12, Dec. 8 and 10, Jan. 14 and 16, Feb. 23 and 25, and March 23 and 25.

[illegible] of the Russian

[12]

From Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

SEP 18 1910

Anton Witek, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and successor to Willy Hess as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday, Sept. 20 from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. Max Fiedler, the conductor, comes a week later on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The season in Boston opens Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, and Saturday evening, Oct. 8. The usual five concerts will be given in Brooklyn, the dates being Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24. Owing to the increases in the wind choirs this year the personnel of the orchestra for the first time will be more than one hundred men.

From

Address Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 17 1910

Anton Witek, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and successor to Willy Hess as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. Max Fiedler, the conductor, comes a week later on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The season in Boston opens on Friday afternoon, October 7, and Saturday evening, October 8. Owing to the increases in the wind choirs this year, the personnel of the orchestra for the first time will be more than 100 men.

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date SEP 17 1910

Anton Witek, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and successor to Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday, the 20th, from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. Max Fiedler, the conductor, comes a week later on the Kaiser Wilhelm de Grosse. The season in Boston opens on Friday afternoon, October 7, and Saturday evening, October 8. The usual five concerts will be given in Brooklyn, the dates being November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24. Owing to the increases in the wind choirs this year the personnel of the orchestra for the first time will be more than one hundred men.

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date

WITEK TO ARRIVE TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Opens Season Oct. 7—Will Play Here Nov. 10.

Anton Witek, lately of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, now concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due here Tuesday. Max Fiedler, the conductor, comes a week later, and the season in Boston will open October 7. The usual ten concerts will be given in New York on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the dates being November 10, 12, December 8, 10, January 14, 16, February 23, 25, and March 23, 25.

The orchestra for the first time will be more than one hundred men.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in its home city on Friday afternoon, October 7. The novelties to be given this year are: Debussy's latest orchestral work, "Iberia," which caused great discussion in Paris last season. Mahler's second symphony with solo and chorus, which practically makes a full program of itself, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Macbeth," will find a place on one of the early programs.

Other novelties are as follows:—

Arensky, set of variations for strings on a theme by Tschaikowsky; Bantock, three dramatic dances; Debussy, "Ronde de Printemps;" Delius, "Appalachia," with chorus; "Brigg Fair," "Dance Rhapsody" and "In a Summer Garden;" Enesco, two Roumanian dances; Glasounoff, suite "Au moyen age;" Hadley, "The Culprit Fay;" Halm, a comedy overture and a concerto for orchestra, piano and organ; Liadoff, "Baba Jaga;" Mandl, "Overture to a Gascon Comedy;" Nicode, two scherzos from "Gloria;" Noren, suite "Vita;" Palmgren, a suite "From Finland;" Scriabine, "Poeme de l'extase;" Weiner, serenade.

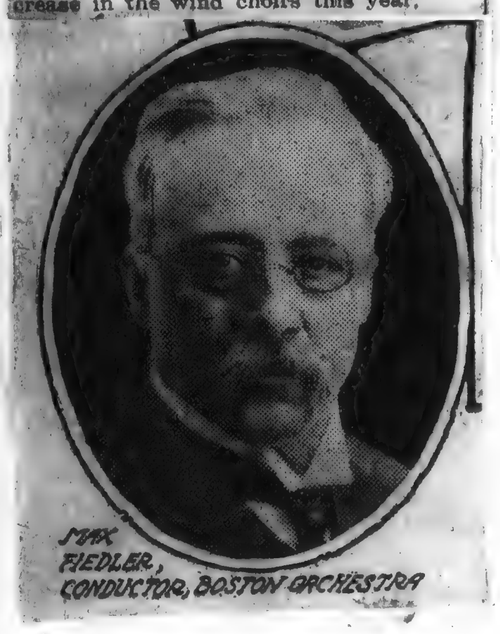
From NORTH AMERICAN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 18 1910

This city is again to have its regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There will be five in the season at the Academy of Music. The dates are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. Max Fiedler, of Bremen, will again be the conductor, but there will be a new concertmaster to succeed Willy Hess in the person of Anton Witek. Herr Witek is from the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday. Herr Fiedler comes a week later.

The season in Boston will open on October 7. For the first time in its history the personnel of the orchestra will reach 100 men. There has been an increase in the wind choirs this year.



MAX FIEDLER, CONDUCTOR, BOSTON ORCHESTRA

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

FARRAR AND MELBA TO OPEN BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Esta 8

Carnegie Hall Visits of Fiedler's Men Are Booked as Solidly as Grand Opera—A Foolish Tale of Two Cities and Fiddler Witek—Clashing Reports as to Farrar, Too.

Charles A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces through Secretary W. E. Walter that Miss Geraldine Farrar will be soloist at the Boston men's first evening concert in New York and Mme. Melba at the first matinée concert. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann at both evening and afternoon concerts. Mischa Elman in January, Ferruccio Busoni in February and Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, in March.

Mr. Fiedler is due to arrive in New York by the Kaiser Wilhelm II. next Tuesday. The sale of season tickets for new subscribers will open at Carnegie Hall on Monday week, Oct. 3, and the official notice to subscribers says that 90 per cent. of last year's regular attendants at Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall have already renewed for the coming season.

As there is a long waiting list for the better seats, the number of season tickets to be placed on public sale next month for both the evening and afternoon series will be small. The orchestra, it is announced, has never had a season that showed brighter prospects than 1910-11, and those in charge would not be surprised if there was practically nothing left for the "single" sales, as on fashionable nights at the opera. The list of soloists has already been told.

August Spanuth, in artistic Germany's weekly Signale, is moved to indignant protest by the formidable word, "Kontraktbrüchig," as applied to one artist who arrived this week from the other side. He says:

A Berlin daily recently alarmed its readers with the news that Witek, the concertmaster of the (Berlin) Philharmonic Orchestra, had been guilty of breach of contract and was about to sail for America. And yet musical Berlin had known for months that Boston and Berlin were going to exchange Concertmasters Witek and Hess. What is more, Witek made no secret of his Boston engagement, and there could be no doubt that the change was a serious matter to him, since he was married in June. And now to be published as a contract breaker in September! It is astonishing to what springs of misinformation the dailies of Berlin go for news of the art world.

Anton Witek arrived in New York on the Kronprinz Wilhelm this week and has since been heartily welcomed by his new associates in Boston.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date SEP 18 1910

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Local Dates.

Anton Witek, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and successor to Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday, the 20th, from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. Max Feidler, the conductor, comes a week later on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The season in Boston opens on Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, and Saturday evening, Oct. 8.

Five concerts will be given in Providence, the dates being Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14, April 4. Owing to the increases in the wind choirs this year, the personnel of the orchestra for the first time will be more than 100 men.

Esta 188

From

Address PRO

Date SEP 18 1910

The coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be the most brilliant in its history. The orchestra will be larger than ever before this winter, averaging 101 or 102 at each concert, and 117 concerts, the biggest season in the orchestra's career, will be given. The band has been materially strengthened since last season. A partial list of the music to be performed, which includes an exceptional number of interesting novelties has been announced.

These novelties are by composers of every school and nationality. Mr. Fiedler from the beginning has distinguished himself in his programmes, says the Boston Post in commenting on the list. He has not been the partisan of this or that composer. He has not permitted his rare enthusiasm and understanding of Strauss, for instance, to quench his curiosity in examining the works of Debussy or D'Indy. At least two composers unknown in Boston will have a hearing for the first time in the course of the next 24 concerts. Mr. Fiedler was the first conductor of the Boston Orchestra to bring to a hearing works by the modern Englishmen. For the winter, there is a new work by Granville Bantock and four new pieces by Fritz Delius, whose nocturne for orchestra, "Paris," was food for reflection on the part of reviewers at least, last season.

The Russians will be given much attention. Heading the list of the novelties is Arensky's "Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky" for string orchestra, one of the late works of the composer. Glazounov is represented by an orchestral suite unknown here, "From the Middle Ages." This suite was played by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in 1906 in New York.

Anton Witek, who has succeeded Professor Willy Hess as concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, is expected in Boston in a few days. It is his first visit to this country. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian by birth. He studied under Bennewitz at Prague and in 1894, at the age of 22, was appointed concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, a position which he has held ever since. He has been described as a "serious, solid, thoroughly grounded musician" and not as a virtuoso; yet he has been successful season after season in his tours through northern Europe as a concert soloist.

k, 188

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Dates for Concerts Announced.

The dates for the five concerts by the Boston Symphony to be given at the Lyric have been set for November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22. The former concertmaster, Willy Hess, has been succeeded by another distinguished musician, Mr. Anton Witek, who was formerly connected with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He is expected to arrive in New York from Bremen tomorrow. This year the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be larger than ever, as it now numbers over 100 members.

Esta 18

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

—Anton Witek, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and successor to Willy Hess as concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday from Bremen. Max Fiedler, the conductor, comes to America a week later. The season in Boston opens on Friday afternoon, October 7, and Saturday evening, October 8. The usual five concerts will be given in Philadelphia Monday evenings, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. Owing to the increases in the wind choirs this year, the personnel of the orchestra for the first time will be more than 100 men.

Esta 1884

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date SEP 17 1910

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, again under the leadership of Max Fiedler, with Anton Witek as the new concertmeister, succeeding Willy Hess, will give its usual series of five concerts in Philadelphia this season, at the Academy of Music, on November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. The personnel of the orchestra will be increased to more than one hundred men.

Estab 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMS ARE OUT

Musical Good Things Will Be Varied In Way to Please All Listeners.

SCHUMANN CONCERT FIRST

Geraldine Farrar to be the Soloist at the Fifth of the Series.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Max Fiedler has announced the programs for the first five rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first rehearsal of the season will take place on Friday afternoon, October 7.

Few people appreciate that making programs is an art and a science. It is also a gift and many a worthy conductor has been obliged to get along without it. A Symphony concert at best can be thoroughly enjoyed only by true lovers of music, it appeals to the intellect as much as to the senses. A poor program maker can bore the most cultured audience by giving them too much of the same sort of thing, or by following fads and fancies to the exclusion of proven worth.

Three orders of roast beef are too much for the most ardent lovers of roast beef, and three classic symphonies are apt to weary the best friends of Beethoven. A concert should be like a dinner and the chef should vary his dishes and look to it that they do not combine against the digestive organs.

Mr. Fiedler knows how to serve his banquets. There are enough of the classics to satisfy the purists, the best of the modern compositions, and now and then a real noveity to satisfy the curious. Although a German and naturally an admirer of German composers past and present, Mr. Fiedler is not narrow and can appreciate what French composers are doing and what the Russians have accomplished and are likely to accomplish. He does not frown on opera and as an entre frequently offers an overture, which the orchestra plays as no opera orchestra could ever perform it.

Schumann Concert First.

The first concert is a memorial to Robert Schumann, the 100th anniversary of whose death has been observed generally throughout Europe and the program is entirely Schumann, two overtures, the Rhenish Symphony and a cello concerto. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who returns to the orchestra after an absence of eight years.

The second concert will be notable by the first performance of a symphony in E minor by Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, who was heard here last year both as a composer, virtuoso and conductor, and the first operatic appearance of Francis MacMillan, the American violinist.

Gilbert will appear at the third concert in French songs and a symphonic poem by Scriabine, "Le Poem de l'extase," will be played.

At the fifth concert Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist. Miss Farrar has gone back to a forgotten French comic opera of 1814, Jeannot et Colin, for an aria, and an unfamiliar concert aria by Mozart will be her contributions.

FIRST.
Oct. 7th-8th.
Schumann.....Overture, "Manfred," op. 115
Schumann..Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, op. 97 (Rhenish.)
Schumann..Concerto for violoncello with orchestra, op. 129.
Schumann.....Overture, "Genoveva," op. 81
Soloist—Alwin Schroeder.

SECOND.
Oct. 14th-15th.
Rachmaninoff.....Symphony in E-minor, op. 27 (First time.)
Goldmark.....Violin concerto in A-minor, op. 28
Weber.....Overture, "Oberon"
Soloist—Francis MacMillan.

THIRD.
Oct. 21st-22nd.
Beethoven....Symphony in D-major, No. 2, op. 36
Aria.
Scriabine......"Le Poem de l'extase" (First time.)
Songs.
Sibelius......"Finlandia," op. 26, No. 7
Soloist—Charles Gilibert.

FOURTH.
Oct. 28th-29th.
Brahms.....Symphony in C-minor, No. 1, op. 68
Tschaikowsky..Symphony in E-minor, No. 5, op. 64

FIFTH.
Nov. 4th-5th.
Strauss.....Symphony in F-minor, op. 12
Isouard..Air from Jeannot et Colin, an opera comique (1814).
Mozart.....Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra (First time.)
Mozart.....Aria, "Misero! O sogno, o son desto?"
Berlioz.....Overture, "Carnéval Romain"
Soloist—Geraldine Farrar.

Concertmeister Witek Describes the Orchestral Life in Berlin

Mr. Anton Witek, the new concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was not able to tell eager reporters his impressions of America and its women, when he arrived in this city last Thursday. But Mr. Witek's conversation, on a later occasion, furnished interesting comparison of the orchestral conditions in Germany with those of this country.

There are in Berlin two symphony orchestras, of which the Berlin Philharmonic is considerably the larger and the more important. This orchestra makes money, which is not the case with any orchestra in existence in America. There would probably be no profits in Berlin if it were not possible for the orchestra to play in one city or another, incidentally working like beavers, about 365 days in the year. Often there are two concerts in a day, and rehearsals are sandwiched in at all possible times. Last year the Berlin Philharmonic gave 480 concerts.

The regular schedule for these players is one concert and two rehearsals a day, from Oct. 1 to the last of April; two concerts a day and three rehearsals a week from May 1 to October. In the summer the orchestra goes from Berlin to Scheveningen, Holland. All the winter, in addition to its regular symphony concerts, there are the concerts with the four or five choral organizations which bless Berlin with their presence, the "composers' concerts," where new works are likely to be introduced by their authors, concerts of a more popular nature and concerts for quite a number of odd occasions.

Individual System

The system of the Berlin Philharmonic is unique and unparalleled by that of any other symphony orchestra in the world. The gentlemen of the orchestra make their own laws and by-laws, elect their conduuctor appoint their own sub-officers—as Witek put it, are a "little republic by themselves." There are 65 members of the organization. For the concerts the personnel of the orchestra is considerably augmented. The extra men are paid regular salaries by the concert. The 65 associate members, however, are paid by division of the profits of the concerts of each season.

Membership in this orchestral society is for life. From the time of his election each member has a voice in every matter which relates in any way to the policy of the orchestra. No other member can oust him. He and no one else decides when the time has come that he can no longer play in the ranks. Then he retires on pension, the commendable system which has also been adapted by the Boston Symphony, since Mr. Gericke established it in his last term here.

The players of such a European orchestra as the Berlin Philharmonic perform under the direction of many different conductors, in the course of a season. Nikisch now conducts 10 concerts with this orchestra in Berlin, and six concerts in Hamburg during the winter. Strauss, Weingartner, Nikisch, Muck, Kogel—the names of those who visit as "guests" are legion. The "home director" is Kunwald. The programmes embrace all symphonic literature, though German music, of course, predominates. The German public is likely to pack the halls when Beethoven, Brahms and company are on the lists, while only certain coteries attend performances of modern French music or the music of exceptional personalities such as Anton Bruckner. "When D'Albert comes to play the Beethoven G major concerto, you cannot get in the doors after the concert has commenced; but when D'Albert plays D'Albert——!"

European Conductors

There is hardly a conductor of any importance in Europe under whom Mr. Witek has not played. Asked to compare some of these men, he at first modestly deprecated the value of a personal opinion. But he became more communicative. The two most popular conductors in Berlin are Nikisch and Muck. Of these two Nikisch is the more subjective, invariably following the musical impulse of the moment, while Muck, perhaps less personal in his attitude, shows more attention to the letter as well as the spirit of a score.

"It is one of the most remarkable things," said Mr. Witek in effect, "to observe the absolute control that Nikisch exerts over the orchestra. He may be as capricious, as erratic as he pleases, his beat may be never so elastic—the men are absolutely with him. It is very seldom that he gives precisely similar readings of any piece of music. But one glance and you understand him immediately—just what he wants."

"Strauss has, perhaps, less regard than either Muck or Nikisch for details, but his interpretations are always instinct with individuality. On different days he, too, will play very differently the symphonies of Beethoven, yet there are today few more authoritative and engrossing interpreters of this master's works than Strauss.

Weingartner

"Weingartner—he is becoming more conservative as he gets older, though he is wonderful, too, with Schuman, Berlioz, and other romantics. Kogel is a great man. It was only under him that I was able to really enjoy such works as Liszt's 'Tasso' and Berlioz' 'King Lear.' But what man is greater than another? Each is wonderful in his way. One is for Brahms, another for Tschaikowsky. They are all great people."

Mr. Witek's engagement for Boston is for two years. He will make his first appearance as soloist at the Symphony concerts in Beethoven's violin concerto. "I will play what they all know. I wish them to see clearly all about me. Suppose I play some new work—Sibelius, something like that? Then I can play as I please, and no one knows!"

Mr. Witek's tastes incline rather toward the straight and narrow path. He will give concerts this season with his trio, which consists of Mr. Malkin, 'cellist, Mrs. Witek, 'pianist, and Mr. Witek. The programmes of the concerts will, as a rule, be divided into two ensemble pieces, and a solo each for pianist, violinist, and 'cellist. The pieces will be selected from a repertoire which consists mainly of works by Beethoven, Brahms, Haydn, Mozart, Tschaikowsky, Dvorak—especially Dvorak—and Smetana.

"Dvorak is not yet well enough known," says Mr. Witek, who, a Bohemian, studied counterpoint and composition with the Bohemian composer, and in days past directed the Conservatory at Prague.

Mr. Witek has had many offers of late years from other orchestras. "They wanted him many times for the opera houses in Berlin and Vienna," said Mrs. Witek, "but he would not go." "Nein!" said the other half, "under there, in the pit, above me the conductor, what can I see, what can I hear, how can I"—and he flourished an imaginary bow—"zeigen—how can they know me?" "That," said Mrs. Witek, "is for those whose fingers tremble. But he—he is always calm. He always eats eggs just before the concert. Yes, half boiled eggs. The second concert meister, he says, 'Ach, how can you eat eggs, when I am sick, yes, sick, before I play?' But no, my husband is just as calm, and he always eats his eggs, just before the concert begins!"

SYMPHONY SALE

The sale of seats at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season commences tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall. The support which Boston has given this institution in the past has been unparalleled in the history of this or any other country and this loyalty has born its fruits in one of the best orchestras in the world. It is to be hoped that the unusual interest which has been manifested this season in the coming concerts will find practical demonstration in the sales, for the cost of high living affects orchestras as well as grocery bills and the problems of the management increase in proportion.

The rapid growth and development of this orchestra has been the emblem of the immense musical progress in this city during the last 30 years. In the early '80s the orchestra was almost a local institution, conducted by a resident singer, George Henschel, who had turned conductor, and its soloists were for the most part drawn from the ranks of resident artists. The performances were to a small and intimate public, and at the beginning it was but very occasionally that a concert was ventured in another town. In the years that have passed since that time the development of the orchestra has caused and has kept pace with the rapidly rising demand of its audiences, which are perhaps the most musically cosmopolitan in existence. The achievements of the organization which is indeed an honor to this city advance farther year by year. Under its admirable management, the orchestra has become one of the highest musical institutions in the world, while at no time displaying the evil effects of routine or the self satisfaction which too often accompanies any successful endeavor. For this the public of the city is as responsible as the directors. It has always been appreciative and enthusiastic. Of late years it has become, as well, keenly critical. The $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be put up at auction tomorrow morning at 10; the $10 seats on Tuesday morning at the same hour. The $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Thursday morning, and the $10 seats for the same occasion on Friday.

Mr. Ellis has received from Mr. Fiedler the programmes of the five concerts which precede the first Southern trip of the orchestra in November. The first concert will be a memorial to Schumann, the 100th anniversary of whose death has been celebrated generally through Europe during the past summer. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, whose appearance marks his return to the orchestra after an absence of eight years. Francis MacMillen, the American violinist, will be the soloist at the second concert, playing with the orchestra for the first time. Miss Farrar, as she did last year, will revive some music of another time; first, an air from Nicolo Isouard's opera, "Jeannot et Colin," which was first heard in Paris in 1814; second, a concert aria by Mozart, "Misero! O sogno, o son desto."

The first, second and third concerts will bring important novelties by Russian composers. The programmes of the first five concerts in full follow:

Oct. 7-8.
(In memory of the 100th birthday of Robert Schumann, June 8, 1910.)
Overture, "Manfred," Op. 115.....Schumann
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, Op. 97, (Rhenish) .....Schumann
Concerto for violoncello with orchestra, Op. 129 .....Schumann
Overture, "Genoveva," Op. 81.....Schumann
Soloist—Alwin Schroeder.

Oct. 14-15.
Symphony in E minor, Op. 27....Rachmaninoff
(First time.)
Violin concerto in A minor, Op. 28....Goldmark
Overture, "Oberon" .....Weber
Soloist—Francis MacMillan.

Oct. 21-22.
Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36..Beethoven
Aria.
"Le Poeme de l'extase" .....Scriabine
(First time.)
Songs.
"Finlandia," Op. 26, No. 7.....Sibelius
Soloist—Charles Gilibert.
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Op. 68....Brahms
Symphony in E minor, No. 5, Op. 64..... Tschaikowsky

Nov. 4-5.
Symphony in F minor, Op. 12.....Strauss
Air from "Jeannot et Colin," an opera comique (1814).....Isouard
Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra..Mozart
(First time.)
Aria, "Misero! O sogno, o son desto?"..Mozart
Overture, "Carneval Romain".....Berlioz
Soloist—Miss Geraldine Farrar.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 25, 1910.

Auction Sale of Symphony Seats Begins Tomorrow.

The order in which seats will be sold at the Symphony orchestra auction sale, beginning tomorrow morning at 10, is as follows:

Monday the $18 seats for rehearsals, Tuesday morning the $10 seats for rehearsals, Thursday morning the $18 seats for concerts and Friday morning the $10 seats for concerts.

As in past seasons every seat in the house will be on sale for the Saturday evening concerts. Seats to the gallery will again be sold at 25 cents for the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

The first pair of concerts, Oct 7 and 8, will be in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Schumann's birth (June 8, 1910), which has been observed the past summer through Europe.

The soloist will be Mr Schroeder, who returns to the orchestra after an absence of eight years. He will play Schumann's concerto for 'cello and orchestra, op. 129.

The soloists at the remaining concerts in Boston prior to the southern trip in November will be as follows: Oct 14-15, Francis MacMillan (first appearance at these concerts); Oct 21-22, Charles Gilibert; Oct 28-29, no soloist; Nov 4-5, Geraldine Farrar.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SEPTEMBER 26, 1910.

GOOD PRICES AT SYMPHONY SALE

Prices paid to-day for seats for the twenty-four rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra averaged higher than last year, though the best premium paid to-day fell short of the high-water mark reached in last year's auction. The sale was held today in Symphony Hall, with about 250 persons, mostly women, attending. The bidding was spirited. In the first twenty minutes, 100 seats were sold. In two hours, more than one-half of the total of 1100 seats were auctioned off.

The highest price paid to-day was $73 for each of the two seats, N 18 and 19. This premium represents the cost of the seat over and above the necessary $18 demanded. The first bid for the seats was $50. In the bidding last year the highest price paid was $85.

N. 20 and 21 brought each but $45. The second highest price paid to-day was $72 for each of N 15, 16 and 17. The third highest price was $71 for each of N 27 and 28.

TRAVELER SEPTEMBER 26, 1910.

HIGHER PRICES FOR SYMPHONY SALE OF SEATS

Over 200 persons, the majority of whom were women, attended the auction sale of rehearsal seats for the 30th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall today. Seats in the first 36 rows on the floor were offered for sale over the regular price of $18 for each seat.

The highest price paid during the morning was $68 for a seat in F. The lowest was for the end seat in the first row, $35. Both seats were sold to a Back Bay speculator.

In less than 20 minutes over 100 seats had been disposed of, for which over $2000 had been collected. The bidding was exceptionally brisk and spirited, many of the women not only buying for themselves but for friends unable to attend the sale. Not more than four seats could be sold on one bid.

A seat in A row, which usually calls for a premium of $7 or $8, sold for $17. The highest price paid for a seat in this row was $25.50 over the regular seat price totaling $43.50.

Seats in B row, which sold last year for $4, brought as high as $27.50, numbers 19 and 20 having been sold for that price after three bids.

Bidding for seats in C row was rapid, the entire row of 36 seats being sold in less than 12 minutes. Twenty-five dollars was the first amount bid for seats numbered 29 and 30, which finally got $30.

F row was the most popular of the entire first six rows. Premiums of $40, $45, and $50 were offered for seats there. The 36 seats in that row averaged over $25 each, making a total of $43 for each seat. In many instances premiums paid this year were from $100 to $150 more than paid for the same seats one or two years ago.

The seats will entitle the holder to witness 24 public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 7, 1910, to April 28, 1911, omitting six Fridays, two during the remainder of this year and four in 1911.

Among the artists who will appear at the rehearsals are Nellie Melba, at her only appearance in this city; Geraldine Farrar, Kirkby-Lunn, Emmy Destinn, Alwin Schroeder, Heinrich Warnke, Charles Gilbert, Josef Hofmann, and the only appearance of Anton Witek.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1910.

SYMPHONY SEAT AUCTION SALE TOMORROW AT 10

This week will be a busy one at Symphony Hall, for on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday the annual auction sales of seats will take place. Tomorrow morning at ten o'clock, the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold and on Tuesday at the same hour the $10 seats will be put on sale. Thursday morning at 10 o'clock the sale of the $18 seats for the concerts will begin and Friday morning at the same hour the $10 seats will be sold. For the rehearsals every seat in the house will be sold except those in the second balcony, which are sold at 25 cents each on the afternoon of the rehearsals. For the concerts every seat in the house will be sold.

Mr. Ellis, the manager, has received from Mr. Fiedler the programs of the first five concerts. The first concert will be a memorial to Schumann. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, whose appearance will be all the more interesting in that it marks his return to the orchestra after an absence of eight years. Francis MacMillen, the American violinist, will be the soloist at the second concert, making his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra. Charles Gilibert, the French baritone, will be the soloist at the third concert. The fourth concert will have no soloist. At the fifth Geraldine Farrar will make her only appearance with the orchestra in Boston this year.

The second and third concerts will bring two important novelties, both of them Russian. At the second concert Rachmaninoff will be represented by his Symphony in E minor, which will be heard here for the first time, and at the third concert Scriabine's symphony, "Le Poeme de l'extase," will have its first performance in Boston.

The programs are as follow:

OCT. 7-8.
Overture, "Manfred," op. 115.....Schumann
Symphony in E flat major, No. 3, op. 97 (Rhenish) .....Schumann
Concerto for violincello with orchestra, op. 129.....Schumann
Overture, "Genoveva," op. 81.....Schumann
Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

OCT. 14-15.
Symphony in E minor, op. 27 (first time) .....Rachmaninoff
Violin concerto in A minor, op. 28...Goldmark
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Soloist, Francis MacMillen.

OCT. 21-22.
Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven
Aria.
"Le Poeme de l'extase" (first time)..Scriabine
Songs.
"Finlandia," op. 26, No. 7.....Sibelius
Soloist, Charles Gilibert.

OCT. 28-29.
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68...Brahms
Symphony in E minor, No. 5, op. 64 .....Tschaikowsky

NOV. 4-5.
Symphony in F minor, op. 12.....Strauss
Air from Jeannot et Colin, an opera comique (1814) .....Isouard
Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra (first time) .....Mozart
Aria, "Misero! O Sogno, O Son Desto?" .....Mozart
Overture, "Carneval Romain".....Berlioz
Soloist, Geraldine Farrar.

GLOBE—MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1910.

FIVE SEATS AT $73 EACH

Sale for Symphony Rehearsals.

Good Premiums Obtained at the Opening Auction.

Bidding Spirited and High Prices the Rule.

Splendid premiums were received this morning by the auctioneer disposing of the seats for the Symphony orchestra rehearsals, and while higher prices have been received in the past the average this morning was very high indeed and will compare most favorably with any season for years back.

The sale took place in Symphony hall, and was the first for the coming season's performances. Only the floor and first balcony $18 seats for the Friday afternon public rehearsals were disposed of today, and to the regular price of $18 is added whatever premium was bid. The floor seats as far back as the tier under the balcony and the sides and two first rows of the balcony were sold today.

There wa present about the customary number seen at these sales in the last half dozen years, and as usual most of those present were women. The bidding was spirited and auctioneer Jackson had no trouble in securing high prices for most all of the desirable seats. The regular ticket dealers were out in force and, as usual, did most of the bidding, but occasionally an individual appeared who desired a certain seat sufficiently to cause him to outbi the dealers, and then prices ran up.

Along in 1904, 1905 and 1906 the seats for the rehearsals brought $12 before the premium was added. In 1904 the best premium received at these sales of rehearsal seats was $95 each for two; in 1905 it was $91 each on four in row Q, and in the following year the top premium was $81 two seats.

Under the increased price of $18 per seat for the rehearsals, the record premium in 1908 was $71 each for two in row Q, and last year the highest was $93 each for two seats in the first row of the first balcony, although $73 premium was the best for the seats on the floor of the house. This morning five seats sold on the floor for premiums of $73 each, three in the central portion of row N and two in the central part of row R. This afternoon when the balcony seats are sold it is possible that an even higher premium may be obtained.

Last season at the opening sale row A on the floor started at $16 premium, and this year it opened at $18, while last year that row secured a premium of $20 as its best and this morning $25.50 was paid for two seats in the row, while only about eight seats out of the 26 in the whole row sold less than $20 premium.

Last year row B opened at $16 and $24 was its best premium; this morning that row started at a premium of $17.50 and $31 was the top figure secured. Last yea rrow C opened at $23 and $30 was the highest for the row, while this morning that row began at a premium of $19 and the best obtained was $30.50, but the average was higher than last year.

Row D last season began at a premium of $15 and $30 was the best secured, while today it opened at $20 and $33.50 was received for eight seats in that tier, and $30,$31, $32 and $33 was paid in premiums for many others in the same line.

Row E this morning opened at a premium of $21 and two end seats at the left aisle, center section, sold for $39, others bringing little less in the central part of the row. Row F started at $22.50 and the last seat on the left closed at an advance of 50 cents on the opening premium, but as high as $50 was paid for one end seat in the row and premiums between $40 and $50 were paid for quite a number of seats.

A premium of $70 was secured for three seats, two on one side and one on the opposite side of the center aisle of row G, which opened at premiums of $25.50 and closed at $35, although over $40 in premiums were paid on each of quite a number of that row of seats. A premium of $50 each for seven seats was paid in row H, no single seat of which tier sold under premiums of $30.

In row I a premium of $60 was paid on each of four seats by a ticket dealer, others sold as high as $58 and the lowest was $31 on each of two seats near the left end. In row J the best premiums were $52 on each of two seats, and seats ot the left aisle, although $40, $48 and $50 was paid for others, and the smallest premium was $31.50 on four seats.

A premium of $32 was the smallest paid in row K and the best in that row was $61 on three seats in the center, that were secured by a private individual. In row L $71 was the highest premium paid, a dealer bidding that for one seat, but seven seats sold at $55 premium each and four sold at premiums of $58 in that row.

Four seats in row M closed at a premium mof $68 as the best figure for the row, although the average was well above $40 premium for eac hof the 34 seats in the row. In the next row the high premium was $73 for three central seats, one being an end seat at the right of the center aisle, three others sold at premiums of $72 and the average was considerably above that of the preceding row. In row O $60 was the high premium for three seats, and six others sold for but little under that figure.

In row P $633 was paid as high premium for two seats and the average would be about $40 permium each. In row Q, which usually brings out about the top bids, $69 was the best premium offered for two seats, and $61 was the next best premium. The lowest premium paid in the row was $35 for two seats, the last two on the left end, and four other seats in that row sold at premiums of $36, all other premiums being for $40 or above that figure.

Again in row R $73, the top premium of the morning sale, was secured for two end central seats, and the next best premium in the row was $68 for two seats. There were only five seats sold at premiums under $40 each in that row, however. In row S the best premium was $69 for two seats, and only five seats sold at premiums under

At 1, row T had been opened at a premium of $36 for the first end seat n the right, the next four brought $35 premium each and the next two seats, being end seats on either side of the right aisle, brought $38 each.

Those present were leaving for luncheon, and this afternoon the remaining floor seats and the $18 balcony seats will be sold.

The best prices secured this morning, that of $73 premium, added to the regular $18 price of the seats, makes the price of the five record seats $91 each for the season of 24 rehearsals for the 30th season of the Symphony orchestra.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONI

SEPTEMBER 26, 1910.

AUCTIONS 772 SEATS AT SYMPHONY HALL, TAKING OVER $35,000

Music Lovers and Brokers in Contest for First Day's Lots Run Prices from $18 to $71; Average is $35.

CLOSES NEXT FRIDAY

Some Premiums in Auction Were Considerably More Than Paid for Same Seats a Year or Two Ago.

More than $35,000 was realized by the sale of 772 seats at the auction sale of seats for the Symphony concert season at Symphony hall before an adjournment for luncheon was taken shortly after 1:30 o'clock this afternoon. A record sale for the rest of the day is expected as the whole of the first balcony yet remains to be sold.

The average price paid was $35, the highest $71, and the lowest $18. As is generally understood, the premium is added to the upset price of $18. The seats were sold singly or in lots not exceeding four in each group, most of the best seats being purchased by Boston brokers on behalf of regular Symphony concert attendants from Fall River, Concord, N. H., and all the outlying cities and towns.

The sale today is for the $18 seats for Friday afternoons and includes the seats on the floor back to rows KK, that is, to the first row covered by the balcony, the seats on the sides of the first balcony and the first four rows in the center. It will take probably until 2:30 p. m., allowing half an hour for luncheon, to dispose of the seats on the floor.

Tuesday the $10 rehearsal tickets will be sold, Thursday the $18 Saturday evening concert tickets, and Friday the $10 Saturday evening concert tickets. Each day the sale will begin at 10 a. m.

The prices paid today show a slight improvement upon those of last year, and if the present high rate is maintained throughout the sale the proceeds will probably exceed all records.

Walter Jackson of Francis Henshaw & Co., stock auctioneers and brokers, State street, conducted the auction.

In many instances the premiums paid this year were from $100 to $150 more than were paid for the same seats one or two years ago.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,

RECORD, MONDAY,

SEPTEMBER 26. 1910

SYMPHONY SEATS AT BIG PRICES

The auction sale of rehearsal seats for the 30th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was opened this morning in Symphony hall. Bids for seats in the first 3 rows on the floor, or from A to KK, and for the sides of the first balcony and the first four rows at the end of the balcony were premiums over the regular $18 price per seat.

There was an attendance of over 200. Bidding immediately became spirited. Seat 1 in row A, which usually commands $7 or $8 premium, was finally sold at $17 premium. When the center aisle of A row was reached, premiums of from $22 to $25 per seat were numerous. The highest premium in A row was $25.50 each for two seats, one of which was on centre aisle.

When B row was reached the extreme end seat sold for $18 premium from which price the premium rose to $31 for a seat on the centre aisle. Numerous seats in B row commanded as high as $22 to $28 premium. High premium in B row last year was $4.

In C row $25 to $30 premium was paid for choice seats, the highest premium being $30.50.

In D row near centre aisle as high as $33 was paid. In many instances premiums paid this year were from $100 to $150 more than paid for the same seats one or two years ago.

Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold, these being the same seats as the $18 upset price seats for the rehearsals, the sale beginning at 10 o'clock, and on Friday the remainder of the seats will be sold for the Saturday evening concerts including the whole of the second balcony, the upset price of these being $10.

JOURNAL—MONDAY SEPTEMBER 26, 1910.

SYMPHONY AUCTIONS OPEN THIS MORNING

The auction sales for the coming season of Symphony concerts begin today at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock. Today the $18 seats for the twenty-four public rehearsals will be sold. As is generally understood, the premium bid for the seats is added to the $18 and the seats bid in must be claimed immediately and paid for in cash or by check.

The seats to be sold today are the seats on the floor back to KK, or in other words back to the first row covered by the balcony; the seats on the sides of the first balcony and the first four rows in the center. It will take probably until 2.30, allowing a half hour for luncheon, to dispose of the seats on the floor, and those desiring to bid for balcony seats should be in the hall not later than that hour. Tomorrow the remaining seats in the first balcony on which the upset price is $10, will be sold with the sale beginning at 10 o'clock, and it will last about an hour and a half.

Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold, these being the same seats as the $18 upset price seats for the rehearsals, the sale beginning at 10 o'clock, and on Friday the remainder of the seats will be sold for the Saturday evening concerts, including the whole of the second balcony, the upset price of these being $10.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,

HIGHEST PREMIUM $73

Auction Sale for Symphony Rehearsals

Lively Demand for the Coveted Positions

Maximum Figure Less Than Last Year's

General Average Was Above That of 1909

Keen interest and spirited bidding from the first marked the opening sale of seats reserved for the series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The number of prospective buyers present when the sale opened at Symphony Hall, this morning, was far larger than in many previous years and as usual women far outnumbered men in the throng present.

The highest premium obtained by the auctioneer, Walter Jackson, was $73, which was paid for seats 18 and 19 in Row N, and the same price also was paid in Row R for seats 17 and 18. These seats were purchased by one of the ticket brokers who, as usual, including Messers. Herrick, Burke Wadsworth, Pratt, Heard and others occupied the front row from which to make their bids. Next highest for premium was $72, paid for seats 15, 16 and 17 in Row N and Row L. $71 was paid for a single seat, No. 27, and $70 was paid for three seats—Nos. 18, 19 and 20 in Row G, comparatively early in the sale, and immediately following a sale at $35 for the adjoining seats. Last year the highest premium paid at the opening sale also was $93 for seats in the first balcony.

When the early sale of $70 was made people sat up to take notice, as the saying goes, and thereafter opening first bids for places ran higher than previously.

The seats on sale today were the $18 ones for the rehearsals, while the lower-priced seats for the rehearsals, of the face value of $10, will go on sale tomorrow morning. All premiums paid at each day's sale are added, of course, to the face value of the seats, hence those which brought a premium of $73 today really stand the buyer at a cost of $91 per seat, or almost $4 for each performance, it will be seen.

When the sale began, the very first premium bid was a dollar for seat No. 1 in row A, and this sold for $18 premium, the buyer taking only one, in the option allowed to take four seats on any single bid. This aroused interest so that for seat No. 2 the opening bid was $10, with a sale at $17, and other sales in this front row ranged from $17, as the lowest, to $25.50 as the highest. Last year the record showed minimum and maximum premiums of $8 and $20 in row A.

The second row likewise showed generally higher prices than those of a year ago, with prices running from $17.50 to $31, a better range than last year, while in the third row the premiums were from $18.50 to $32. The prices then kept for awhile around $30, up and down, and reached $39 in Row E and $50 in Row F, with meanwhile sales much lower than those figures. Row G, which had a sale at $70, opened at $25.50, the lowest in the row, and at the last the prices fell off till the end seats sold at $33.

Sales as high as $50 were recorded in Row H, where the general run of premiums was such that no sale was made under $30.50. The next row ranged from $33 to $60 and back to $31. Bids by this time all started at $30 or even higher, so that there was not waste of time in getting figures up to that price. Occasionally, however, some timid woman would take a chance on securing a bargain—possibly because this is Monday—and would venture a bid far lower than the range had been running and of course when someone immediately raised her bid by several hundred per cent, there would be a quiet smile on the part of many.

The rows of seats about midway in the hall seemed to be most in favor, judging from the eagerness of the bidders to secure these. From $35 to $60 proved the usual range of prices. Sometimes two ticket brokers would bid against each other, with the result that the successful one had to pay pretty well for securing the coveted seats. These brokers all are commissioned by regular patrons to buy seats and many of these music lovers, who have been to the Symphony Concerts season after season, are determined, if possible, to have again favorite seats if money can obtain these. Hence the friendly rivalry and high premiums, in some instances. Again, private buyers show equal determination and bid earnestly against the brokers, with success in some cases, yet at high cost to themselves.

Considered as a whole, the premiums appeared to range far higher than those of last year and showed that there is no falling off in interest in these concerts, even with a long opera season and other musical attractions ahead, patronized largely by the same people who attend the Symphonies. Custom has shown that no one really expects to get any "bargain" at the sales for the Friday rehearsals, if the premiums be compared with those for the Saturday evening concerts, which always show an average of more reasonable figures.

The $18 seats include all those on the floor as far back as, and including, Row JJ, also seats in the first balcony, right and left sides, and in the rear through Row D. Back of that row, in the centre of the balcony, the face price of seats is $10, and it is for floor seats beginning with Row KK and extending through Row SS. The seats in the second balcony still remain "rush seats," as they have become known, for the Friday rehearsals, with admission gained by payment of 25 cents. The seats are available on the old plan of first come first to secure the best places.

The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts go on sale on Thursday, and on Friday the $10 seats, including all seats in the second balcony, will be sold.

From

Addr

Date

Esta

ADVERTISER, MONDAY SEPTEMBER 26, 1910

SEPTEMBER 26, 1910

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALES BEGIN THIS MORNING

The auction sales for the coming season of Symphony concerts begins today at Symphony Hall at 10 a.m. Today the $18 seats for the 24 public rehearsals will be sold. As is generally understood, the premium bid for the seats is added to the $18, and the seats bid in must be claimed immediately and paid for in cash or by check.

The seats to be sold today are the seats on the floor back to KK, or in other words, back to the first row covered by the balcony; the seats on the sides of the first balcony and the first four rows in the center. It will probably take until 2.30 p.m., allowing a half hour for luncheon, to dispose of the seats on the floor and those desiring to bid for balcony seats should be in the hall not later than that hour. Tomorrow the remaining seats in the first balcony, on which the upset price is $10, will be sold with the sale beginning at 10 a. m. and it will last about an hour and a half.

Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold, these being the same seats as the $18 upset price seats for the rehearsals, the sale beginning at 10 o'clock, and on Friday the remainder of the seats will be sold for the Saturday evening concerts including the whole of the second balcony, the upset price of these being $10.

News of Music

COMMEMORATIVE programmes, such as Mr. Fiedler has arranged for the pair of Symphony Concerts in honor of the centenary of Schumann's birth, ought to contain at least one of his compositions that is usually overlooked or that is merely a curiosity. Perhaps the concerto for violonce lo that stands on the list and that the virtuosi have seldom played in recent years, meets this requirement. A correspondent, however, mindful of the admirable horns of the orchestra goes further and suggests the inclusion of Schumann's Concert-Piece for four horns. It is hardly known to the public of concerts in America, but in London Mr. Wood's horn-players repeat it about every year.

[15]

TIGHT BINDING

HERALD, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1910.

BIG PREMIUMS FOR SYMPHONY

Original Prices of Seats Trebled in Some Cases at Auction Sale.

WILL CONTINUE TOMORROW

Most of the Bidding Is Done by Brokers Acting for the Real Buyers.

Premiums three and four times in excess of the regular price of $18 were today paid for seats at the annual auction sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals held at Symphony Hall. The bidding was brisk, but was participated in chiefly by brokers and speculators. Many patrons are too busy or do not care to inconvenience themselves by attending the sales. The management says many opportunities for good bargains are lost in this way. Owing to the fact that most of the bids were made by brokers and speculators, it will be impossible to tell the identity of the real purchasers for two or three days.

The seats at the left of the hall brought higher prices than those at the right owing to the fact that at piano recitals the auditors like to watch the hands of the players. So-called "bachelor" or single seats went at remarkably low figures in certain instances, when compared with the high prices brought by blocks of seats adjoining. All purchases were limited to not more than four seats. The popular sales were of two and three seats.

Today's sale began at 10 o'clock and goes through the day. There was an intermission between 1:30 and 2 and a change of auctioneers at that time. The sales today were limited to the $18 seats for rehearsals. Tomorrow at 10 o'clock the $10 seats for rehearsals will be put on sale. Thursday morning the sale of the $18 seats for concerts will begin and on Friday morning the sale of $10 concert seats will conclude the sales.

The usual preference was shown today for seats in the centre of the hall. The first two rows in the balcony were eagerly sought after. The $18 seats run from the stage to row JJ, and the $10 seats from row KK to row SS. All seats for rehearsals will be sold except those in the second balcony which are reserved for the 25-cent patrons of the matinee rehearsals. For the concerts every seat in the house will be sold at auction.

When Auctioneer Jackson began the sale at 10 o'clock there were not more than 100 men and women in the hall. The bidders were all assembled in the front seats and the gathering increased in size constantly. The bidding was brisk from the outset.

On the centre of the stage stood a large white board 20 feet square, upon which was tacked a diagram of the auditorium on a large scale thickly checked with figures indicating the rows of seats which the music lovers were so eager to purchase. Auctioneer Jackson with a furled program in his hand stood near the footlights, which were on.

In front of the diagram a man was perched on a stepladder under the shaded lights which lit up the seating map.

It was his duty to chalk off with a blue crayon the seat numbers as they were sold.

Auctioneer Jackson began with row A and first sold the seats at the right end working down through the floor from right to left.

Bidders were limited to four seats. The bids they made were premiums to be added to the regular price of $18 for each seat. In other words a man who bid $28.50 apiece for each of two seats had to pay $57 in premiums besides the $36 regular price, making a total of $93.

This permium was very ordinary compared to some which were paid for the chofcest seats on the floor.

It took the auctioneer an hour to sell the first four rows. The fancy figures did not begin to crop out until the rows further back were reached. Unlike a theatre audience those who attend Symphony concerts or any musical performance like to get away from the stage, consequently while the first rows sold out rapidly, they did not bring heavy premiums.

The bids opened in row A at $15, but none sold lower than $17. Some of these seats in this row brought as high as $28. The premiums averaged about $19 to $20 in the first row. Twenty minutes was devoted to the sale of row A.

Row B opened with bids of $10 which quickly were raised to $17.50. Two seats on the aisle centre went for $31.50 premium each.

Four feet across the aisle, two other seats equally good were got for $27.50.

Seats next to them went for $22, $23 and $19.50. The left end of the row sold for $1 more than the right end.

Row C, the right end seats of which went for $17, brought $30.50 for two seats in the centre of the aisle. One seat on the left aisle sold for $24.50 and the next one to it for $22.50, which was the end seat on the left of row C.

The other end of row C brought only $17. Similar fluctuations prevailed in row D, centre aisle seats in which went as high as $33.50, the highest bid up to that time.

As Auctioneer Jackson reached the centre of the house, the bids which in the front rows had opened as low as $10 and $15, jumped to $30 and $40 in rows F, G, H and K. In rows G and H choice aisle seats brought anywhere from $48 to $70. The end seats on the right of the centre aisle opened at $30 and jumped as rapidly as the auctioneer could count to $40 and $50, four aisle seats going for the latter figure in row J. Two seats on the left of the centre aisle went for $52. The two seats next to them brought $38. Two seats on the centre aisle in row I sold for $56.

The seats on the opposite side of the aisle brought $61. Three centre aisle seats in row L sold for $60. For seat No. 27 in row L, a premium of $71 was paid. The highest bid up to noon was $73 premium for two seats on the centre aisle in row N. Seats 15, 16 and 17 on the opposite side of the aisle in the same row brought $72 premium. The seats adjoining the $73 seats brought only $46, and the four next to them went for $41.

POST, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 191

SYMPHONY TICKETS SOARING

Average Increase of $5 at First Day's Auction

The auction sale of the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held yesterday in Symphony Hall. With the exception of one season under Dr. Muck, this auction was the most spirited of any for a similar occasion in the history of the Symphony Orchestra.

TICKET AGENTS OUT IN FORCE

The ticket agents were out in force, prominent among them being Messrs Herrick, Burke, Wadsworth, Pratt, and Heard, but there were also more private bidders present than last season and the bidding was strong. There was no sensational skyrocketing of particular seats, but for a general estimate it is probable that results of the sale will show an average increase of $5 over the same sale last season.

Certainly this was the case on the floor. The highest prices obtained were $73 for two seats in row N (18 and 19), and two seats in R (17 and 18). Two groups of seats, three each, were disposed of in rows N and L for $72. Seventy dollars was paid for three seats, Nos. 18, 19 and 20 in G. From this row on the bids were quite uniform and unusually high.

As usual, there were groups of seats which had been designated by parties whose names are kept carefully secret, and for these seats the agents had their orders to bid without limit, so that the seats were secured. At times the competition grew warm, but it never reached the climax of $98, paid for two seats on the right hand of the first balcony last season.

At the beginning it became evident that prices were on the increase. The first seat in row A fetched $18 premium, while the average of this row was over $20, the prices ranging from $17 to $25. This was an increase of more than $5 over last season's sale. The first seat in row B went at $20 and the highest priced seat in this row cost $33.50. Row C commenced at $21 and rose to $39.50. Row E began at $27 and went to $50 for No. 19. Row I commenced at $33. From row K to X the average was from $35 to $60.

In the balconies the prices were about as last season, while particular seats did not run so high. The first four seats in row A were sold for $21. The next four went for $36. The seats on the left side of the balcony sold higher than those on the right, probably on account of the fact that many prefer the seats from which they may watch best the movements of the soloist, more especially the pianist, whose hands can always be seen from this side. Seats 5 and 6 on this row were bought for $43 and the neighboring group for $49. Seats 25 and 26 brought $56.

This morning at 10 o'clock, will commence the sale of the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals. On Thursday the $18 seats for the Saturday night concerts will be disposed of, and on Friday the $10 seats for the same occasion.

HERALD, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1910

SYMPHONY SALE PREMIUMS $73

That Amount Highest Bid on Four Seats for the Annual Orchestra Rehearsals.

CENTRE SECTION POPULAR

Good Prices Paid for Tickets in Middle Aisle and Other Favored Points.

Four floor seats brought $73 each in excess of the regular price of $18 at the annual auction sale for Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals at Symphony Hall, yesterday. These were the largest premiums paid for season tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals. Seats in the front and second row of the first balcony averaged from $30 to $40 in the choice sections. The floor seats, which reaped bonus money at the rate of $73, were Nos. 18 and 19 in row N, and Nos. 17 and 18 in row R.

The bidding was brisk, but was participated in chiefly by brokers and speculators. Many patrons are too busy or do not care to inconvenience themselves by attending the sales. The management says many opportunities for good bargains are lost in this way. Owing to the fact that most of the bids were made by brokers it will be impossible to tell the identity of the real purchasers for two or three days.

The seats at the left of the hall brought higher prices than those at the right owing to the fact that at piano recitals the auditors like to watch the hands of the players. So-called "bachelor" or single seats went at remarkably low figures in certain instances, when compared with the high prices brought by blocks of seats adjoining. All purchases were limited to not more than four seats. The popular sales were of two and three seats.

Yesterday's sale began at 10 o'clock and lasted all day. There was an intermission between 1:30 and 2 and a change of auctioneers at that time. Today, at 10 o'clock, the $10 seats for rehearsals will be put on sale. Thursday morning the sale of the $18 seats for concerts will begin and on Friday morning the sale of $10 concert seats will conclude the sales.

The usual preference was shown yesterday for seats in the centre of the hall. The first two rows in the balcony were eagerly sought after. The $18 seats run from the stage to row JJ, and the $10 seats from row KK to row SS. All seats for rehearsals will be sold except those in the second balcony which are reserved for the 25-cent patrons of the matinee rehearsals. For the concerts every seat in the house will be sold at auction.

BOSTON POST, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1910

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date OCT 2 1910

THE SYMPHONY

It is interesting to note that at this moment when Bostonians who love the finest in the realms of music are buying their seats for the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Herr Max Friedlander, director of music at the University of Berlin, declares, just before sailing for America, that the organization of which we are all so proud is the finest in the world.

For many years we have believed this, yet it is gratifying to hear it now and then from foreign critics and musicians. We have not gotten over the American liking for compliments, and, while the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot be called American in racial personnel, it is considerably so in feeling, especially among the members who have long lived here. And its very existence has been made possible only by the splendid public spirit, the untiring energy and the financial bravery of a great American who has surely been a benefactor to the race.

It must be gratifying to Major Higginson to realize today that the public is not unappreciative of his efforts and that the finest orchestra in the world may give its annual season of delight without the need of the old-time personal sacrifices on his part.

Estab

KARL MUCK TO RETURN.

Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra for Term of Years.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Oct. 1.—Dr. Karl Muck, the celebrated Kapellmeister of the Berlin Royal Opera, who directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra several years ago, has decided to accept another engagement for a period of several years with the Boston organization.

Dr. Muck's contracts in Berlin will keep him occupied here until 1912. After that he expects to make his home in Boston for a prolonged period.

The concert season, in which, as usual, talented young Americans will again be much in evidence, was opened this week. Among the débutantes was Eleanor Anna Ehlers of Buffalo, who played before an appreciative audience in Bechstein-Saal an ambitious programme, including Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, Liszt, and Schumann.

Robert Blass, formerly basso of the Metropolitan of New York, has begun his engagement in Berlin at the Royal Opera, where he succeeds the American, Putnam Griswold, who himself goes to the Metropolitan next season.

Geraldine Farrar continues to be the principal drawing card of the Autumn season at the Royal Opera. Her triweekly appearances guarantee a standing-room-only house.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date OCT 2 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its plans for its twenty-fifth season in New York.

The orchestra, when it first came to New York, consisted of seventy-five musicians. This number has been gradually increased until the coming season its active members will number an even one hundred. This means, on a basis of sixteen first violins, that the orchestra possesses an extra man in each of the wind choirs. It is thus prepared for almost any musical emergency which may arise. The only change of note this year has been the engagement of Anton Witek of Berlin as concert-master to take the place of Willy Hess. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz. He is thirty-eight years old and for the past sixteen years has been concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

The prospectus for the orchestra's twenty-fifth season in New York, just issued, calls for the usual five evening and five matinee concerts, the former on Thursday evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 23 and March 23, at 8.15 o'clock, and the latter on Saturday afternoons, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 25 and March 25, at 2.30 o'clock.

Among the modern works that Mr. Fiedler will probably give in New York are Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," d'Indy's "Istar Variations," Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Leeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor and Sibelius's first symphony. There will, of course, be a judicious admixture of the classics.

From WORLD

Address New York City

Date

An imposing list of soloists has been engaged for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall. Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert and Madame Melba at the first matinee concert. In December Josef Hofmann will play at both afternoon and evening performances, Mischa Elman in January, Ferruccio Busoni in February and Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra, in March. Director Max Fiedler is due to arrive in New York by the Kaiser Wilhelhm II. next Tuesday.

Estab 84

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It is announced that 90 per cent. of last year's subscribers to the two series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall have already renewed their subscriptions for the coming season. Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert, and Mme. Melba will be the soloist at the first matinee concert. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann at both evening and afternoon concerts, Mischa Elman at the January concerts, Ferruccio Busoni in February, and Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, in March. Mr. Fiedler is due to arrive in New York by the Kaiser Wilhelm II. next Tuesday.

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date

As nearly all of last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Carnegie hall have renewed their subscriptions and there is a long waiting list, the number of season tickets for public sale next month will be small. The sale begins October 10 at Carnegie hall.

Estab ork, 1884

[16]

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date SEP 25 1910

A HISTORIC ORCHESTRA

NEW RECORD OF BOSTON'S PLAYERS.

Many Changes in the Direction and Personnel in the Twenty-five Years Now Approaching Completion—Promises for This Year—Leaders and Singers.

It will be twenty-five years ago this coming winter that the musical dovecotes of New York were set all in a flutter by the news that a strange orchestra from Boston contemplated a visit to this city with the idea of showing what Boston could do in the way of music making outside of the Handel and Haydn and occasional peace jubilees. Not that New York even a quarter of a century ago was in dire need of orchestral music. The Philharmonic, even then venerable, was very much alive under the leadership of a fairly well known man named Theodore Thomas.

The much more youthful Symphony Society was offering music under the leadership of the youthful Walter Damrosch. Frank Van der Stucken, not finding an orchestra ready at hand, had organized one of his own, particularly to pull conservative New York out of the rut of the classics; while Anton Seidl, a comparative newcomer, gave occasional concerts with the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House and was rapidly building up that idolizing following which made him a unique figure in New York musical life.

Consequently the audience which filled Steinway Hall on February 14, 1887, hardly realized even after the concert that a new and most potent factor had been injected into New York's music. To the general public the Boston Symphony Orchestra was less than a name. The musical public—that is that part of it which pays to go to concerts—knew vaguely that a wealthy banker of Boston, who must be eccentric, had organized an orchestra a few years before because, forsooth, he did not like the way the then existing orchestras of Boston played.

That other part of the musical public which does not pay to go to concerts whenever by hook or crook free tickets may be got rested satisfied with the knowledge that another market for soloists had been opened up; while a few, a very few, knew that serious work had been accomplished and that it had become the determination of Henry L. Higginson to leave nothing undone to make his orchestra as good as any other in the world. But it is doubtful that even Mr. Higginson and those most closely associated with him had any idea the enormous influence on music in America the Boston orchestra was destined to exert.

When it gave this first concert in New York it numbered seventy-five musicians. Wilhelm Gericke was in his third year as conductor. The orchestra had been organized five years before and had started with sixty-five musicians, recruited entirely in Boston, with Georg Henschel as its conductor. The first three years were sufficient to convince Mr. Higginson that no matter what the annual deficit might be—and nobody but Mr. Higginson knows what that orchestra has cost him—the support given to it in Boston more than warranted him in putting it on the soundest artistic base.

Therefore in the fall of 1884 he brought from Vienna as conductor Wilhelm Gericke, one of the conductors of the Imperial Opera and then in the prime of his manhood. He, with his unyielding discipline, his tireless patience and his steadfast adherence to the highest ideals of his art, in one year transformed the orchestra into a force to be reckoned with, and when in his second year he brought from Vienna a number of young men to strengthen the string choir it may be said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fairly launched on its extraordinary career.

The first concert in Steinway Hall caused a bit of a stir. If the audience was composed largely of Bostonians, former Bostonians and their friends, all the critics were there. The programme was not startling. It began with the "Oberon" overture and ended with the C minor symphony, while between these two came Handel's "Largo," played by the violins standing facing the audience, and the Beethoven concerto played by Franz Kneisel, the concert master. Heads were shaken a bit dubiously over the fashion in which the "Largo" was played, but the critics admitted that to have the violinists all stand enabled the audience to realize to the full the wondrous beauty of their tone.

That was the feature above all else that impressed New York, the exquisite color of the string choir. About the wood winds and the brass they were not so certain, and when some enthusiastic Bostonians wrote to their home papers that the critics of New York said that the Boston Orchestra was better than any the metropolis possessed some rather fiery answers were made. New York refused to surrender at once, and while admitting the glory of the strings, pointed with pride to the wood winds of the Metropolitan Opera House and the brass of Thomas.

It was really a remarkable set of men who made the first violins of the orchestra twenty-five years ago. At the first desk sat Franz Kneisel, the concert master, a mere lad in years, but already possessor of the delicate art which has made him so mighty in the field of chamber music. His colleague at the first desk was Charles Martin Loeffler, a remarkable violinist, who when Kneisel left the orchestra to devote his time to chamber music left also that he might pursue in peace his abstruse problems on dissonances à la Français.

At the second desk sat Timothée Adamowski, who was as talented a violinist as he was good to look at—which is saying a great deal, as many a fluttering heart of the time can testify—and Louis Svecenski, the viola of the Kneisel Quartet since its organization. Emil Mollenhauer, now for many years the conductor of the ancient Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, was another; and Emanuel Fiedler, the first second violin of the Kneisel Quartet, who has just retired from the orchestra after a quarter of a century's service; and Arnold Moldauer, whose untimely death a few years ago was such a shock to his friends. Among the violas sat Max Zach, now the conductor of the St. Louis orchestra, and at the head of the 'cellos was Fritz Giese, whose playing can never be forgotton by those who were fortunate enough to hear him.

Two more concerts were given that season, and despite the epithet "Fräulein Gericke und seine Damenkapelle," flung at it by some irreverent critic, the orchestra secured such a foothold here that to-day New York feels as if it almost had a proprietary interest in it. The next year four concerts were given and then a move was made to Chickering Hall, which proving to be too small during the Nikisch régime was abandoned for the more spacious Carnegie Hall. This in turn gave way to the Metropolitan Opera House for four years, and then in the season of 1898-99 the concerts—increased from five to ten a season—were again given in Carnegie Hall.

The twenty-five years have seen many changes in the orchestra, although there are still fourteen men on the roll who played at the first New York concert. The orchestra has grown from seventy-five men to an even hundred, and those wood-wind and brass choirs which caused such a ripple a quarter of a century ago have been improved until they are among the greatest glories of the orchestra. The third season here brought Arthur Nikisch as conductor, a veritable genius, whose loss to America in a way has never been repaired. He was conductor for four years; then came Emil Paur for five, to be followed for eight years by Gericke. When Gericke retired in the spring of 1906 the orchestra for two years had its fortunes directed by Karl, who, if rumor be true, is to return to it when his contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin has expired in the spring of 1912, and finally came the present conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg.

As one looks back over the list of musicians that have helped to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is some interesting names appear. Among the violins besides those already named have been Willy Hess, Carl Wendling, Karl Ondricek, Richard Czerwonky and now the new concert master Anton Witek. Among the cellists have been besides Giese, Anton Hekking, Alwin Schroeder, Rudolph Krasselt, Leo Schulz, Giuseppe Campanari and Heinrich Warnke. Emil Férir, now the principal viola; Max Zach, Louis Svecenski and Ottocar Novacek have given distinction to the violas, while in the wood winds besides such men as Longy, Grisez, Maquarre and Sadony, who are now members, have been the lamented Pourtau, one of the greatest clarinets in the world, who with Jacquet, the first flute, and Weiss, the second oboe, was a victim of the Bourgogne disaster in 1898, and Charles Molé, the flutist. And it was the Boston Orchestra that brought Xavier Reiter, the hornist, to America.

When the orchestra has finished the thirtieth season, next April, it will have given 2,946 symphony concerts, of which 187 will have been given here in New York, and in those concerts it will have had on its programme just short of 900 titles of music performed. This is a record of which any orchestra in the world might be proud, and when the character of performance is taken into consideration it is doubtful that it can be equalled.

The prospectus for the orchestra's twenty-fifth season in New York, which is just out, calls for the usual five evening and five matinée concerts, the former on Thursday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23, at 8:15 o'clock, and the latter on Saturday afternoons, November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25 and March 25, at 2:30 o'clock. The time for renewal of subscriptions by last year's subscribers ended last evening, and the remaining seats will be placed on sale for the season at the box office, Carnegie Hall, to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. There is but a limited number of these.

The only change of note in the personnel of the orchestra this year is in the concert master Anton Witek of Berlin succeeding to the place left vacant by Willy Hess. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz. He is 38 years old, and for the last sixteen years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

The management is again generous this year in the soloists it offers. Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert in November and Mme. Melba at the first matinée concert in that month. At both evening and matinée concerts in December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, while Mischa Elman will be the soloist for the January concerts, Busoni for the February and Witek for the March.

Among the modern works that Mr. Fiedler will probably give in New York are Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," D'Indy's "Istar Variations," Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, and Sibelius's first symphony. There will of course be a judicious admixture of the classics.

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date SEP 25 1910

Boston Symphony to Give Many Important Novelties

Under the artistic direction of Max Fiedler and the business management of C. E. Ellis, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will this season give the usual five evening and five matinee concerts in New York at Carnegie Hall. The evening dates are Thursdays, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23, and the Saturdays are November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25, and March 25. The soloists at the November concerts will be Geraldine Farrar and Madame Melba. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at both the December concerts; Mischa Elman at both January concerts; Busoni at both the February functions and Witek at both the March concerts.

Max Fiedler.

Witek will be the new concert-master of the famous society, and the successor to Willy Hess. He is a Bohemian, thirty-eight years old, a pupil of Bennewitz in the Prague Conservatory and for sixteen years has been concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony will also give the usual five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24, and March 24. The soloists there will be in the order named, Madame Jomelli, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Ferruccio Busoni, and Alwin Schroeder. As has already been announced Mr. Schroeder returns to the Orchestra and will divide the duties of principal 'cellist with Mr. Warnke. Mr. Warnke, however, has not been deposed from his place as principal, his duties being merely divided with Mr. Schroeder.

Mr. Fiedler sails from Bremen on the 20th. Among the novelties which he purposes performing during the season, and some of them will, of course, be played in New York are the following:

Variations on a theme by Tschaikowsky for string orchestra, by Arensky; three dramatic dances by Bantock; two "Images," by Debussy, (a) "Iberia," and (b) "Rondes de Printemps"; "Appalachia," "Brigg-Fair," "Dance Rhapsody," and "In a Summer Garden," by Delius; two Roumanian Rhapsodies by Enesco; two scherzos from "Gloria," by Nicode; Noren's Suite, "Vita"; Palgren's Suite, "From Finland"; a Serenade by Leo Weiner, and Richard Strauss's "Macbeth."

We may also count on hearing Strauss' "Don Quixote." Mr. Ellis has no "star" tours to attend to this year and his whole administrative energy will be centered on the Orchestra.

Ninety per cent of last year's subscribers to the concerts in Carnegie Hall have already renewed their subscriptions.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

As 90 per cent of last year's subscribers to the two series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall have already renewed their subscriptions for the coming season, and as there is a long waiting list of new subscribers, whose orders cannot be filled until after last year's subscribers have been attended to, the number of season tickets to be placed on public sale next month, for both the evening and afternoon series, will be very small. The orchestra has never had brighter prospects than for 1910-'11, and it would not be surprising if there was little left for the single sales.

An imposing list of soloists has been engaged for these concerts. Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert, and Mme. Melba will be the soloist at the first matinee concert. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann at both evening and afternoon concerts, Mischa Elman at the January concerts, Ferruccio Busoni in February and Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, in March. Mr. Fiedler is due to arrive in New York by the Kaiser Wilhelm II next Tuesday. The sale of season tickets for new subscribers will open at Carnegie Hall on Monday, October 3.

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date

For its series of concerts the Boston Symphony Society has engaged an imposing array of soloists who will be heard in New York. Mme. Nellie Melba, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mr. Mischa Elman and Mr. Josef Hoffmann are among them.

Est ...k, 1884

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, as usual, will have charge of the local management of the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which are to be given in the National this winter. Already many of last year's subscribers have renewed their subscriptions.

The dates of the five concerts are November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 21. The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, and Mme. Jomelli, soprano.

Subscribers of last year have until Wednesday, October 12, in which to renew. All communications should be addressed to Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, 2647 Connecticut avenue, Washington, D. C.

[17]

From LIFE
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date SEP 24 1910

THERE is such a distinctly social side to the Philharmonic concerts that hostesses have to be careful when planning entertainments for the winter that the dates they choose do not conflict with the five Friday evenings of music which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives in the Opera House. The dates this season will be November eleventh, December ninth, January thirteenth, February twenty-fourth and March twenty-fourth. Jomelli, soprano, has been selected as the soloist for the opening concert; Josef Hofmann, pianist, will be heard at the second, while those chosen respectively for the third, fourth and fifth evenings are Mischa Elman, violinist; Busoni, pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, cellist.

Est ...

From STANDARD UNION
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Address
SEP 25 1910
Date

Plans for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Brooklyn during the coming winter are now complete. The concerts, as already announced, will be on Friday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24. The soloists in order will be Mme. Jomelli, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Ferruccio Busoni and Alwin Schroeder, Prof. Hooper of the Institute of Arts, who has the local management of these concerts, reports that prospects have never been brighter for a successful season. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, arrives in this country next Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm II., and a week from to-morrow the regular rehearsals of the orchestra start in Boston.

E ... k, 1884

From
Address Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N Y
Date SEP 25 1910

Plans for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Brooklyn during the coming winter are now complete. The concerts, as already announced, will be on Friday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24. The soloists in order will be Madame Jomelli, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Ferruccio Busoni and Alwin Schroeder. Professor Hooper, of the Institute of Arts, who has the local management of these concerts, reports that prospects have never been brighter for a successful season. Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, arrives in this country next Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. and a week from to-morrow the regular rehearsals of the orchestra start in Boston.

Est ... 84

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date SEP 24 1910

GOOD MUSIC TO COME

E ... k, 1884

Plans for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Brooklyn during the coming winter are now complete. The concerts, as already announced, will be on Friday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24. The soloists in order will be Mme. Jomelli, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Ferruccio Busoni and Alwin Schroeder. Professor Hooper of the Institute of Arts, who has the local management of these concerts, reports that prospects have never been brighter for a successful season. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, arrives in this country next Tuesday, and a week from to-morrow the regular rehearsals of the orchestra start in Boston.

From VARIETY
Address New York City
Date SEP 24 1910

Twenty-four public rehearsals and concerts, have been announced as the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their annual concert season in Symphony Hall. Max Fiedler is the conductor. With fifteen world known artists and 100 picked musicians, the thirtieth season of this organization, should be a record breaker. Mesdames; Emmy Destinn, Geraldine Farrar, Jeanne Jomelli, Kirby-Lunn, Nellie Melba (only appearance in Boston), Messrs. Ferruccio Busoni, Carlo Buonamici. Assisting artists. Messrs. Mischa Elman, Charles Gilibert, Jose Hofman, Francis MacMillen, Sylvain Noack, Alwin Schroeder, Heinrich Warnke and Anton Witek (first appearance in Boston). The public rehearsals are to be held on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 7 to April 28. The concerts Saturday evenings to begin Oct. 8 and end March 24. Six dates to be omitted during this time.

Mechanics Exposition, with an old time Mechanics Fair, will hold sway at Mechanics Building from Oct. 3 to 29. Among the exhibits will be Thos. A. Edison's inventions, the making of a daily newspaper, making of a Goodyear Welt shoe and a magnificent Art Loan exhibit. The United States Marine Band through the courtesy of President Taft, will furnish the music for the first two weeks.

1884

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 25 1910

MUSICAL NOTES

—Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra who are renewing for the series of 1910-1911 may now obtain tickets for the concerts at Miss Harris' office in Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1119 Chestnut street. It is advisable that old subscribers get their tickets as soon as possible, as there is a long waiting list of new subscribers. The five concerts, as already announced, will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba. This, it is said, will be her only appearance in Philadelphia this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann; in January, Mischa Elman; in February, Heinrich Warnke, and in March, Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

—The ...

Estabi ... 884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 25 1910

A novelty to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter will be Delius's "Appalachia," a series of variations on a Mississippi Valley negro melody, scored for chorus and orchestra. Henry Hadley's "Culprit Fay," performed at Willow Grove, will also be given.

E ... New York, 1884

From EVE. BULLETIN
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 24 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this season give its usual series of five concerts at the Academy of Music, the dates being Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert, Madame Melba will be the soloist.

Established: London, 1881; New ... 1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 25 1910

The dates of the Boston Symphony concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, March 20. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann; in January, Mischa Elman; in February, Heinrich Warnke, and in March, Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

E ... 1884

From
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 25 1910

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are renewing for the series of 1910-1911, may now secure their tickets for the concerts at Miss Harris' ticket office, in Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street. It is advisable that old subscribers get their tickets as soon as possible, as there is a long waiting list of new subscribers which must be attended to in the near future. The five concerts, as already announced, will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. A most brilliant list of soloists is announced. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, in January Mischa Elman, in February Heinrich Warnke and in March Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

Estab ... 884

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 25 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra who are renewing for the series of 1910-1911 may now secure their tickets for the concerts at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. It is advisable that old subscribers get their tickets as soon as possible, as there is a long waiting list of new subscribers which must be attended to in the near future. The five concerts, as already announced, will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. A brilliant list of soloists is announced. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, in January Mischa Elman, in February Heinrich Warnke and in March Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

Estab ... 884

From ITEM
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date SEP 25 1910

Anton Witek, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and successor to Willy Hess as concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in New York on Tuesday. Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, is due to arrive a week later. The usual ten concerts will be given in New York on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the date being Nov. 10 and 12, Dec. 8 and 10, Jan. 14 and 16, Feb. 23 and 15, and March 28 and 25.

Est ... rk, 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From AMERICA
Address BALTIMORE, MD
Date SEP 25 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. William Albaugh is now ready at his office at the corner of Charles and Fayette streets to distribute tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to last year's subscribers who are renewing. The dates of the five concerts are November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

E ... k, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 24 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

Subscription Tickets Are Now On Sale At Albaugh's Agency.

William Albaugh is now ready at his office, at the corner of Charles and Fayette streets, to distribute tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to last year's subscribers who are renewing. The dates of the five concerts are Wednesday evenings, November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22. Madame Melba will be the soloist at the November concert, and this will be her only appearance in Baltimore during the season. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, in January Mischa Elman and in March Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. In February Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will again be given, with the co-operation of the Baltimore Oratorio Society. Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey will be the soprano soloist. The other members of the quartet will be announced in due time.

E ... rk, 1884

From STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 24 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. William Albaugh is now ready at his office at the corner of Charles and Fayette streets to distribute tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to last year's subscribers who are renewing. The dates of the five concerts, as already announced, are Wednesday evenings, November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

Estab ... 884

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date SEP 25 1910

FIVE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Providence to Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra This Season.

The year book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a vast amount of work has been cut out for it for the coming season. A total of 112 Symphony concerts will be given and these together with the two concerts of the pension fund and three concerts in Boston in connection with the Cecilia Society will make a grand total of 117. This is the largest number of concerts the orchestra has ever undertaken and it is a question whether any orchestra in the world has ever given so many Symphony concerts in the course of seven months.

Providence is among the cities whose quota of concerts has been increased this year there will be five instead of four as last year, the demand having warranted this increase in number. The schedule calls for the usual 24 rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, 10 concerts in New York; eight in Cambridge; five each in Providence, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Worcester in Worcester, Hartford; and one each in New Bedford; three in Northampton, Brockton, New Haven, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Buffalo, Syracuse, Albany and Waterbury, Conn.

The dates of the Providence concerts are as follows: Oct. 25, ... Feb. 14 and April ...

Est ...

[18]

From ... BROOKLYN, N. Y. LIFE

Address ...

Date ... SEP 24 1910

THERE is such a distinctly social side to the Philharmonic concerts that hostesses have to be careful when planning entertainments for the winter that the dates they choose do not conflict with the five Friday evenings of music which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives in the Opera House. The dates this season will be November eleventh, December ninth, January thirteenth, February twenty-fourth and March twenty-fourth. Jomelli, soprano, has been selected as the soloist for the opening concert; Josef Hofmann, pianist, will be heard at the second, while those chosen respectively for the third, fourth and fifth evenings are Mischa Elman, violinist; Busoni, pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, cellist.

Esta ... 884

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

Plans for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Brooklyn during the coming winter are now complete. The concerts, as already announced, will be on Friday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24. The soloists in order will be Mme. Jomelli, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Ferruccio Busoni and Alwin Schroeder. Prof. Hooper of the Institute of Arts, who has the local management of these concerts, reports that prospects have never been brighter for a successful season. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, arrives in this country next Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm II., and a week from to-morrow the regular rehearsals of the orchestra start in Boston.

Es ... rk, 1884

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

Plans for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Brooklyn during the coming winter are now complete. The concerts, as already announced, will be on Friday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24. The soloists in order will be Madame Jomelli, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Ferruccio Busoni and Alwin Schroeder, Professor Hooper, of the Institute of Arts, who has the local management of these concerts reports that prospects have never been brighter for a successful season. Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, arrives in this country next Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. and a week from to-morrow the regular rehearsals of the orchestra start in Boston.

Esta ... 84

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address ...

Date SEP 24 1910

GOOD MUSIC TO COME

E ... k, 1884

Plans for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Brooklyn during the coming winter are now complete. The concerts, as already announced, will be on Friday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24. The soloists in order will be Mme. Jomelli, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Ferruccio Busoni and Alwin Schroeder, Professor Hooper of the Institute of Arts, who has the local management of these concerts, reports that prospects have never been brighter for a successful season. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, arrives in this country next Tuesday, and a week from to-morrow the regular rehearsals of the orchestra start in Boston.

From VARIETY

Address ...

Date ... SEP

Twenty-four public rehearsals and concerts, have been announced as the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their annual concert season in Symphony Hall. Max Fiedler is the conductor. With fifteen world known artists and 100 picked musicians, the thirtieth season of this organization, should be a record breaker. Mesdames; Emmy Destinn, Geraldine Farrar, Jeanne Jomelli, Kirby-Lunn, Nellie Melba (only appearance in Boston), Messrs. Ferruccio Busoni, Carlo Buonamici. Assisting artists. Messrs. Mischa Elman, Charles Gilibert, Jose Hofman, Francis MacMillen, Sylvain Noack, Alwin Schroeder, Heinrich Warnke and Anton Witek (first appearance in Boston). The public rehearsals are to be held on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 7 to April 28. The concerts Saturday evenings to begin Oct. 8 and end March 24. Six dates to be omitted during this time.

Mechanics Exposition, with an old time Mechanics Fair, will hold sway at Mechanics Building from Oct. 3 to 29. Among the exhibits will be Thos. A. Edison's inventions, the making of a daily newspaper, making of a Goodyear Welt shoe and a magnificent Art Loan exhibit. The United States Marine Band through the courtesy of President Taft, will furnish the music for the first two weeks.

E ... 1884

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ... SEP 25 1910

MUSIC NOTES

—Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra who are renewing for the series of 1910-1911 may now obtain tickets for the concerts at Miss Harris' office in Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1119 Chestnut street. It is advisable that old subscribers get their tickets as soon as possible, as there is a long waiting list of new subscribers. The five concerts, as already announced, will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba. This, it is said, will be her only appearance in Philadelphia this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann; in January, Mischa Elman; in February, Heinrich Warnke, and in March, Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

—The Choral Society ...

Estabi ... 884

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ...

* * *

A novelty to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter will be Delius's "Appalachia," a series of variations on a Mississippi Valley negro melody, scored for chorus and orchestra. Henry Hadley's "Culprit Fay," performed at Willow Grove, will also be given.

E ... , New York, 1884

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ... SEP 24 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this season give its usual series of five concerts at the Academy of Music, the dates being Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert, Madame Melba will be the soloist.

Established: London, 1881; New ... 1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ...

... continue till October 6.

* * *

The dates of the Boston Symphony concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, March 20. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann; in January, Mischa Elman; in February, Heinrich Warnke, and in March, Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

E ... 1884

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ... SEP 25

* * *

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are renewing for the series of 1910-1911, may now secure their tickets for the concerts at Miss Harris' ticket office, in Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut Street. It is advisable that old subscribers get their tickets as soon as possible, as there is a long waiting list of new subscribers which must be attended to in the near future. The five concerts, as already announced, will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. A most brilliant list of soloists is announced. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, in January Mischa Elman, in February Heinrich Warnke and in March Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

* * *

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra who are renewing for the series of 1910-1911 may now secure their tickets for the concerts at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. It is advisable that old subscribers get their tickets as soon as possible, as there is a long waiting list of new subscribers which much be attended to in the near future. The five concerts, as already announced, will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. A brilliant list of soloists is announced. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, in January Mischa Elman, in February Heinrich Warnke and in March Made ... Kirkby-Lunn.

Estab ... 884

From ITEM

Address PHILADELPHIA PA

Date SEP 25 1910

Anton Witek, late of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and successor to Willy Hess as concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in New York on Tuesday. Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, is due to arrive a week later. The usual ten concerts will be given in New York on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the date being Nov. 10 and 12, Dec. 8 and 10, Jan. 14 and 16, Feb. 23 and 15, and March 23 and 25.

Est ... rk, 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From AMERICA

Address ...

Date SEP 25 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. William Albaugh is now ready at his office at the corner of Charles and Fayette streets to distribute tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to last year's subscribers who are renewing. The dates of the five concerts are November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

E ... k, 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date SEP 24

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

Subscription Tickets Are Now On Sale At Albaugh's Agency.

William Albaugh is now ready at his office, at the corner of Charles and Fayette streets, to distribute tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to last year's subscribers who are renewing. The dates of the five concerts are Wednesday evenings, November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22. Madame Melba will be the soloist at the November concert, and this will be her only appearance in Baltimore during the season. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, in January Mischa Elman and in March Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. In February Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will again be given, with the co-operation of the Baltimore Oratorio Society. Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey will be the soprano soloist. The other members of the quartet will be announced in due time.

E ... ork, 1884

From STAR

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. William Albaugh is now ready at his office at the corner of Charles and Fayette streets to distribute tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to last year's subscribers who are renewing. The dates of the five concerts, as already announced, are Wednesday evenings, November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

Estab ... 884

From ...

Address ...

Date SEP 25 1910

FIVE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Providence to Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra Fifteen This Season.

The year book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a vast amount of work has been cut out for it for the coming season. A total of 112 Symphony concerts will be given and these together with the two concerts of the pension fund and three concerts in Boston in connection with the Cecilia Society will make a grand total of 117. This is the largest number of concerts the orchestra has ever undertaken and it is a question whether any orchestra in the world has ever given so many Symphony concerts in the course of seven months.

Providence is among the cities whose quota of concerts has been increased for this year there will be five instead of four as last year, the demand having warranted this increased number. The schedule calls for the usual 24 rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston; 10 concerts in New York; eight in Cambridge; five each in Providence, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington; four in New Bedford; three each in Worcester, Hartford; and one each in Northampton, Brockton, New Haven, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Syracuse, Albany and Waterbury, Conn.

The dates of the Providence concerts are as follows: Oct. 25, Nov. 23, Jan. 4, Feb. 14 and April 4.

Est ... 3?

[18]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From NEWS BUREAU
Address BOSTON, MASS.
Date SEP 27 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEAT SALE.

Boston—The auction sale of rehearsal seats for the 30th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was opened yesterday in Symphony Hall. Bids for seats in the first 36 rows on the floor, or from A to KK. and for the sides of the first balcony and the first four rows at the end of the balcony, were premiums over the regular $18 price per seat. Not more than four seats could be sold on one bid.

There was an attendance of over 200. Bidding immediately became spirited. Seat 1 in A row which usually commands $7 or $8 premium, was finally sold at $17 premium. When the center aisle of A row was reached premiums of from $22 to $25 per seat were numerous. The highest premium in A row was $25.50 each for two seats one of which was on center aisle.

When B row was reached the extreme end seat sold for $18 premium from which price the premium rose to $31 for a seat on the center aisle. Numerous seats in B row commanded as high as $22 to $28 premium. High premium in B row last year was $4.

In C row $25 to $30 premium was paid for choice seats, the highest premium being $30.50.

In D row near centre aisle as high as $33 was paid. In many instances premiums paid this year were from 100 to 150% more than paid for the same seats one or two years ago.

HERALD, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1910.

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE'S LAST DAY

Regular Concert $10 Seats Will Be Put up for Bids at 10 O'Clock This Morning.

$52 PREMIUM YESTERDAY

Tickets for the Rehearsals in More Exclusive Demand Than for Concerts.

This is the fourth and last day in the auction of season seats for Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The sale yesterday, which lasted throughout the day, was devoted to the $18 seats for the series of regular Saturday evening concerts, to begin Oct. 8.

At the closing sale, which will begin at 10 A. M. today, the $10 seats for the regular concerts will be auctioned off to the highest bidders. These seats comprise the last 8½ rows on the floor, from KK to SS, inclusive; rows E to I in the first balcony, and the entire second balcony.

The $18 seats for Friday afternoon rehearsals were sold Monday, the $10 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, and the second balcony was reserved, as is customary at reahearsals, for the 25-cent patrons.

The highest premium paid yesterday was $52, in addition to the regular price of $18 for a single or so-called "bachelor" seat, numbered 18 on the left of the centre aisle in row M. This made the total cost of the seat $70.

The highest premium paid for rehearsal seats was $73, which made the cost of each of the four chairs bought at that figure $91, or $21 more than the biggest bonus money paid by the lone bidder yesterday.

The second highest premium paid yesterday was $29 each for seats 18, 19 and 20 in row K. The $10 balcony seats brought $40 premiums in a few instances, and not lower than $4.

Apparently music lovers are not superstitious. Seats numbered 18 and 23 were bid for just as briskly as any others.

The premiums yesterday averaged one-fourth lower than those which marked the rehearsal sale. The Friday afternoon rehearsals are attended chiefly by society patrons, children and music students. As a result they are regarded as somewhat more exclusive than the regular Saturday evening concerts; hence yesterday's bargain sales.

The two seats next to the single $52 seat brought only $21.50 each, and two seats adjoining them went for $16. The difference in the premiums paid for rehearsal seats and the regular concert seats is illustrated by the sale in row N. Monday seats 15, 16 and 17 went for $72, and seats 18 and 19 brought the top price of the sale, $73. Yesterday the bids for these seats opened at $10. Seats numbered 15, 16, 17 and 18 went for $20.50, a drop of $52.50, and seat 19 brought only $18.50.

When Auctioneer Jackson opened the sale shortly after 10 o'clock, the bids were started rather low. The highest premiums paid for seats in row A were $15 and the lowest $4.

In row J some of the seats sold for as low a premium as $4.50. The most obtained for any seats in this row yesterday in addition to the regular price of $18, was $17.50, compared with $50 paid at the rehearsal sale. In row K, where some of the seats sold on Monday for $30 premiums, the most obtained yesterday were premiums of $29 each for seats 18, 19 and 20.

Row W, which is the end of the cross-aisle, sold at from $4 to $9 premiums, which was considered very low for this, the body of the house.

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1910

SYMPHONY SEATS IN DEMAND

Opening Sale of Seats for Saturday-Evening Concerts Shows Higher Prices Paid Than a Year Ago

At Symphony Hall the concluding sale by auction of seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place today and as this final sale offers opportunity to buy good places at most reasonable prices, there was, as always, eagerness to secure them. The seats on sale were of the $10 class, including rear seats on the floor and the rear rows of the centre section of the first balcony, also the 505 seats making up the entire second balcony, the places which for Friday rehearsals are sold for twenty-five cents each, unreserved, and termed "rush" seats. The final sale brought premiums equalling or averaging higher than those of a year ago.

Yesterday the $18 seats for the regular series of twenty-four Saturday evening concerts were sold and the attendance was about as it was at the sale on Monday for the same seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals. The highest premium paid yesterday was $52. The bidding at the opening lacked the spirited eagerness shown at the Monday sale, but the sale had not been long in progress before it took on more lively interest. Custom has shown that premiums paid for the Saturday concerts are never so high as those which the rehearsal seats bring. Summed up, it may be said that while the early part of the sale was marked by prices lower than those obtained a year ago, this condition was only brief and soon the premiums equalled and surpassed those of last season, so that the average of prices proved higher than a year ago.

The first sale, in Row A, was at $2, as against $18 for the same seats for the rehearsals, and $14.50 was the highest price paid in this front row, whereas at Monday's sale the maximum premium in Row A was $25.50. In Row B there were sales at $2, as there were in following rows, and in B the highest price paid was $11, as against $31 at the rehearsal sale on Monday. Not until Row I was reached did the premium strike $20, and in K there was a sale at $40, whereas at the earlier sale as high as $50 premium was obtained in rows front of that.

The highest sale at $52 premium was for seats in the middle part of Row M, in which rehearsal tickets brought up to $68. It was in the row back of this, N, that the record price of $73 was reached last Monday, as it was again in Row R.

After the sale in Row M at $52, excellent seats could be purchased in succeeding rows at moderate premiums, with $31 in Row P as among the highest prices. The purchasers were for the most part music lovers who prefer the Saturday evening concerts to the Friday afternoon rehearsals and who attend the sales to buy individually, rather than to commission the ticket brokers to look after their needs. The brokers, however, were on hand, as usual, and secured many good tickets at about the same premiums that the more private buyers paid.

Thursday's sale included seats on the floor from the front row to as far back as Row KK and also the sides of the first balcony and rear of that part of the hall, through Row D.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 1, 1910

CHEAPER SYMPHONY SEATS IN BRISK DEMAND

At Symphony hall the concluding sale by auction of seats for the Saturday evening concerts for the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday, and as this final sale offers opportunity to buy good places at most reasonable prices, the demand was brisk.

The seats on sale were of the $10 class, including rear seats on the floor and the rear rows of the centre section of the first balcony, also the 505 seats making up the entire second balcony, the places which for Friday rehearsals are sold for 25 cents each, unreserved, and termed "rush" seats.

The final sales brought premiums equalling or averaging higher than those of a year ago.

SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 2, 1910.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces the usual eight concerts to be given in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, on Thursday evenings during the coming winter, the dates being Oct 20, Nov 17, Dec 15, Jan 19, Feb 9, March 2 and 30, and April 27.

The soloists will include Charles Gilbert, French baritone; Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Anto Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; Edmond Clement, French tenor; Kirkby Lunn, contralto; Cornelie Overstreet, pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

Subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by application to University book store, Harvard sq, on or before Wednesday, Oct 12.

HERALD, BOSTON, OCTOBER 2, 1910.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Concerts of Friday Afternoon, Oct. 7, and Saturday Evening, Oct. 8.

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7 and 8, respectively. As usual, the hall is completely sold out for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, except the second balcony, which is held for "rush" seats at 25 cents each. For Saturday night there will be a limited number of seats on sale at the box office, although the greater part of these will be disposed of as season tickets in the course of the next week or 10 days.

For his first concert, Mr. Fiedler, who arrived in New York yesterday, has made out a program in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann, following the many celebrations of this event in Germany during the past summer. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, again a member of the orchestra. The program includes the "Manfred" overture, the "Rhenish" symphony, the concerto for violoncello and the "Genoveva" overture.

CONCERTS IN CAMBRIDGE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces the usual eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, Thursday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 9, March 2, March 30 and April 27.

At the first concert Charles Gilibert, the distinguished French baritone, will sing. The soloist at the second will be Miss Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; at the third, Josef Hofmann, pianist; at the fourth, Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; at the fifth, Edmond Clement, the French tenor, who made a marked impression in New York last winter; at the sixth, Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, contralto; at the seventh, Miss Corneille Overstreet, pianist, and at the eighth and last, Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

Subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by application to George H. Kent, University Book Store, Harvard square, on or before Wednesday, Oct. 12. All unclaimed seats will be offered for sale at the same place on Saturday morning, Oct. 15. A limited number of seats has been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 2, 1910

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra will be held on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7 and 8 respectively. As usual, the hall is completely sold out for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, except the second balcony, which is held for "rush" seats at 25 cents each. For Saturday night there will be a limited number of seats on sale at the box office, although the greater part of these will be disposed of as season tickets in the course of the next week or 10 days.

For his first concert, Mr. Fiedler, who arrived in New York yesterday, has made out a programme in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann, following the many celebrations of this event in Germany during the past summer. The soloist will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who will this year again be a member of the orchestra. The programme comprises the "Manfred" overture, the "Rhenish" symphony, the Concerto for violoncello and the "Genoveva" overture. Lovers of Schumann will not miss this opportunity to hear so much of his music.

GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1910

PREMIUMS ONLY $1.50.

Purchasers Get Seats in Last Row on Floor for Saturday Symphony Concerts for $11.50.

Season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts by the Symphony orchestra were sold for $11.50 in row SS, the last on the floor, yesterday, and purchasers at that figure who paid a premium of only $1.50 will enjoy the concerts at a rate of less than 50 cents each. It was the last day of the auction and the $10 Saturday night seats were sold. They included the last 8½ rows on the floor, the last 4½ in the first balcony and the whole second balcony.

The largest premium in the $10 sale was $22.50 each for three seats in the first row of the second balcony. First row seats on the right side of the second balcony brought as high as $22.50, $18 and $15, while on the left side, though the seats were equally good, the average was $10. While there were fluctuations and bargains, the sales of the $10 seats were somewhat better on the average than last year.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2, 19.

Symphony Concerts.

The first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra will be held on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. As usual the hall is completely sold out for the Friday afternoon rehearsals except the second balcony, which is held for "rush" seats at twenty-five cents each. For Saturday night there will be a limited number of seats on sale at the box office, although the greater part of these will be disposed of as season tickets in the course of the next week or ten days.

For the first concert Mr. Fiedler, who arrived in New York yesterday, has made out a program in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann, following the many celebrations of this event in Germany during the past Summer. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who will this year again be a member of the orchestra. The program comprises the "Manfred" overture, the "Rhenish" symphony, the concerto for violoncello and the "Genoveva" overture. Lovers of Schumann will not miss this opportunity to hear so much of his music.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the usual eight concerts to be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings during the coming Winter, the dates being October 20, November 17, December 15, January 19, February 9, March 2, March 30 and April 27.

A most brilliant list of soloists is announced for the series. At the first concert Charles Gilibert, the distinguished French baritone, will appear. The soloist at the second concert will be Miss Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; at the third concert Josef Hofmann, pianist; at the fourth, Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; at the fifth, Edmond Clemont, the French tenor, who made such an impression in New York last Winter; at the sixth, Madame Kirkby-Lunn, contralto; at the seventh, Miss Cornelius Overstreet, pianist, and at the eighth and last, Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

* * *

The Kneisel Quartet will give a series of four concerts at Chickering Hall during the coming season. The concerts will be held on Tuesday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10 and February 21. The quartet this season includes Franz Kneisel, first violin; Julius Roentgen, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola, and William Willeke, 'cello.

As usual the Kneisels will play interesting novelties. In addition to the favorite classics there will be performed for the first time a Suite Basque by Charles Bordes for flute, two violins, viola and cello, a manuscript quartet by Rubin Goldmark and a new quartet by Max Reger.

The Kneisel Quartet will make an extensive tour of the country this season and its concerts in the East are slightly curtailed in number.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1910.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY

Program to Commemorate 100th Anniversary of Schumann.

SOLOIST WILL BE ALWIN SCHROEDER

Russell Promises Many Novelties for Season at Boston Opera House.

The first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra will be held on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. As usual the hall is completely sold out for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, except the second balcony, which is held for "rush" seats. For Saturday night there will be a limited number of seats on sale at the box office.

For his first concert Mr. Fiedler, who arrived in New York yesterday, has made out a program in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who will this year again be a member of the orchestra. The program comprises the "Manfred" overture, the "Rhenish" symphony, the concerto for 'cello and the "Genoveva"

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From NEWS BURE

Address BOSTON, MASS.

Date SEP 27 1910 SEP 27 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEAT SALE.

Boston—The auction sale of rehearsal seats for the 30th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was opened yesterday in Symphony Hall. Bids for seats in the first 36 rows on the floor, or from A to KK. and for the sides of the first balcony and the first four rows at the end of the balcony, were premiums over the regular $18 price per seat. Not more than four seats could be sold on one bid.

There was an attendance of over 200. Bidding immediately became spirited. Seat 1 in A row which usually commands $7 or $8 premium, was finally sold at $17 premium. When the center aisle of A row was reached premiums of from $22 to $25 per seat were numerous. The highest premium in A row was $25.50 each for two seats one of which was on center aisle.

When B row was reached the extreme end seat sold for $18 premium from which price the premium rose to $31 for a seat on the center aisle. Numerous seats in B row commanded as high as $22 to $28 premium. High premium in B row last year was $4.

In C row $25 to $30 premium was paid for choice seats, the highest premium being $30.50.

In D row near centre aisle as high as $33 was paid. In many instances premiums paid this year were from 100 to 150% more than paid for the same seats one or two years ago.

HERALD, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1910.

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE'S LAST DAY

Regular Concert $10 Seats Will Be Put up for Bids at 10 O'Clock This Morning.

$52 PREMIUM YESTERDAY

Tickets for the Rehearsals in More Exclusive Demand Than for Concerts.

This is the fourth and last day in the auction of season seats for Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The sale yesterday, which lasted throughout the day, was devoted to the $18 seats for the series of regular Saturday evening concerts, to begin Oct. 8.

At the closing sale, which will begin at 10 A. M. today, the $10 seats for the regular concerts will be auctioned off to the highest bidders. These seats comprise the last 8½ rows on the floor, from KK to SS, inclusive; rows E to I in the first balcony, and the entire second balcony.

The $18 seats for Friday afternoon rehearsals were sold Monday, the $10 seats for rehearsals on Tuesday, and the second balcony was reserved, as is customary at reahearsals, for the 25-cent patrons.

The highest premium paid yesterday was $52, in addition to the regular price of $18 for a single or so-called "bachelor" seat, numbered 18 on the left of the centre aisle in row M. This made the total cost of the seat $70.

The highest premium paid for rehearsal seats was $73, which made the cost of each of the four chairs bought at that figure $91, or $21 more than the biggest bonus money paid by the lone bidder yesterday.

The second highest premium paid yesterday was $29 each for seats 18, 19 and 20 in row K. The $10 balcony seats brought $40 premiums in a few instances, and not lower than $4.

Apparently music lovers are not superstitious. Seats numbered 13 and 23 were bid for just as briskly as any others.

The premiums yesterday averaged one-fourth lower than those which marked the rehearsal sale. The Friday afternoon rehearsals are attended chiefly by society patrons, children and music students. As a result they are regarded as somewhat more exclusive than the regular Saturday evening concerts; hence yesterday's bargain sales.

The two seats next to the single $52 seat brought only $21.50 each, and two seats adjoining them went for $16. The difference in the premiums paid for rehearsal seats and the regular concert seats is illustrated by the sale in row N. Monday seats 15, 16 and 17 went for $72, and seats 18 and 19 brought the top price of the sale, $73. Yesterday the bids for these seats opened at $10. Seats numbered 15, 16, 17 and 18 went for $20.50, a drop of $52.50, and seat 19 brought only $18.50.

When Auctioneer Jackson opened the sale shortly after 10 o'clock, the bids were started rather low. The highest premiums paid for seats in row A were $15 and the lowest $4.

In row J some of the seats sold for as low a premium as $4.50. The most obtained for any seats in this row yesterday in addition to the regular price of $18, was $17.50, compared with $50 paid at the rehearsal sale. In row K, where some of the seats sold on Monday for $60 premiums, the most obtained yesterday were premiums of $29 each for seats 18, 19 and 20.

Row W, which is the end of the cross-aisle, sold at from $4 to $9 premiums, which was considered very low for this, the body of the house.

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1910

SYMPHONY SEATS IN DEMAND

Opening Sale of Seats for Saturday-Evening Concerts Shows Higher Prices Paid Than a Year Ago

At Symphony Hall the concluding sale by auction of seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place today and as this final sale offers opportunity to buy good places at most reasonable prices,, there was, as always, eagerness to secure them. The seats on sale were of the $10 class, including rear seats on the floor and the rear rows of the centre section of the first balcony, also the 505 seats making up the entire second balcony, the places which for Friday rehearsals are sold for twenty-five cents each, unreserved, and termed "rush" seats. The final sale brought premiums equalling or averaging higher than those of a year ago.

Yesterday the $18 seats for the regular series of twenty-four Saturday evening concerts were sold and the attendance was about as it was at the sale on Monday for the same seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals. The highest premium paid yesterday was $52. The bidding at the opening lacked the spirited eagerness shown at the Monday sale, but the sale had not been long in progress before it took on more lively interest. Custom has shown that premiums paid for the Saturday concerts are never so high as those which the rehearsal seats bring. Summed up, it may be said that while the early part of the sale was marked by prices lower than those obtained a year ago, this condition was only brief and soon the premiums equalled and surpassed those of last season, so that the average of prices proved higher than a year ago.

The first sale, in Row A, was at $2, as against $18 for the same seats for the rehearsals, and $14.50 was the highest price paid in this front row, whereas at Monday's sale the maximum premium in Row A was $25.50. In Row B there were sales at $2, as there were in following rows, and in B the highest price paid was $11, as against $31 at the rehearsal sale on Monday. Not until Row I was reached did the premium strike $20, and in K there was a sale at $40, whereas at the earlier sale as high as $50 premium was obtained in rows front of that.

The highest sale at $52 premium was for seats in the middle part of Row M, in which rehearsal tickets brought up to $68. It was in the row back of this, N, that the record price of $73 was reached last Monday, as it was again in Row R.

After the sale in Row M at $52, excellent seats could be purchased in succeeding rows at moderate premiums, with $31 in Row P as among the highest prices. The purchasers were for the most part music lovers who prefer the Saturday evening concerts to the Friday afternoon rehearsals and who attend the sales to buy individually, rather than to commission the ticket brokers to look after their needs. The brokers, however, were on hand, as usual, and secured many good tickets at about the same premiums that the more private buyers paid.

Thursday's sale included seats on the floor from the front row to as far back as Row KK and also the sides of the first balcony and rear of that part of the hall, through Row D.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 1, 1910

CHEAPER SYMPHONY SEATS IN BRISK DEMAND

At Symphony hall the concluding sale by auction of seats for the Saturday evening concerts for the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday, and as this final sale offers opportunity to buy good places at most reasonable prices, the demand was brisk.

The seats on sale were of the $10 class, including rear seats on the floor and the rear rows of the centre section of the first balcony, also the 505 seats making up the entire second balcony, the places which for Friday rehearsals are sold for 25 cents each, unreserved, and termed "rush" seats.

The final sales brought premiums equalling or averaging higher than those of a year ago.

SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 2, 1910.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces the usual eight concerts to be given in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, on Thursday evenings during the coming winter, the dates being Oct 20, Nov 17, Dec 15, Jan 19, Feb 9, March 2 and 30, and April 27.

The soloists will include Charles Gilibert, French baritone; Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Anto Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; Edmond Clement, French tenor; Kirkby Lunn, contralto; Corneille Overstreet, pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

Subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by application to University book store, Harvard sq, on or before Wednesday, Oct 12.

HERALD, BOSTON, OCTOBER 2, 1910.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Concerts of Friday Afternoon, Oct. 7, and Saturday Evening, Oct. 8.

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7 and 8, respectively. As usual, the hall is completely sold out for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, except the second balcony, which is held for "rush" seats at 25 cents each. For Saturday night there will be a limited number of seats on sale at the box office, although the greater part of these will be disposed of as season tickets in the course of the next week or 10 days.

For his first concert, Mr. Fiedler, who arrived in New York yesterday, has made out a program in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann, following the many celebrations of this event in Germany during the past summer. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, again a member of the orchestra. The program includes the "Manfred" overture, the "Rhenish" symphony, the concerto for violoncello and the "Genoveva" overture.

CONCERTS IN CAMBRIDGE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces the usual eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, Thursday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 9, March 2, March 30 and April 27.

At the first concert Charles Gilibert, the distinguished French baritone, will sing. The soloist at the second will be Miss Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; at the third, Josef Hofmann, pianist; at the fourth, Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; at the fifth, Edmond Clement, the French tenor, who made a marked impression in New York last winter; at the sixth, Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, contralto; at the seventh, Miss Corneille Overstreet, pianist, and at the eighth and last, Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

Subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by application to George H. Kent, University Book Store, Harvard square, on or before Wednesday, Oct. 12. All unclaimed seats will be offered for sale at the same place on Saturday morning, Oct. 15. A limited number of seats has been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 2, 1910

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra will be held on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7 and 8 respectively. As usual, the hall is completely sold out for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, except the second balcony, which is held for "rush" seats at 25 cents each. For Saturday night there will be a limited number of seats on sale at the box office, although the greater part of these will be disposed of as season tickets in the course of the next week or 10 days.

For his first concert, Mr. Fiedler, who arrived in New York yesterday, has made out a programme in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann, following the many celebrations of this event in Germany during the past summer. The soloist will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who will this year again be a member of the orchestra. The programme comprises the "Manfred" overture, the "Rhenish" symphony, the Concerto for violoncello and the "Genoveva" overture. Lovers of Schumann will not miss this opportunity to hear so much of his music.

GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1910.

PREMIUMS ONLY $1.50.

Purchasers Get Seats in Last Row on Floor for Saturday Symphony Concerts for $11.50.

Season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts by the Symphony orchestra were sold for $11.50 in row SS, the last on the floor, yesterday, and purchasers at that figure who paid a premium of only $1.50 will enjoy the concerts at a rate of less than 50 cents each. It was the last day of the auction and the $10 Saturday night seats were sold. They included the last 8½ rows on the floor, the last 4½ in the first balcony and the whole second balcony.

The largest premium in the $10 sale was $22.50 each for three seats in the first row of the second balcony. First row seats on the right side of the second balcony brought as high as $22.50, $18 and $15, while on the left side, though the seats were equally good, the average was $10. While there were fluctuations and bargains, the sales of the $10 seats were somewhat better on the average than last year.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2, 19

Symphony Concerts.

The first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra will be held on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. As usual the hall is completely sold out for the Friday afternoon rehearsals except the second balcony, which is held for "rush" seats at twenty-five cents each. For Saturday night there will be a limited number of seats on sale at the box office, although the greater part of these will be disposed of as season tickets in the course of the next week or ten days.

For the first concert Mr. Fiedler, who arrived in New York yesterday, has made out a program in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann, following the many celebrations of this event in Germany during the past Summer. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who will this year again be a member of the orchestra. The program comprises the "Manfred" overture, the "Rhenish" symphony, the concerto for violoncello and the "Genoveva" overture. Lovers of Schumann will not miss this opportunity to hear so much of his music.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the usual eight concerts to be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings during the coming Winter, the dates being October 20, November 17, December 15, January 19, February 9, March 2, March 30 and April 27.

A most brilliant list of soloists is announced for the series. At the first concert Charles Gilibert, the distinguished French baritone, will appear. The soloist at the second concert will be Miss Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; at the third concert Josef Hofmann, pianist; at the fourth, Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; at the fifth, Edmond Clemont, the French tenor, who made such an impression in New York last Winter; at the sixth, Madame Kirkby-Lunn, contralto; at the seventh, Miss Cornelius Overstreet, pianist, and at the eighth and last, Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

* * *

The Kneisel Quartet will give a series of four concerts at Chickering Hall during the coming season. The concerts will be held on Tuesday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10 and February 21. The quartet this season includes Franz Kneisel, first violin; Julius Roentgen, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola, and William Willeke, 'cello.

As usual the Kneisels will play interesting novelties. In addition to the favorite classics there will be performed for the first time a Suite Basque by Charles Bordes for flute, two violins, viola and cello, a manuscript quartet by Rubin Goldmark and a new quartet by Max Reger.

The Kneisel Quartet will make an extensive tour of the country this season and its concerts in the East are slightly curtailed in number.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1910.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY

Program to Commemorate 100th Anniversary of Schumann.

SOLOIST WILL BE ALWIN SCHROEDER

Russell Promises Many Novelties for Season at Boston Opera House.

The first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra will be held on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. As usual the hall is completely sold out for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, except the second balcony, which is held for "rush" seats. For Saturday night there will be a limited number of seats on sale at the box office.

For his first concert Mr. Fiedler, who arrived in New York yesterday, has made out a program in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann. The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who will this year again be a member of the orchestra. The program comprises the "Manfred" overture, the "Rhenish" symphony, the concerto for 'cello and the "Genoveva" overture.

[19]

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 2, 1910

Anton Witek Has Come to Boston to Stay, He Says

MRS. ANTON WITEK, WIFE OF THE NEW SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER, WHO IS SO FASCINATED WITH BOSTON THAT HER HUSBAND WILL MAKE HIS PERMANENT HOME HERE.

The new concert master of the Symphony orchestra, Anton Witek, declared yesterday that he has come to Boston to stay. He will stay, he said, because his wife is fascinated with Boston, its environment and its society.

Herr Witek has engaged a suite at the Hotel Ilkley, 176 Huntington avenue. He is now stopping for a short time at the Hemenway chambers.

Neither the concert master nor his wife was ever in Boston before their arrival here four days ago. Mr. Witek explained that the chief reason for his coming to Boston was the large number of students of music who have contracted to study under him in this city.

"At first I was not so very favorably impressed with Boston" the German musician said. "I had only seen the business section. My wife was quicker to become accustomed to the city, and once we had called on some friends in the Back Bay and had motored through the Back Bay and Jamaica Plain park system, she persuaded me that Boston was the best American city we have ever visited.

"It is refreshingly quiet here compared with the bustle and turmoil in New York and Chicago. There everyone seems fighting for money, while it appears here in Boston that most people have all the money they want, and therefore have more time for art, music, literature and the best things in life.

"I admire your architecture in Boston, but it makes me laugh the reverence you show for buildings two or three hundred years old. Those are quite ordinary sights in Germany.

"In Boston it seems that people make more of their time than elsewhere. Young men of 25 and 30 seem here to be occupying positions that in Germany we would not expect them to occupy before 35 to

"The Boston public library appears to be an excellently managed institution, and its musical department is very valuable."

Herr Witek was accompanied to this country by a party of American music students who took lessons under him in Berlin. His last engagement was at Scheveningen, Holland, and he came directly from that place to Boston.

The new concert master has led concerts in nearly every city of importance in Germany, Russia, Austria-Hungary and the Netherlands.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1910.

CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the usual eight concerts to be given in Sanders Theater, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 9, March 2, March 30 and April 27.

A brilliant list of soloists is announced for the series. At the first concert Charles Gilibert, the distinguished French baritone, will appear; at the second, Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; at the third, Josef Hofmann, pianist; at the fourth, Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; at the fifth, Edmond Clement, the French tenor; at the sixth, Madame Kirby-Lunn, contralto; at the seventh, Corneille Overstreet, pianist; at the eighth, Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1910.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

Rehearsals Are Now in Progress for the Season's Opening.

The Symphony orchestra met for its first rehearsal Monday morning and now is plunged into the midst of the work of the season. Some of the new members of the orchestra who are coming from abroad have not yet arrived owing to the difficulty in securing passage, but they will be drifting in within the next week or so.

Mr Witek, the new concert master, assumed his place for the first time and Mr Max Kunze, for many years a member of the orchestra, has become leader of the double basses in place of Mr Carl Keller.

Tonight the orchestra gives the first concert of the season in Northampton at Smith college, where a new auditorium is to be opened and a new organ tested, the concert being generally in honor of the inauguration of the new president of that institution.

The program for the first concerts here on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is devoted entirely to Schumann in celebration of the 100th anniversary of his birth, the works being "Genoveva" and "Manfred" overtures; the seldom-heard concerto for violoncello, and the "Rhenish" symphony.

Mr Alwin Schroeder, who is again a member of the orchestra, will be the soloist. There is a limited number of seats for the Saturday evening concert which go on sale at the box office, Symphony hall, this morning.

JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1910.

SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT SMITH COLLEGE

Tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first concert of the season at Smith College, Northampton, in honor of the inauguration of the new president of that institution. The program for the first concerts here on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is devoted entirely to Schumann, in celebration of the great German's centennial, the works being the "Genoveva" and "Manfred" overtures, the seldom-heard concerto for violoncello, and the "Rhenish" symphony. Alwin Schroeder, who is again a member of the orchestra, will be the soloist. A limited number of seats for the Saturday night performance will be put on sale today.

THE CHRONICLE. OCTOBER 1, 1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged commemorative programms for the first Symphony concerts, in honor of the centenary of Schumann's birth, June 8, 1910. The program for next Friday and Saturday is as follows: Schumann: Overture, "Manfred," Op. 115; Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3; Op. 97 (Rhenish); Concerto for violoncello with orchestra, Op. 129; Overture, "Genoveva," Op. 81; Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE RETURN OF DR. MUCK TO BOSTON

A Definite Statement from Berlin That He Will Become the Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra Again in the Autumn of 1912—The Berlinese Views of Mr. Witek's Departure and Mr. Hess's Return—The Virtuosi and Their "Personalities"—Singers of the Boston Opera in France—Mr. Fiedler at Work Again—St. Louis and "Salome"—Mr. Damrosch's New Orchestral Pieces

ALTHOUGH very little has been said here in public of the return of Dr. Muck to Boston, it is now definitely understood in Berlin, on the authority of the conductor himself, that in the autumn of 1912, two years hence, he will become again the director of the Symphony Orchestra and for a long term. When Dr. Muck left Boston in the spring of 1908, it was an open secret that he would gladly have continued as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, did not his contract with the Royal Opera enforce his return to Berlin. It was almost as well known that the management of the orchestra would have retained him as willingly and that it was prepared to reengage him as soon as he was free from prior obligations in Germany. It has since been stated that Dr. Muck's contract with the Royal Opera would end in the spring of 1912, and circumstances have lately conspired to disclose the use that he will make of his new freedom. In a word, he will return to Boston and become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, for what despatches from Berlin call "a prolonged period."

Last June, it will be recalled, Mr. Weingartner offered his resignation as the director of the Imperial Opera at Vienna, the most distinguished post in its kind in the German-speaking world. It was offered promptly to Dr. Muck. Almost as speedily he declined it, saying that he had made engagements which required his return to America for some years. The terms of his reply were printed in the German and the French newspapers and repeated freely last summer in Germany by his friends. Bostonians who encountered him in their travels received a like, though more vague, assurance from his own lips, while it was common knowledge, so to say, in the "musical circles" that the festivals at Munich and Salzburg gathered that Dr. Muck, in the autumn of 1912, would become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again. Yesterday, to clinch the whole matter, the New York Times printed the following despatch from its correspondent in Berlin, who found his authority, doubtless, in similar statements in the Berlinese newspapers: "Dr. Karl Muck, the celebrated conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera, who directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra several years ago, has decided to accept another engagement for a period of several years with the Boston organization. Dr. Muck's contracts in Berlin will keep him occupied here until 1912. After that he expects to make his home in Boston for a prolonged period." By these tokens, then, the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra is determined for several years to come. Mr. Fiedler will complete his present term, which runs through the spring of 1912. In the following autumn Dr. Muck will resume the place that no man has filled as did he. H. T. P.

Boston, Berlin and Concert-Masters

BERLIN and Boston have made a fair exchange of concert-masters. Willy Hess, who has settled in Berlin, is now, it appears, to take the chair in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, for many years occupied by Anton Witek, who has gone to Boston to take his place with the Boston Symphony. But there is a bitter feeling among the Berliners towards Witek; there usually is outspoken resentment when they see long-established favorites suddenly swallow the bait of higher remuneration, and, it may be, higher honors, in this "Dollarland" so heartily loathed and despised by the stay-at-homes. And they have been trying to decide in the affirmative the question, "Is Witek kontraktbrüchig?" which, being translated, means guilty of contract-breaking, the most undesirable stigma that could befall an artist in Germany or Austria.

The whole trouble lies in the fact that Mr. Witek's Berlin contract does not expire till next year. The Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, inclined to feel resentful, thus discusses the matter: "For reasons of principle arising out of the peculiar constitution of this organization, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra could not agree to a pramature dissolution of this contract, which does not expire before next year. There is, therefore, a breach of contract here evident, which, it is true, the peculiar circumstances make comprehensible to a certain extent. As, however, the Boston Orchestra, on its part, admits no contract-breaking members of other orchestras into its ranks, it remains o be seen how Mr. Witek will fare over there. At the same time it is to be supposed that Witek did not take his 'flight' across the ocean as a blind leap. It may, then, be assumed that for this 'special' case an exception to the rule has been made in Boston."

Die Signale has no patience with the question and dismisses it in a few lines: "Musical Berlin has known for months that Boston and Berlin were going to exchange Concert-masters Witek and Hess. Moreover, Witek made no secret whatever of the Boston engagement, and when he was married in June it must have been clear to the most incredulous that he was in earnest about going to America." And now in September he has to submit to being declared "kontraktbrüchig" by a Berlin newspaper! It is astounding what sources of misinformation the news of the art world becomes in many daily papers. [Berlin correspondence of Musical America.

[20]

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 2 - 1910

Established

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY'S NEW CONCERT MASTER

Nicholas Sokoloff Here for Altschuler's Season.

B'KLYN'S BOSTON CONCERTS.

Walter Damrosch Declares that the Classics Will Not Be Neglected by Him.

Announcement is made by the Institute of Arts and Sciences, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society that the five Philharmonic concerts which will be given in the Opera House during the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fielder, conductor, will take place on Friday evenings, the dates being November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24, and March 24. The soloists will be in the order of their coming, Madame Jomelli, soprano; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Ferruccio Busoni, pianist; and Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist.

Holders of season tickets for the five concerts of the year 1909-1910, who have not already renewed their subscriptions for the series of five concerts for the coming year 1910-1911 may renew their subscriptions for the seats occupied by them last year, respectively, at any time on or before Saturday, Oct. 22, 1910, at 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Old subscribers of the year 1909-10, who renew their subscriptions on or before Oct. 22 at 6 p. m., may exchange their sittings for others that may not at that time be taken, by calling at the institute office on Oct. 25 or 26. The opening general sale of season tickets for all will be on Friday, Oct. 28, at 4 p. m., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue daily thereafter at the hours when the ticket office of the institute are open.

From STANDARD UNION, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 2 - 1910

Established 1884

The Institute of Arts and Sciences gives out the following ticket information regarding the five Philharmonic concerts which will be given in the Opera House during the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor. The concerts, as usual, will be given on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 11, Dec. 2, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24. The soloists will be in order of their coming, Madame Jomelli, soprano; Josef Hofman, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Ferruccio Busoni, pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist. Holders of season tickets for the five concerts of the year 1909-1910, who have not already renewed their subscriptions for the series of five concerts for the coming year, 1910-1911, may renew their subscriptinos for the seats occupied by them last year, respectively, at any time on or before Saturday, Oct. 22, 1910, at 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Old Subscribers of the year 1909-10, who renew their subscriptions on or before Oct. 22 at 6 P. M., may exchange their sittings for others that may not at that time be taken, by calling at the Institute office on Oct. 25 or 26. The opening general sale of season tickets for all will be on Friday, Oct. 28, at 4 P. M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue daily thereafter at the hours when the ticket office of the Institute are open. The prices will be $3.75, $5, 6 and $7.50, according to location.

From SUN
Address New York City.
Date OCT 2 1910

Orchestra announces that it opened its season tickets for both series of concerts which the orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall this winter will be placed on sale at the box office in Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. Only a very few of the old subscribers have renewed their subscriptions for the coming season and as there is a long waiting list of applicants for seats the number which can be [illegible]

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 2, 1910

Anton Witek Has Come to Boston to Stay, He Says

MRS. ANTON WITEK, WIFE OF THE NEW SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER, WHO IS SO FASCINATED WITH BOSTON THAT HER HUSBAND WILL MAKE HIS PERMANENT HOME HERE.

The new concert master of the Symphony orchestra, Anton Witek, declared yesterday that he has come to Boston to stay. He will stay, he said, because his wife is fascinated with Boston, its environment and its society.

Herr Witek has engaged a suite at the Hotel Ilkley, 176 Huntington avenue. He is now stopping for a short time at the Hemenway chambers.

Neither the concert master nor his wife was ever in Boston before their arrival here four days ago. Mr. Witek explained that the chief reason for his coming to Boston was the large number of students of music who have contracted to study under him in this city.

"At first I was not so very favorably impressed with Boston" the German musician said. "I had only seen the business section. My wife was quicker to become accustomed to the city, and once we had called on some friends in the Back Bay and had motored through the Back Bay and Jamaica Plain park system, she persuaded me that Boston was the best American city we have ever visited.

"It is refreshingly quiet here compared with the bustle and turmoil in New York and Chicago. There everyone seems fighting for money, while it appears here in Boston that most people have all the money they want, and therefore have more time for art, music, literature and the best things in life.

"I admire your architecture in Boston, but it makes me laugh the reverence you show for buildings two or three hundred years old. Those are quite ordinary sights in Germany.

"In Boston it seems that people make more of their time than elsewhere. Young men of 25 and 30 seem here to be occupying positions that in Germany we would not expect them to occupy before 35 to

"The Boston public library appears to be an excellently managed institution, and its musical department is very valuable."

Herr Witek was accompanied to this country by a party of American music students who took lessons under him in Berlin. His last engagement was at Scheveningen, Holland, and he came directly from that place to Boston.

The new concert master has led concerts in nearly every city of importance in Germany, Russia, Austria-Hungary and the Netherlands.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1910.

CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the usual eight concerts to be given in Sanders Theater, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19, Feb. 9, March 2, March 30 and April 27.

A brilliant list of soloists is announced for the series. At the first concert Charles Gilibert, the distinguished French baritone, will appear; at the second, Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; at the third, Josef Hofmann, pianist; at the fourth, Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; at the fifth, Edmond Clement, the French tenor; at the sixth, Madame Kirby-Lunn, contralto; at the seventh, Corneille Overstreet, pianist; at the eighth, Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1910.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

Rehearsals Are Now In Progress for the Season's Opening.

The Symphony orchestra met for its first rehearsal Monday morning and now is plunged into the midst of the work of the season. Some of the new members of the orchestra who are coming from abroad have not yet arrived owing to the difficulty in securing passage, but they will be drifting in within the next week or so.

Mr Witek, the new concert master, assumed his place for the first time and Mr Max Kunze, for many years a member of the orchestra, has become leader of the double basses in place of Mr Carl Keller.

Tonight the orchestra gives the first concert of the season in Northampton at Smith college, where a new auditorium is to be opened and a new organ tested, the concert being generally in honor of the inauguration of the new president of that institution.

The program for the first concerts here on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is devoted entirely to Schumann in celebration of the 100th anniversary of his birth, the works being "Genoveva" and "Manfred" overtures; the seldom-heard concerto for violoncello, and the "Rhenish" symphony.

Mr Alwin Schroeder, who is again a member of the orchestra, will be the soloist. There is a limited number of seats for the Saturday evening concert which go on sale at the box office, Symphony hall, this morning.

JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1910.

SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT SMITH COLLEGE

Tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first concert of the season at Smith College, Northampton, in honor of the inauguration of the new president of that institution. The program for the first concerts here on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is devoted entirely to Schumann, in celebration of the great German's centennial, the works being the "Genoveva" and "Manfred" overtures, the seldom-heard concerto for violoncello, and the "Rhenish" symphony. Alwin Schroeder, who is again a member of the orchestra, will be the soloist. A limited number of seats for the Saturday night performance will be put on sale today.

THE CHRONICLE.

OCTOBER 1, 1910.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged commemorative programms for the first Symphony concerts, in honor of the centenary of Schumann's birth, June 8, 1910. The program for next Friday and Saturday is as follows: Schumann: Overture, "Manfred," Op. 115; Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3; Op. 97 (Rhenish); Concerto for violoncello with orchestra, Op. 129; Overture, "Genoveva," Op. 81; Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE RETURN OF DR. MUCK TO BOSTON

A Definite Statement from Berlin That He Will Become the Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra Again in the Autumn of 1912—The Berlinese Views of Mr. Witek's Departure and Mr. Hess's Return —The Virtuosi and Their "Personalities" —Singers of the Boston Opera in France —Mr. Fiedler at Work Again—St. Louis and "Salome"—Mr. Damrosch's New Orchestral Pieces

ALTHOUGH very little has been said here in public of the return of Dr. Muck to Boston, it is now definitely understood in Berlin, on the authority of the conductor himself, that in the autumn of 1912, two years hence, he will become again the director of the Symphony Orchestra and for a long term. When Dr. Muck left Boston in the spring of 1908, it was an open secret that he would gladly have continued as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, did not his contract with the Royal Opera enforce his return to Berlin. It was almost as well known that the management of the orchestra would have retained him as willingly and that it was prepared to reëngage nim as soon as he was free from prior obligations in Germany. It has since been stated that Dr. Muck's contract with the Royal Opera would end in the spring of 1912, and circumstances have lately conspired to disclose the use that he will make of his new freedom. In a word, he will return to Boston and become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, for what despatches from Berlin call "a prolonged period."

Last June, it will be recalled, Mr. Weingartner offered his resignation as the director of the Imperial Opera at Vienna, the most distinguished post in its kind in the German-speaking world. It was offered promptly to Dr. Muck. Almost as speedily he declined it, saying that he had made engagements which required his return to America for some years. The terms of his reply were printed in the German and the French newspapers and repeated freely last summer in Germany by his friends. Bostonians who encountered him in their travels received a like, though more vague, assurance from his own lips, while it was common knowledge, so to say, in the "musical circles" that the festivals at Munich and Salzburg gathered that Dr. Muck, in the autumn of 1912, would become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again. Yesterday, to clinch the whole matter, the New York Times printed the following despatch from its correspondent in Berlin, who found his authority, doubtless, in similar statements in the Berlinese newspapers: "Dr. Karl Muck, the celebrated conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera, who directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra several years ago, has decided to accept another engagement for a period of several years with the Boston organization. Dr. Muck's contracts in Berlin will keep him occupied here until 1912. After that he expects to make his home in Boston for a prolonged period." By these tokens, then, the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra is determined for several years to come. Mr. Fiedler will complete his present term, which runs through the spring of 1912. In the following autumn Dr. Muck will resume the place that no man has filled as did he. H. T. P.

Boston, Berlin and Concert-Masters

BERLIN and Boston have made a fair exchange of concert-masters. Willy Hess, who has settled in Berlin, is now, it appears, to take the chair in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, for many years occupied by Anton Witek, who has gone to Boston to take his place with the Boston Symphony. But there is a bitter feeling among the Berliners towards Witek; there usually is outspoken resentment when they see long-established favorites suddenly swallow the bait of higher remuneration, and, it may be, higher honors, in this "Dollarland" so heartily loathed and despised by the stay-at-homes. And they have been trying to decide in the affirmative the question, "Is Witek kontraktbrüchig?" which, being translated, means guilty of contract-breaking, the most undesirable stigma that could befall an artist in Germany or Austria.

The whole trouble lies in the fact that Mr. Witek's Berlin contract does not expire till next year. The Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, inclined to feel resentful, thus discusses the matter: "For reasons of principle arising out of the peculiar constitution of this organization, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra could not agree to a premature dissolution of this contract, which does not expire before next year. There is, therefore, a breach of contract here evident, which, it is true, the peculiar circumstances make comprehensible to a certain extent. As, however, the Boston Orchestra, on its part, admits no contract-breaking members of other orchestras into its ranks, it remains o be seen how Mr. Witek will fare over there. At the same time it is to be supposed that Witek did not take his 'flight' across the ocean as a blind leap. It may, then, be assumed that for this 'special' case an exception to the rule has been made in Boston."

Die Signale has no patience with the question and dismisses it in a few lines: "Musical Berlin has known for months that Boston and Berlin were going to exchange Concert-masters Witek and Hess. Moreover, Witek made no secret whatever of the Boston engagement, and when he was married in June it must have been clear to the most incredulous that he was in earnest about going to America." And now in September he has to submit to being declared "kontraktbrüchig" by a Berlin newspaper! It is astounding what sources of misinformation the news of the art world becomes in many daily papers. [Berlin correspondence of Musical America.

[20]

From D[illegible] Citizen,

Address H[illegible], N. Y.

Date OCT 1 - 1910

Establis

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY'S NEW CONCERT MASTER

Nicholas Sokoloff Here for Altschuler's Season.

B'KLYN'S BOSTON CONCERTS.

Walter Damrosch Declares that the Classics Will Not Be Neglected by Him.

Announcement is made by the Institute of Arts and Sciences, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society that the five Philharmonic concerts which will be given in the Opera House during the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fielder, conductor, will take place on Friday evenings, the dates being November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24, and March 24. The soloists will be in the order of their coming, Madame Jomelli, soprano; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Ferrucio Busoni, pianist; and Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist.

Holders of season tickets for the five concerts of the year 1909-1910, who have not already renewed their subscriptions for the series of five concerts for the coming year 1910-1911 may renew their subscriptions for the seats occupied by them last year, respectively, at any time on or before Saturday, Oct. 22, 1910, at 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Old subscribers of the year 1909-10, who renew their subscriptions on or before Oct. 22 at 6 p. m., may exchange their sittings for others that may not at that time be taken, by calling at the institute office on Oct. 25 or 26. The opening general sale of season tickets for all will be on Friday, Oct. 28, at 4 p. m., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue daily thereafter at the hours when the ticket office of the institute are open.

From [illegible]

Address [illegible], N. Y.

Date [illegible]

Estabi 84

The Institute of Arts and Sciences gives out the following ticket information regarding the five Philharmonic concerts which will be given in the Opera House during the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor. The concerts, as usual, will be given on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24. The soloists will be in order of their coming, Madame Jomelli, soprano; Josef Hofman, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Ferruccio Busoni, pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist. Holders of season tickets for the five concerts of the year 1909-1910, who have not already renewed their subscriptions for the series of five concerts for the coming year, 1910-1911, may renew their subscriptinos for the seats occupied by them last year, respectively, at any time on or before Saturday, Oct. 22, 1910, at 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Old Subscribers of the year 1909-10, who renew their subscriptions on or before Oct. 22 at 6 P. M., may exchange their sittings for others that may not at that time be taken, by calling at the Institute office on Oct. 25 or 26. The opening general sale of season tickets for all will be on Friday, Oct. 28, at 4 P. M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue daily thereafter at the hours when the ticket office of the Institute are open. The prices will be $3.75, $5, 6 and $7.50, according to location.

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date OCT 2 1910

384

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a limited number of season tickets for both series of concerts that the orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall this winter will be placed on sale at the box office in Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. As very few of the old subscribers have failed to renew for the coming season and as there is a long waiting list of applicants for season tickets the number which can be bought to-morrow will be unusually small. The prospect is now that practically the entire seating capacity of Carnegie Hall for all ten concerts will be sold by subscription and that there will be small chance for those who do not hold season tickets to hear this orchestra in New York during the coming

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date OCT 2 - 1910

THE season of 1910-1911 will be the thirtieth in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will likewise be the twenty-fifth season in which that famous band has been a visitor to New York. There are some men and women in Boston whose boast it is that in the twenty-nine years that have passed they have never missed a Symphony concert, and it is quite likely that there are now many attendants at the orchestra's concerts in Carnegie Hall, aside from the professional critics, who heard it play the first time it came to New York in Steinway Hall on Feb. 14, 1887. The orchestra was five years old when it first came here, and Mr. Gericke was in the third year of his first term of service.

The orchestra had been organized in the Fall of 1881 by the public-spirited banker of Boston, Henry L. Higginson, who was not only an ardent lover of music, but an amateur of no mean ability. His purpose in organizing the orchestra was to enable Boston to hear the great orchestral works played in a manner worthy of them. It was organized solely as a Boston institution, and that during its life it has traveled so far afield comes as a natural result of its success in its home city. When its thirty years will have been ended next April it will have given 2,946 symphony concerts and have played approximately 900 different works. Moreover, it was because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the Kneisel Quartet came into existence. Organized by men in the orchestra, and supported through its years of struggle by the bounty of the founder of the orchestra, it is a question whether it could have been born, could have prospered as it has, without his help, and without the Kneisel Quartet chamber music to-day would be far from holding the position of favor it now enjoys.

At the end of this season the orchestra will have given in New York 177 concerts and will have appeared here under five regular conductors and one, Vincent d'Indy, who was invited to this country in the Fall of 1905 to conduct his own and other French works. The first two years that the orchestra came to New York the concerts were given in Steinway Hall, three the first year and four the second, under Wilhelm Gericke. Mr. Gericke then retired from the orchestra and was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch, who was conductor four years. Three of these years the concerts were given in Chickering Hall, and in the fourth the move was then made to the comparatively new Carnegie Hall. Later the orchestra moved from Carnegie Hall to the Metropolitan Opera House, giving five concerts a year on Thursday evenings, and finally, when Mr. Gericke retired in the Fall of 1898, the number of concerts allotted to New York was increased to ten, and were once more given in Carnegie Hall, which has been the orchestra's New York home since that time.

Nikisch's tenure of four years was one of the most brilliant chapters in the history of the orchestra. When he left in the Spring of 1893 the post was offered to Hans Richter, and negotiations got so far that a contract was signed and sealed, but at the last moment, however, Dr. Richter begged off and tried to induce young Karl Muck of Berlin to come in his place, but Dr. Muck, at that time in his second year of conductorship in the Royal Opera of Berlin, would listen to no proposition from America, and the choice of Nikisch's successor finally settled on Emil Paur, who had succeeded him at the opera in Leipsic.

Mr. Paur's contract was for five years, and at its termination Mr. Gericke returned to America and stayed with the orchestra for eight years. When he retired definitely from active work in the Spring of 1906, the services of Dr. Muck of Berlin were secured for two years, which was the longest time that he could get a leave of absence from his duties in Berlin and in the Fall of 1908 Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the present conductor, came to America.

The orchestra created a public for itself in New York from the very beginning. The criticisms following its first concert here were very favorable, particular praise being given to the string choir. The programme was severely classical. It began with the "Oberon" overture by Weber and ended with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, while between the two came the Beethoven Concerto for Violin played by Franz Kneisel, and Händel's "Largo" played by the whole body of violins standing and facing the audience. This last gave a slight shock to the more susceptible of the audience, but further acquaintance with Mr. Gericke convinced even the most doubting that he made use only of a legitimate device to display the full tonal beauty of his strings, for if there was one thing that Gericke did not smack of it was the sensational.

In the years that the orchestra has been working it has had some well-known men in its ranks. Among the violins can be recalled the names of Franz Kneisel, Martin Loeffler, Leo Lichtenberg, Gustav Dannreuther, Timothée Adamowski, Leandro Campanari, Sam Franko, Willy Hess, Richard Czerwonky, Karl Ondricek, and the present occupants of the first desk—Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack. The 'cellos have had such players as Fritz Giese, Anton Hekking, Leo Schulz, Alwin Schroeder, and Heinrich Warnke. Among the violas can be mentioned such names as Emil Ferir, the present leader of the section; Max Zach, conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra; Louis Svecenski, the viola of the Kneisel Quartet, and Ottocar Novacek. The lamented Leon Pourtau, who was one of the victims of the Bourgogne disaster in 1898, was one of the clarinetists of the orchestra. Xaver Reiter, the famous horn player, was brought to this country by the orchestra, while such men as Longy, oboe; Grisez, clarinet; Sadony, bassoon; Kloepfel, trumpet, and Hess and Wendler, horns, are members of the orchestra now.

The prospectus for the orchestra's twenty-fifth season in New York, which is just out, calls for the usual five evening and five matinee concerts, the former on Thursday evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 23, and March 23, at 8:15 o'clock, and the latter on Saturday afternoons, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 25, and March 25, at 2:30 o'clock.

The only change of note in the personnel of the orchestra this year is in the concert master, Anton Witek of Berlin, succeeding to the place left vacant by Willy Hess. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz. He is 38 years old, and for the past sixteen years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

The management is again generous this year in the soloists it offers. Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert in November, and Mme. Melba at the first matinée concert in that month. At both evening and matinée concerts in December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, while Mischa Elman will be the soloist for the January concerts, Busoni for the February, and Witek for the March.

Among the modern works that Mr. Fiedler will probably give in New York are Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," d'Indy's "Istar Variations," Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor, and Sibelius's First Symphony. There will, of course, be a judicious admixture of the classics.

From NATION

Address NEW YORK City.

Date SEP 29 1910

Liszt's "Dante" symphony is to be performed the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Other notable works in the repertory will be Mahler's second symphony, Debussy's "Iberia" and "Rondes de Printemps" (first time in America), and Henry Hadley's "Culprit Fay," one of that American's numerous prize-winners. Special attention is to be paid to the English composer, Fritz Delius. His orchestral nocturne, "Paris," when played in Boston last season, created a desire to hear more of this man's music; this will be gratified by the performance of four of his pieces, all novelties: "In a Summer Garden," "Dance Rhapsody," "Brigg Fair," and "Appalachia," a set of variations for orchestra and chorus on a Mississippi slave song. Another English composer, Granville Bantock, will be represented by "Three Dramatic Dances."

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York City. OCT 1 1910

Date

ANTON WITEK of Berlin is to be the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is thirty-eight years old, and for the last sixteen years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. The soloists announced for New York this year are Miss Farrar and Mme Melba for the November concerts, Josef Hofmann for both December concerts, Mischa Elman for both January concerts, Feruccio Busoni for the February, and Mr. Witek for the March. Among modern works that Mr. Fiedler is planning to give here are Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," d'Indy's "Istar" variations, Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's E minor symphony, and Sibelius's first symphony.

From AMERICAN

Address New York City. OCT 2 1910

Date

Boston Symphony—Prominent among the novelties announced for performance this season by the Boston Symphony are Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E-minor, and the first Symphony of Sibelius. This will be the twenty-fifth New York campaign of the famous Boston organization.

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City. OCT 1 1910

Date

The prospectus for the Boston Symphony orchestra's twenty-fifth season in New York, which is just out, calls for the usual five evening and five matinee concerts. The former will be given on Thursday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23, and the latter on Saturday afternoons November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25 and March 25. The time for renewal of subscriptions by last year's subscribers ends to-night and the remaining seats will be placed on sale for the season at the box office, Carnegie hall, Monday morning at 9 o'clock. There is but a limited number of these.

The only change of note in the personnel of the orchestra this year is in the concert master, Anton Witek of Berlin, succeeding to the place left vacant by Willy Hess. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz. He is thirty-eight years old and for the past sixteen years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra.

Gustav Mahler.

The management is again generous this year in the soloists it offers. Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert, in November, and Mme. Melba at the first matinee concert in that month. At both evening and matinee concerts in December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, while Mischa Elman will be the soloist for the January concerts, Busoni for the February and Witek for the March.

Among the modern works that Mr. Fiedler will probably give in New York are Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," d'Indy's "Istar Variations," Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, and Sibelius's First symphony.

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

Date SEP 25 1910

CONCERT SERIES DATES ARRANGED

Soloists Also Announced for Washington Symphony Engagement Here.

Announcement was made today of the dates and soloists for the series of five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater this winter.

The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, and Madame Jomelli, soprano.

The dates for the five concerts are November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 21.

Subscriptions are already being taken for the season by Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, who will have the local management of the concerts. Subscribers of last year will have until October 12 to renew their seats.

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York City.

Date OCT 2 - 1910

Die zehn Konzerte, welche das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler für die kommende Saison in New York angekündigt hat, bedeuten die 25. Spielzeit des berühmten Orchesters in unserer Stadt, die sich im Laufe der Jahre daran gewöhnt hat, die verdienstvolle Musik-Vereinigung gleichsam als ihr Eigen zu betrachten. Das Orchester war fünf Jahre in Boston thätig, als unter der Leitung Kapellmeister Gericke's das erste New Yorker Konzert gegeben wurde, das sich sofort eines durchschlagenden Erfolges erfreute. Auch die beiden folgenden Konzerte hielten sich auf der Höhe. Es folgten 4 Konzerte in der nächstfolgenden Saison, nach welcher die Zahl der Konzerte auf fünf erhöht wurde. Von 1898 an gaben die Bostoner hier 10 Konzerte per Saison, was auch jetzt noch der Fall ist. Die Bostoner spielten die ersten zwei Jahre hier in Steinway Hall, dann in Chickering Hall, hierauf in Carnegie Hall, von wo aus sie nach dreijähriger Thätigkeit für 4 Saisons in das Metropolitan Opera House wanderten, um von 1898 an Carnegie Hall treu zu bleiben.

1887 bis 1888, 1888 bis 1889, 1898 bis 1906 stand Gericke an der Spitze des Orchesters. Von den dazwischen liegenden 9 Jahren seiner Abwesenheit fielen 4 auf Arthur Nikisch und 5 auf Emil Paur; von 1906 an leitete Dr. Carl Muck die Bostoner Orchester, um vor 2 Jahren von Hrn. Max Fiedler aus Hamburg abgelöst zu werden, der auch heute noch an der Spitze der glänzenden Künstler-Vereinigung steht. Die Bostoner spielten in New York anfangs in der Stärke von 75 Mann, welche Zahl inzwischen auf 100 angewachsen ist. Es enthält 16 erste Violinen, und jedes Blas-Instrument kann einen Extraspieler heranziehen, so daß allen modernen Anforderungen Stand gehalten werden kann.

Als Konzertmeister an Stelle von Prof. Willy Hetz wurde Herr Anton Witek, seit 16 Jahren Konzertmeister des Berliner Philharmonischen Orchesters, gewonnen. Herr Witek ist Boehme von Geburt und gilt als bedeutender Virtuose.

Die Konzerte finden an folgenden Daten statt: 5 Abend-Konzerte und 5 Matinees: erstere an Donnerstagen, letztere an Samstagen, und zwar am 10. November, 8. Dez., 12. Jan., 23. Febr. und 23. März Abend und am 12. Nov., 10. Dez., 14. Jan., 25. Febr. und 25. März Nachmittags. Die Erneuerungen für die letztjährigen Abonnements übertrafen alle Erwartungen. Die wenigen noch verfügbaren Sitze werden von morgen an an der Kasse von Carnegie Hall ausgegeben werden.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date SEP 30 1910

Following Max Fiedler's arrival on the Deutschland, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the first organization of its kind in this country to open the new season of 1910-11. Next Friday afternoon, Symphony Hall's first concert will commemorate the recent centennial of Schumann with his overtures to "Manfred" and to "Genoveva," his Rhenish symphony, and his concerto for 'cello played by Alwyn Schroeder.

The Bostonians will not come to New York and Brooklyn until the second week in November.

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date OCT 4 - OCT 4 1910

Anton Witek, who has just arrived in Boston to fill the post of concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and his wife, Vita Witek, a pianist and teacher of Berlin, have been engaged to teach at the von Ende Violin school. A patron of the school willing to assist several talented and deserving students offers a scholarship, for which there will be a competitive examination November 11.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date OCT 2 - 1910

THE season of 1910-1911 will be the thirtieth in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will likewise be the twenty-fifth season in which that famous band has been a visitor to New York. There are some men and women in Boston whose boast it is that in the twenty-nine years that have passed they have never missed a Symphony concert, and it is quite likely that there are now many attendants at the orchestra's concerts in Carnegie Hall, aside from the professional critics, who heard it play the first time it came to New York in Steinway Hall on Feb. 14, 1887. The orchestra was five years old when it first came here, and Mr. Gericke was in the third year of his first term of service.

The orchestra had been organized in the Fall of 1881 by the public-spirited banker of Boston, Henry L. Higginson, who was not only an ardent lover of music, but an amateur of no mean ability. His purpose in organizing the orchestra was to enable Boston to hear the great orchestral works played in a manner worthy of them. It was organized solely as a Boston institution, and that during its life it has traveled so far afield comes as a natural result of its success in its home city. When its thirty years will have been ended next April it will have given 2,946 symphony concerts and have played approximately 900 different works. Moreover, it was because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the Kneisel Quartet came into existence. Organized by men in the orchestra and supported through its years of struggle by the bounty of the founder of the orchestra, it is a question whether it could have been born, could have prospered as it has, without his help, and without the Kneisel Quartet chamber music to-day would be far from holding the position of favor it now enjoys.

At the end of this season the orchestra will have given in New York 177 concerts and will have appeared here under five regular conductors and one, Vincent d'Indy, who was invited to this country in the Fall of 1905 to conduct his own and other French works. The first two years that the orchestra came to New York the concerts were given in Steinway Hall, three the first year and four the second, under Wilhelm Gericke. Mr. Gericke then retired from the orchestra and was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch, who was conductor four years. Three of these years the concerts were given in Chickering Hall, and in the fourth the move was then made to the comparatively new Carnegie Hall. Later the orchestra moved from Carnegie Hall to the Metropolitan Opera House, giving five concerts a year on Thursday evenings, and finally, when Mr. Gericke retired in the Fall of 1898, the number of concerts allotted to New York was increased to ten, and were once more given in Carnegie Hall, which has been the orchestra's New York home since that time.

Nikisch's tenure of four years was one of the most brilliant chapters in the history of the orchestra. When he left in the Spring of 1893 the post was offered to Hans Richter, and negotiations got so far that a contract was signed and sealed, but at the last moment, however, Dr. Richter begged off and tried to induce young Karl Muck of Berlin to come in his place, but Dr. Muck, at that time in his second year of conductorship in the Royal Opera of Berlin, would listen to no proposition from America, and the choice of Nikisch's successor finally settled on Emil Paur, who had succeeded him at the opera in Leipsic.

Mr. Paur's contract was for five years, and at its termination Mr. Gericke returned to America and stayed with the orchestra for eight years. When he retired definitely from active work in the Spring of 1906, the services of Dr. Muck of Berlin were secured for two years, which was the longest time that he could get a leave of absence from his duties in Berlin and in the Fall of 1908 Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the present conductor, came to America.

The orchestra created a public for itself in New York from the very beginning. The criticisms following its first concert here were very favorable, particular praise being given to the string choir. The programme was severely classical. It began with the "Oberon" overture by Weber and ended with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, while between the two came the Beethoven Concerto for Violin played by Franz Kneisel, and Händel's "Largo" played by the whole body of violins standing and facing the audience. This last gave a slight shock to the more susceptible of the audience, but further acquaintance with Mr. Gericke convinced even the most doubting that he made use only of a legitimate device to display the full tonal beauty of his strings, for if there was one thing that Gericke did not smack of it was the sensational.

In the years that the orchestra has been working it has had some well-known men in its ranks. Among the violins can be recalled the names of Franz Kneisel, Martin Loeffler, Leo Lichtenberg, Gustav Dannreuther, Timothée Adamowski, Leandro Campanari, Sam Franko, Willy Hess, Richard Czerwonky, Karl Ondricek, and the present occupants of the first desk—Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack. The 'cellos have had such players as Fritz Giese, Anton Hekking, Leo Schulz, Alwin Schroeder, and Heinrich Warnke. Among the violas can be mentioned such names as Emil Férir, the present leader of the section; Max Zach, conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra; Louis Svecenski, the viola of the Kneisel Quartet, and Ottocar Novacek. The lamented Leon Pourtau, who was one of the victims of the Bourgogne disaster in 1898, was one of the clarinetists of the orchestra. Xaver Reiter, the famous horn player, was brought to this country by the orchestra, while such men as Longy, oboe; Grisez, clarinet; Sadony, bassoon; Kloepfel, trumpet, and Hess and Wendler, horns, are members of the orchestra now.

The prospectus for the orchestra's twenty-fifth season in New York, which is just out, calls for the usual five evening and five matinee concerts, the former on Thursday evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 23, and March 23, at 8:15 o'clock, and the latter on Saturday afternoons, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 25, and March 25, at 2:30 o'clock.

The only change of note in the personnel of the orchestra this year is in the concert master, Anton Witek of Berlin, succeeding to the place left vacant by Willy Hess. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz. He is 38 years old, and for the past sixteen years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

The management is again generous this year in the soloists it offers. Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert in November, and Mme. Melba at the first matinée concert in that month. At both evening and matinée concerts in December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, while Mischa Elman will be the soloist for the January concerts, Busoni for the February, and Witek for the March.

Among the modern works that Mr. Fiedler will probably give in New York are Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," d'Indy's "Istar Variations," Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor, and Sibelius's First Symphony. There will, of course, be a judicious admixture of the classics.

From NATION

Address NEW YORK City.

Date SEP 29 1910

Liszt's "Dante" symphony is to be performed the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Other notable works in the repertory will be Mahler's second symphony, Debussy's "Iberia" and "Rondes de Printemps" (first time in America), and Henry Hadley's "Culprit Fay," one of that American's numerous prize-winners. Special attention is to be paid to the English composer, Fritz Delius. His orchestral nocturne, "Paris," when played in Boston last season, created a desire to hear more of this man's music; this will be gratified by the performance of four of his pieces, all novelties: "In a Summer Garden," "Dance Rhapsody," "Brigg Fair," and "Appalachia," a set of variations for orchestra and chorus on a Mississippi slave song. Another English composer, Granville Bantock, will be represented by "Three Dramatic Dances."

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York City.

Date

ANTON WITEK of Berlin is to be the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is thirty-eight years old, and for the last sixteen years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. The soloists announced for New York this year are Miss Farrar and Mme Melba for the November concerts, Josef Hofmann for both December concerts, Mischa Elman for both January concerts, Feruccio Busoni for the February, and Mr. Witek for the March. Among modern works that Mr. Fiedler is planning to give here are Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," d'Indy's "Istar" variations, Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's E minor symphony, and Sibelius's first symphony.

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date OCT 2 1910

Boston Symphony—Prominent among the novelties announced for performance this season by the Boston Symphony are Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E-minor, and the first Symphony of Sibelius. This will be the twenty-fifth New York campaign of the famous Boston organization.

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date

The prospectus for the Boston Symphony orchestra's twenty-fifth season in New York, which is just out, calls for the usual five evening and five matinee concerts. The former will be given on Thursday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23, and the latter on Saturday afternoons November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25 and March 25. The time for renewal of subscriptions by last year's subscribers ends to-night and the remaining seats will be placed on sale for the season at the box office, Carnegie hall, Monday morning at 9 o'clock. There is but a limited number of these.

The only change of note in the personnel of the orchestra this year

Gustav Mahler.

is in the concert master, Anton Witek of Berlin, succeeding to the place left vacant by Willy Hess. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz. He is thirty-eight years old and for the past sixteen years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra.

The management is again generous this year in the soloists it offers. Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert, in November, and Mme. Melba at the first matinee concert in that month. At both evening and matinee concerts in December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, while Mischa Elman will be the soloist for the January concerts, Busoni for the February and Witek for the March.

Among the modern works that Mr. Fiedler will probably give in New York are Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," d'Indy's "Istar Variations," Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, and Sibelius's First symphony.

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

CONCERT SERIES DATES ARRANGED

Soloists Also Announced for Washington Symphony Engagement Here.

Announcement was made today of the dates and soloists for the series of five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater this winter.

The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, and Madame Jomelli, soprano.

The dates for the five concerts are November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 21.

Subscriptions are already being taken for the season by Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, who will have the local management of the concerts. Subscribers of last year will have until October 12 to renew their seats.

[21]

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York City.

Date

Die zehn Konzerte, welche das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler für die kommende Saison in New York angekündigt hat, bedeuten die 25. Spielzeit des berühmten Orchesters in unserer Stadt, die sich im Laufe der Jahre daran gewöhnt hat, die verdienstvolle Musik-Vereinigung gleichsam als ihr Eigen zu betrachten. Das Orchester war fünf Jahre in Boston thätig, als unter der Leitung Kapellmeister Gericke's das erste New Yorker Konzert gegeben wurde, das sich sofort eines durchschlagenden Erfolges erfreute. Auch die beiden folgenden Konzerte hielten sich auf der Höhe. Es folgten 4 Konzerte in der nächstfolgenden Saison, nach welcher die Zahl der Konzerte auf fünf erhöht wurde. Von 1898 an gaben die Bostoner hier 10 Konzerte per Saison, was auch jetzt noch der Fall ist. Die Bostoner spielten die ersten zwei Jahre hier in Steinway Hall, dann in Chickering Hall, hierauf in Carnegie Hall, von wo aus sie nach dreijähriger Thätigkeit für 4 Saisons in das Metropolitan Opera House wanderten, um von 1898 an Carnegie Hall treu zu bleiben.

1887 bis 1888, 1888 bis 1889, 1898 bis 1906 stand Gericke an der Spitze des Orchesters. Von den dazwischen liegenden 9 Jahren seiner Abwesenheit fielen 4 auf Arthur Nikisch und 5 auf Emil Paur; von 1906 an leitete Dr. Carl Muck die Bostoner Orchester, um vor 2 Jahren von Hrn. Max Fiedler aus Hamburg abgelöst zu werden, der auch heute noch an der Spitze der glänzenden Künstler-Vereinigung steht. Die Bostoner spielten in New York anfangs in der Stärke von 75 Mann, welche Zahl inzwischen auf 100 angewachsen ist. Es enthält 16 erste Violinen, und jedes Blas-Instrument kann einen Extraspieler heranziehen, so daß allen modernen Anforderungen Stand gehalten werden kann.

Als Konzertmeister an Stelle von Prof. Willy Heß wurde Herr Anton Witek, seit 16 Jahren Konzertmeister des Berliner Philharmonischen Orchesters, gewonnen. Herr Witek ist Boehme von Geburt und gilt als bedeutender Virtuose.

Die Konzerte finden an folgenden Daten statt: 5 Abend-Konzerte und 5 Matinees: erstere an Donnerstagen, letztere an Samstagen, und zwar am 10. November, 8. Dez., 12. Jan., 23. Febr. und 23. März Abend und am 12. Nov., 10. Dez., 14. Jan., 25. Febr. und 25. März Nachmittags. Die Erneuerungen für die letztjährigen Abonnements übertrafen alle Erwartungen. Die wenigen noch verfügbaren Sitze werden von morgen an an der Kasse von Carnegie Hall ausgegeben werden.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

Following Max Fiedler's arrival on the Deutschland, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the first organization of its kind in this country to open the new season of 1910-11. Next Friday afternoon, Symphony Hall's first concert will commemorate the recent centennial of Schumann with his overtures to "Manfred" and to "Genoveva," his Rhenish symphony, and his concerto for 'cello, played by Alwyn Schroeder.

The Bostonians will not come to New York and Brooklyn until the second week in November.

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date OCT 4 - OCT 1 1910

Anton Witek, who has just arrived in Boston to fill the post of concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and his wife, Vita Witek, a pianist and teacher of Berlin, have been engaged to teach at the von Ende Violin school. A patron of the school willing to assist several talented and deserving students offers a scholarship, for which there will be a competitive examination November 11.

From MORN. TELEGRAPH

Address New York City.

Date

Estabi

The season of 1910-1911 will be the twenty-fifth consecutive year in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given a series of concerts in New York. When the orchestra gave its first concert in Steinway Hall its total membership was seventy-five. This year the total active membership of the orchestra will be an even 100, and this will probably mark the limit of its growth, for with 100 men not only are the string choirs filled on a basis of sixteen first violins, but there will be an extra man for each of the principal instruments in the brass and wood-wind groups.

The coming season is not only the twenty-fifth of the orchestra in New York, but it is the thirtieth year since it was organized, the first concert having been given in Boston on October 21, 1881. Sixty-five men were then engaged for four days in a week, and George Henschel was the conductor. That first year twenty public rehearsals and twenty concerts were given in the old Music Hall of Boston. When the present season is ended the orchestra will have given 2,946 symphony concerts, and in these concerts over 900 different works have been presented.

The prospectus for the orchestra's twenty-fifth season in New York, which is just out, calls for the usual five evening and five matinee concerts, the former on Thursday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23 at 8.15 o'clock, and the latter on Saturday afternoons, November, 12, December 10, January 14, February 25 and March 25 at 2.30 o'clock. The time for renewal of subscriptions by last year's subscribers ended last Saturday evening, and the remaining seats will be placed on sale for the season at the box office, Carnegie Hall, to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. There is but a limited number of these.

The only change of note in the personnel of the orchestra this year is in the concert-master, Anton Witek, of Berlin, succeeding to the place left vacant by Willy Hess. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz. He is 38 years old, and for the past sixteen years has been concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

The management is again eclectic in the soloists it offers. Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert in November, and Madame Melba at the first matinee concert in that month. At both evening and matinee concerts in December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, while Mischa Elman will be the soloist for the January concerts. Busoni for the February and Witek for the March.

Among the modern works that Mr. Fiedler will probably give in New York are Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," d'Indy's "Istar Variations," Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor and Sibelius' First Symphony. There will, of course, be a judicious admixture of the classics.

From

Address New York, N. Y.

Date OCT - - 1910

Esta

There will doubtless be many orchestral novelties brought to hearing during this full season of concert giving. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for instance, plans to give voice to quite a number of compositions by Fritz Delius, an English composer, who has recently come into his own in his native country and in Germany. He has spent several years of his life in these beloved United States, and some of his writings contain tone pictures of incidents of the South.

From England MAGAZINE

Address BOSTON, MASS.

Date SEP - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY AUCTION OF SEATS

The thirtieth season of that unparalleled organization of culture and enjoyment, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open Friday, October seventh, and Saturday evening, October eighth; There are many reasons to expect this to be an exceptionally interesting, attractive and prosperous season. The orchestra is to contain one hundred and one men this year, larger than ever before, and the list of assisting artists is especially attractive. The auction sale of seats will begin on Monday, September 26th at 10 a. m. The sale of afternoon or rehearsal seats will occur on this date and on Tuesday, September 27th at 10 a. m.

The sale of seats for the evening concerts will begin on Thursday, September 29th at 10 a. m., and be continued Friday, September 30th at 10 a. m. Mr. Max Fiedler will again conduct the orchestra.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date OCT 5 - 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SOME FACTS OF THE WORK OF GREAT ORCHESTRAS.

Estabi 4

Boston's 30-Year Record Approaches 3,000 Concerts of 900 Pieces of Symphonic Music—Conductors of Old Days and Contracts of the New—New York Orchestra Players Also Under Year's Contract.

The time for renewals has passed with late September days at the box office, but one annual renewal comes back by the early October cables from Berlin, the old rumor that Karl Muck "expects to make his home in Boston for a prolonged period." This, too, when Max Fiedler returned only this week from Hamburg for his second winter in New England. At least, the scholarly Prof. Fiedler is welcome to quiet folk. And as Dr. Muck will not be technically "at liberty" until the expiration of his contracts with the Kaiser's musical underlings in 1912, those spirits that burn for more ardent temperamental manifestations may go for their enemies with the cry of "Muck raker" for a long time to come.

It never happened yet that musical politics should be allowed to interfere long with the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The management called widespread attention this week to some facts in their past record. This season is not only the twenty-fifth in New York but the thirtieth since Mr. Higginson's men gave the first concert in Boston on Oct. 21, 1881. Sixty-five men were then hired four days a week and George Henschel led twenty public rehearsals and twenty concerts in the old Music Hall of Boston. When the present season is ended the orchestra will have given 2,946 concerts of over 900 different works.

The season here is seven months. Orchestras in Europe that give more concerts usually play throughout the year.

New York heard its first Boston Symphony concert in Steinway Hall on Feb. 14, 1887. Two more were given, and the next year four, while in 1889-1890, there were five in the larger Chickering Hall. Nikisch was conductor when a move uptown was made to Carnegie Hall. Again, under Paur, in 1894-95, there was another move for four years to the Metropolitan Opera House. Finally in 1898-99, when Gericke came back, the orchestra returned to Carnegie Hall and increased its yearly concerts here from five to ten.

The wise men from the East who first played here numbered seventy-five. This year the membership is an even hundred, on a basis of sixteen first violins with an extra man on each principal part in brass and woodwind for emergencies.

These men are under contracts that run from thirty weeks for the principals to forty for the less expert. For special reasons, they cannot fill in time in other bands. A man may play but once a month but he draws his pay and he reports for all rehearsals.

In all, 177 concerts have been given in New York, with Gericke conductor for ten years, Nikisch four, Paur five, Henschel one, Muck two and Fiedler two.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

As in past years, five concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music during the impending season, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert in November the soloist will be Madame Nellie Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this year either in concert or opera this will be and the chances are this will be the last time she sings here for a number of years to come, for the next two or three years will find her engaged with her venture in grand opera that she is to make in Australia, and she plans not to return to America for several years. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the December concert, Mischa Elman at the January, Heinrich Warnke at the February, and Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English contralto, at the March concert.

Miss Harris will have charge of the subscriptions and ticket sales of the orchestra at her office in Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. The last day on which subscribers of the season of 1909-1910 may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and retain the seats occupied by them a year ago is Wednesday, October 12. On Monday, October 17, the tickets will be on sale for new subscribers.

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 1 - 1910

The Boston Symphony is announced to give its usual series of five concerts at the Academy of Music this season, the first occurring on Monday evening, November 7, when Mme. Melba will be the soloist. The succeeding dates are December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20.

Estab , 1884

[2a]

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 2 1910

Esta 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirtieth season in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next with a program devoted entirely to Schumann, in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. Reports from Boston have it that at the auction sale of the season tickets there, despite the twenty weeks of grand opera at the new opera house, the prices averaged higher than ever before, and that the present season will be probably the best the orchestra has ever had. A total of 117 concerts are to be given, these including two pension fund concerts and the three choral concerts, which are the result of the new alliance between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the famous Cecilia Society of that city.

It is an exceedingly brilliant list of soloists that the management has provided for the five concerts the Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia during the coming Winter. As in past years, the concerts will be given on Monday evenings, in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert in November the soloist will be Madame Nellie Melba. The last day on which subscribers of the Philadelphia season of 1909-10 may renew their subscriptions for the coming season, and retain the seats occupied by them a year ago, is Wednesday, October 12. On Monday, October 17, the tickets will be on sale for new subscribers.

* * *

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 1 1910

* * *

Estal 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirtieth season in Boston, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, with a program devoted entirely to Schumann in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. Reports from Boston have it that at the auction sale of the season tickets there the prices averaged higher than ever before and that the present season will be probably the best the orchestra has ever had. One hundred and seventeen concerts are to be given, these including the two pension fund concerts and the three choral concerts which are the result of the new alliance between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Cecilia Society of that city.

In this city the concerts will be given on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20. At the first concert the soloist will be Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this year either in concert or opera this will be. This may be the last time she sings here for a number of years, for the next two or three years will find her engaged with her venture in grand opera in Australia. She plans not to return to America for several years. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the December concert, Mischa Elman at the January, Heinrich Warnke at the February and Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English contralto, at the March concert.

Miss Harris has charge of the subscriptions and ticket sales of the orchestra at her office in Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1119 Chestnut street. The last day on which subscribers of the season of 1909-10 may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and retain the seats occupied by them a year ago, is Wednesday, October 12. On Monday, October 17, the tickets will be on sale for new subscribers.

* * *

From EVE. TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 1 - 1910

Est 1884

Details of the local season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now announced. The five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20. At most brilliant list of soloists is announced. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann; in January, Mischa Elman; in February, Heinrich Warnke, and in March, Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY GAZETTE

OCTOBER 7, 1910

CALENDAR NOTES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings, October 20, November 17, December 15, 1910, January 19, February 9, March 2, March 30, and April 27, 1911. The price of tickets for the series will be $7.00 each.

On October 6 application blanks for the purchase of season tickets were mailed to all officers of the University living in Cambridge. After the filling of the applications of the officers, the remaining tickets will be put on public sale on Saturday, October 15, at George H. Kent's University Bookstore, Cambridge.

From MORN. TELEGRAPH

Address New York City.

Date

Estabil

The season of 1910-1911 will be the twenty-fifth consecutive year in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given a series of concerts in New York.

When the orchestra gave its first concert in Steinway Hall its total membership was seventy-five. This year the total active membership of the orchestra will be an even 100, and this will probably mark the limit of its growth, for with 100 men not only are the string choirs filled on a basis of sixteen first violins, but there will be an extra man for each of the principal instruments in the brass and wood-wind groups.

The coming season is not only the twenty-fifth of the orchestra in New York, but it is the thirtieth year since it was organized, the first concert having been given in Boston on October 21, 1881. Sixty-five men were then engaged for four days in a week, and George Henschel was the conductor. That first year twenty public rehearsals and twenty concerts were given in the old Music Hall of Boston. When the present season is ended the orchestra will have given 2,946 symphony concerts, and in these concerts over 900 different works have been presented.

The prospectus for the orchestra's twenty-fifth season in New York, which is just out, calls for the usual five evening and five matinee concerts, the former on Thursday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23 at 8.15 o'clock, and the latter on Saturday afternoons, November, 12, December 10, January 14, February 25 and March 25 at 2.30 o'clock. The time for renewal of subscriptions by last year's subscribers ended last Saturday evening, and the remaining seats will be placed on sale for the season at the box office, Carnegie Hall, to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. There is but a limited number of these.

The only change of note in the personnel of the orchestra this year is in the concert-master, Anton Witek, of Berlin, succeeding to the place left vacant by Willy Hess. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz. He is 38 years old, and for the past sixteen years has been concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

The management is again eclectic in the soloists it offers. Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first evening concert in November, and Madame Melba at the first matinee concert in that month. At both evening and matinee concerts in December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, while Mischa Elman will be the soloist for the January concerts, Busoni for the February and Witek for the March.

Among the modern works that Mr. Fiedler will probably give in New York are Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," d'Indy's "Istar Variations," Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay," Loeffler's "La mort de Tintagiles," Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor and Sibelius' First Symphony. There will, of course, be a judicious admixture of the classics.

From

Address

Date

There will doubtless be many orchestral novelties brought to hearing during this full season of concert giving. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for instance, plans to give voice to quite a number of compositions by Fritz Delius, an English composer, who has recently come into his own in his native country and in Germany. He has spent several years of his life in these beloved United States, and some of his writings contain tone pictures of incidents of the South.

Es

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AUCTION OF SEATS

Est

The thirtieth season of that unparalleled organization of culture and enjoyment, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open Friday, October seventh, and Saturday evening, October eighth; There are many reasons to expect this to be an exceptionally interesting, attractive and prosperous season. The orchestra is to contain one hundred and one men this year, larger than ever before, and the list of assisting artists is especially attractive. The auction sale of seats will begin on Monday, September 26th at 10 a. m. The sale of afternoon or rehearsal seats will occur on this date and on Tuesday, September 27th at 10 a. m.

The sale of seats for the evening concerts will begin on Thursday, September 29th at 10 a. m., and be continued Friday, September 30th at 10 a. m. Mr. Max Fiedler will again conduct the orchestra.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SOME FACTS OF THE WORK OF GREAT ORCHESTRAS.

Estabi

Boston's 30-Year Record Approaches 3,000 Concerts of 900 Pieces of Symphonic Music—Conductors of Old Days and Contracts of the New—New York Orchestra Players Also Under Year's Contract.

The time for renewals has passed with late September days at the box office, but one annual renewal comes back by the early October cables from Berlin, the old rumor that Karl Muck "expects to make his home in Boston for a prolonged period." This, too, when Max Fiedler returned only this week from Hamburg for his second winter in New England. At least, the scholarly Prof. Fiedler is welcome to quiet folk. And as Dr. Muck will not be technically "at liberty" until the expiration of his contracts with the Kaiser's musical underlings in 1912, those spirits that burn for more ardent temperamental manifestations may go for their enemies with the cry of "Muck raker" for a long time to come.

It never happened yet that musical politics should be allowed to interfere long with the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The management called widespread attention this week to some facts in their past record. This season is not only the twenty-fifth in New York but the thirtieth since Mr. Higginson's men gave the first concert in Boston on Oct. 21, 1881. Sixty-five men were then hired four days a week and George Henschel led twenty public rehearsals and twenty concerts in the old Music Hall of Boston. When the present season is ended the orchestra will have given 2,946 concerts of over 900 different works.

The season here is seven months. Orchestras in Europe that give more concerts usually play throughout the year.

New York heard its first Boston Symphony concert in Steinway Hall on Feb. 14, 1887. Two more were given, and the next year four, while in 1889-1890, there were five in the larger Chickering Hall. Nikisch was conductor when a move uptown was made to Carnegie Hall. Again, under Paur, in 1894-95, there was another move for four years to the Metropolitan Opera House. Finally in 1898-99, when Gericke came back, the orchestra returned to Carnegie Hall and increased its yearly concerts here from five to ten.

The wise men from the East who first played here numbered seventy-five. This year the membership is an even hundred, on a basis of sixteen first violins with an extra man on each principal part in brass and woodwind for emergencies.

These men are under contracts that run from thirty weeks for the principals to forty for the less expert. For special reasons, they cannot fill in time in other bands. A man may play but once a month but he draws his pay and he reports for all rehearsals.

In all, 177 concerts have been given in New York, with Gericke conductor for ten years, Nikisch four, Paur five, Henschel one, Muck two and Fiedler two.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

As in past years, five concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music during the impending season, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert in November the soloist will be Madame Nellie Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this year either in concert or opera this will be and the chances are this will be the last time she sings here for a number of years to come, for the next two or three years will find her engaged with her venture in grand opera that she is to make in Australia, and she plans not to return to America for several years. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the December concert, Mischa Elman at the January, Heinrich Warnke at the February, and Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English contralto, at the March concert.

Miss Harris will have charge of the subscriptions and ticket sales of the orchestra at her office in Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. The last day on which subscribers of the season of 1909-1910 may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and retain the seats occupied by them a year ago is Wednesday, October 12. On Monday, October 17, the tickets will be on sale for new subscribers.

Estab k, 1884

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The Boston Symphony is announced to give its usual series of five concerts at the Academy of Music this season, the first occurring on Monday evening, November 7, when Mme. Melba will be the soloist. The succeeding dates are December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20.

Estab

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Esta 884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirtieth season in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next with a program devoted entirely to Schumann, in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. Reports from Boston have it that at the auction sale of the season tickets there, despite the twenty weeks of grand opera at the new opera house, the prices averaged higher than ever before, and that the present season will be probably the best the orchestra has ever had. A total of 117 concerts are to be given, these including two pension fund concerts and the three choral concerts, which are the result of the new alliance between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the famous Cecilia Society of that city.

It is an exceedingly brilliant list of soloists that the management has provided for the five concerts the Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia during the coming Winter. As in past years, the concerts will be given on Monday evenings, in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert in November the soloist will be Madame Nellie Melba. The last day on which subscribers of the Philadelphia season of 1909-10 may renew their subscriptions for the coming season, and retain the seats occupied by them a year ago, is Wednesday, October 12. On Monday, October 17, the tickets will be on sale for new subscribers.

* * *

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Estal 1884

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirtieth season in Boston, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, with a program devoted entirely to Schumann in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. Reports from Boston have it that at the auction sale of the season tickets there the prices averaged higher than ever before and that the present season will be probably the best the orchestra has ever had. One hundred and seventeen concerts are to be given, these including the two pension fund concerts and the three choral concerts which are the result of the new alliance between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Cecilia Society of that city.

In this city the concerts will be given on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20. At the first concert the soloist will be Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this year either in concert or opera this will be. This may be the last time she sings here for a number of years, for the next two or three years will find her engaged with her venture in grand opera in Australia. She plans not to return to America for several years. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the December concert, Mischa Elman at the January, Heinrich Warnke at the February and Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English contralto, at the March concert.

Miss Harris has charge of the subscriptions and ticket sales of the orchestra at her office in Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1119 Chestnut street The last day on which subscribers of the season of 1909-10 may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and retain the seats occupied by them a year ago, is Wednesday, October 12. On Monday, October 17, the tickets will be on sale for new subscribers.

* * *

From EVE. TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Est 1884

Details of the local season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now announced. The five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20. A most brilliant list of soloists is announced. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be this year. In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann; in January, Mischa Elman; in February, Heinrich Warnke, and in March, Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY GAZETTE

OCTOBER 7, 1910

CALENDAR NOTES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings, October 20, November 17, December 15, 1910, January 19, February 9, March 2, March 30, and April 27, 1911. The price of tickets for the series will be $7.00 each.

On October 6 application blanks for the purchase of season tickets were mailed to all officers of the University living in Cambridge. After the filling of the applications of the officers, the remaining tickets will be put on public sale on Saturday, October 15, at George H. Kent's University Bookstore, Cambridge.

[22]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau

From ITEM

Address PHILADELPHIA PA

Date OCT 3 1910

Esta ...rk, 1884

Liszt's "Dante" symphony, strangely neglected in this country, is to be performed the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Wagner, after reading the score of this work, referred to Liszt as an artist "from whose every pore music pours in wells and streams and waterfalls"; and after repeatedly hearing it, he exclaimed: "This music is sublime!" In one of his essays he refers to the "Dante" symphony as an immortal work, "even though that immortality be not recognized at present in Leipzig and Berlin." It may, of course, be taken for granted that Mr. Fiedler will not take the time to rehearse this colossal work for Boston alone, but will bring it to New York and Brooklyn, too. It will be, in that case, one of the events of the season.

Some notable works in the Boston Orchestra's repertory will be Mahler's second symphony. Debussy's "Iberia" and "Rondes de Printemps" (first time in America), and Henry Hadley's "Culprit Fay," one of that American's numerous prize-winners. Special attention is to be paid to the English composer, Fritz Delius. His orchestral nocturne, "Paris," when played in Boston last season, created a desire to hear more of this man's music; this will be gratified by the performance of four of his pieces, all novelties: "In a Summer Garden," "Dance Rapsody," "Brigg Fair," and "Appalachia," a set of variations for orchestra and chorus on a Mississippi slave song. Another English composer, Granville Bantock, will be represented by "Three Dramatic Dances."

It is worthy of special note that a chorus is employed in no fewer than four of the works chosen by Mr. Fiedler for Boston. They are Liszt's "Dante" symphony, Debussy's "Nocturne," Delius' "Appalachia," and Hadley's "Culprit Fay." This seems to indicate a new tendency in orchestral concerts—a tendency reaching its climax in Mahler's eighth symphony, which has just had such a sensational success in Munich.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 1 1910

Est ...1884

MUSICAL NOTES.

Change in Symphony Concert Dates in Providence.

A slight change has been made in the dates of the Boston Symphony concerts that are to be given in Providence during the coming winter. As already announced there will be five of these, instead of the four that were given last year, and the first concert will fall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 25, instead of on Tuesday evening, Oct. 18, as first announced. The other concerts will come on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14 and April 4.

It is impossible at this time to announce the soloist for the first and last concerts, but both of them will be singers of exceptional value. At the second concert, in November, the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, and at the third concert, in January, Mischa Elman will again appear, while at the February concert the soloist will be the brilliant pianist, Yolande Mero.

With the new date for the first concert, last year's subscribers will have until Saturday, Oct. 15, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they occupied last season. The public sale for new subscribers will open on Monday, Oct. 17, the sales taking place as usual at M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street.

A NEW TENOR HERE.

Guiseppe Gaudenzi, who has been selected by Mascagni and Miss Bessie Abott to create the tenor role in "Ysobel" at the New Theatre in November, arrives on the Moltke of the Hamburg-American Line from Genoa on Sunday.

Gaudenzi was born at Bologna in 1880. He studied at the university of that city—the oldest one in Italy—and took his degree in 1903. For three years he practiced law and studied the violin and singing as an amateur. He made a number of appearances on the stage in Bologna in amateur performances, as an actor, singer and pantomimist.

Signor Gaudenzi made his debut in November, 1906, at Florence in the Teatro Vendi as Canio in "Pagliacci." He met with such a triumph that he sang no other role for a year and was engaged to sing at Bologna and at Rome. Here he met Mrs. Watkins Griswold, an American teacher of singing from Buffalo, and it was with her that he studied nearly all the roles in his repertory. In one way Signor Gaudenzi may be said to be the pupil of an American singer, and he is going to Buffalo to study his role in "Ysobel" with Mrs. Griswold. He has sung at San Remo, Modena, Odessa and Caracas in Venezuela.

His greatest success was won at La Scala, in Milan, where he appeared in "Andrea Chenier" and created the tenor roles in "Boris Goudonoff" and "Elektra." This year he has sung at Cremona, Brescia and Turin, where he created the leading part in "Santa Poesia," by Cortopassi. Signor Gaudenzi was engaged at La Scala on the recommendation of Toscanini and Gatti-Casazza. Mingardi, the manager of La Scala, was very anxious to secure the services of Gaudenzi for the coming season, and it was only the prospect of creating the tenor role in Mascagni's new opera that tempted him to come to America.

From NEWS

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date

Esta ...884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A slight change has been made in the dates of the Boston Symphony concerts that are to be given in Providence during the coming winter. As already announced there will be five of these instead of the four that were given last year and the first concert will fall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 25, instead of on Tuesday evening, Oct. 18, as first announced. The other concerts will come on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14, and April 4. It is impossible at this time to announce the soloist for the first and last concerts but both of them will be singers of exceptional value. At the second concert, in November, the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, and at the third concert, in January, Mischa Elman will again appear, while at the February concert the soloist will be the brilliant pianist Yolande Mero. With the new date for the first concert, last year's subscribers will have until Saturday, Oct. 15, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats which they occupied last season. The public sale for new subscribers will open on Monday, Oct. 17, the sales taking place as usual at M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street.

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Establ ...34

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dates and Soloists for the Season Finally Selected.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has arranged its Washington season. Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, of 2647 Connecticut avenue, again has charge of the subscription and the management of the orchestra in Washington. The concerts will be given as usual in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock, the dates being November 3, December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 21.

At the first concert the soloist will be Miss Margaret Keyes, one of the foremost American contraltos. Josef Hofmann, the brilliant pianist, will appear at the concert in December, while in January Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist. Alwin Schroeder, the distinguished 'cellist, will be the soloist at the February concert, and in March Mme. Jomelli, the favorite soprano, will appear.

Mrs. Greene reports that practically the entire subscription of 1909-1910 as been renewed and that the tickets for the same will be ready for delivery on and after October 18 at Droop's music store. Those of last year's subscribers who have not yet renewed their subscriptions have until Wednesday, October 12, in which to do so and retain the seats which they had last year. On Tuesday, October 18, such seats as remain will be offered for sale at Droop's music store, Thirteenth and G streets.

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Est ...1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirtieth season in Boston on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with a program devoted entirely to Schumann in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth.

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, of 2647 Connecticut avenue, again has charge of the subscription and management of the orchestra in Washington. The concerts will be given as usual in the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, the dates being November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 21.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN

Address BALTIMORE MD

OCT

Date

Establish

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirtieth season in Boston on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with a program devoted entirely to Schumann in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth.

It is an exceedingly brilliant list of soloists that the management has provided for the five concerts which the orchestra will give in Baltimore. The concerts will be given, as usual, on Wednesday evening in the Lyric Theater, the dates being November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 3 - 1910

Est ...k, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRANGES PROGRAM

Selects Great Artists For Five Concerts To Be Given Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirtieth season in Boston on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with a program devoted entirely to Schumann in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth.

The soloists whom the management has provided for the five concerts which the Orchestra will give in Baltimore are among the very best. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evenings in the Lyric Theater, the dates being November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba. At the second concert the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist at the January concert, as he was last year. The Beethoven Choral Symphony will be repeated with the aid of the Baltimore Oratorio Society at the concert which comes on Wednesday evening, February 22. Madame Rider-Kelsey will be the soprano. At the last concert the soloist will be Anton Witek, the Bohemian violinist.

The subscription and season ticket sales for these concerts will, as in the past, be in the hands of W. A. Albaugh at his office at the corner of Fayette and Charles streets. He announces that subscribers of last year will have until Thursday, October 13, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats occupied by them a year ago. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open on the following Monday, October 17.

The management announces that ordinarily the prices for single tickets to these concerts will be $2 and $1.50, but in the case where extraordinary expense is incurred in a soloist, as, for example, when Melba is engaged, the management reserves the right to increase the price of single tickets for such a concert.

TRAVELER, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1910.

SYMPHONY MEN PARTICIPATE AT SMITH COLLEGE

Members of the Symphony Orchestra have been arriving all the week, and will continue to drift into the city during the next fortnight. Owing to difficulties in securing passage, a few of the players have been delayed, but soon the entire orchestra will be assembled. Already Mr. Witek, the new concert master, has assumed his place, and a new member, returning to the orchestra after an abscence of seven years, is Alwin Schroeder, whose place is at the first desk of the 'cellos, with Mr. Warnke.

Those who are already here left town this afternoon to give its first concert of the season this evening in Northampton at Smith College. The occasion is in honor of the new president of the college, who takes office today.

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony to be given Friday afternoon is in the nature of a Schumann memorial, and will include the "Manfred" and "Genoveva" overtures, the "Rhenish" symphony and the violoncello concerto, rarely heard, not having been played here since Mr. Gericke's time. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

The Schumann centenary was celebrated last spring in Vienna and in several of the large musical centres of Germany, and Mr. Fiedler has elected to make memorable the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony with such a memorial.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1910.

Methods of Symphony Interpretation

Max Fiedler's reading of the orchestral composers modern in spirit.

WHAT does this music tell me? asks one man who is about to interpret a symphonic masterwork to an audience.

Quite a different question is in the mind of another interpreter who takes his preparatory look at a score.

Instead of seeking for the thing that tradition says the composer put there, he tries to divine in the work new possibilities of self expression for his hearers and himself.

The creation of new emotions in his listeners rather than the recrudescence of old ones is his aim.

The question he asks himself—and the answer will lead him in a path at right angles to the other man's—is: "What can I make this music say?"

One orchestral conductor makes it his first duty to reveal the composer's intention.

If the symphony under consideration belongs, let us say, to the nineteenth century romantic school, he thinks he must bring into prominence all those elements which have been generally accepted as having the quality of romance.

The interpretations of such a musician will be praised for their historic atmosphere, for their insight into the spirit of the times in which the composer lived.

Another leader will test his music for its capacity to respond to his own feelings or to those of his audience. He will expect music of the romantic school, or of any other, to be pliant to his will and reflect the sentiments of men of today, rather than to intrude its own epoch and to present thought in the dress of a bygone mode.

Admitting that any classic composition is in a more or less definable way a picture of the decade in which it was written, admitting that works exist in which recognizable moods of intellect and emotion are voiced, admitting the truth of almost any of the historic formulas, as for example that Beethoven's music is romanticism in the bud, Schumann's music romanticism in the flower; admitting, too, that the makers of programme music have carried their art far into the realm of pictorial representation, we yet find large interpretative possibilities for the orchestral leader, who ignores all these things; or who, in any event, puts them in the background.

It is of the greatest importance to us to consider a conductor's ideas on these points when we are listening to his performance of a symphony.

Perhaps as he directs it he is less concerned than we are whether it is an Austrian product of a century ago, a German work of the fifties or something French of today.

Perhaps when we are thinking of the Danube, the Rhine or the Seine, he is trying to get a smooth legato from his violins in the second subject of the allegro.

Perhaps when we are surrendering ourselves to a mood which a generation or two of musical commentators have agreed the composer meant to induce in us, the conductor is estimating his reserve of tone for a crescendo.

It may be we have been told that the music denotes the march of a series of events, that it is a biography in tone, as plain to read as a book; that it is tonal landscape, philosophy or what not; and while we are struggling to get at some incident in a career, to perceive a detail in a picture or to comprehend a theory, the interpreter of the piece as likely as not is putting his whole energy into contrasting the tone volume of his string choirs and wind choirs quite regardless of any descriptive text that may be printed on the front page of the big book whose leaves he is turning so rapidly.

No conductor, of course, whatever his disregard of the extramusical meaning of a symphony, puts his whole mind on the mechanics of phrasing, tone power and color.

If he gives no particular thought to the locality whence a musical work arose, is not careful to remind us of its historic significance, takes no pains to make 200 pages of lines and notes live up to the character prefaced for them in one page of poetry or prose, he nevertheless has some good reason for asking us to hear his interpretations.

If the conductor of the kind described holds the baton over the Boston Symphony orchestra, if it is Max Fiedler who asks the question, "What can I make this music say?" we know that he has something for us of greater moment than orchestral technique.

We can be assured that when Mr. Fiedler performs Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony" at the concert wherewith the Boston music season opens, we shall waste our time studying the interpretation as a tone picture of Cologne cathedral, no matter what the books may say were the composer's open declarations about the first movement or the fourth.

Vain study for us to ponder how Mr. Fiedler senses the romanticism of the "Rhenish Symphony," even granted that in this mid-nineteenth century work the Schumannesque quality should show itself mellow ripe.

If the symphony, as read by Mr. Fiedler, moves us, it will be because it sharpens our consciousness of our present day aspirations.

Its survival through 60 years of comparison with other symphonies in the concert repertory will be accounted for not by its documentary interest, but by its power to unfold thought to us in 1910 that it never made known to listeners before.

It is a serious mistake to draw comparison between a conductor like Mr. Fiedler and an interpreter who regards his music from the historic and program standpoint, unless at the outset the fundamental difference between the method of the one and the other is recognized.

We should not estimate the readings of the present Symphony leader in the light of the readings of his predecessors without bearing in mind that his aims are not the same as theirs.

We hear a Busoni play Beethoven's Sonata, op. 111, and we cry out at him "Technique!"

We hear Max Fiedler conduct Schumann's Third symphony, and we cry "Tone! Tone!"

As though the pianist had not developed that execution of his because through it he can tell what he cannot tell through the old technique; and as though Mr. Fiedler had not developed that tone flexibility and tone volume in his orchestra because it answers a rhetorical demand of the times.

NOTES.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gives its first concert of the season this evening at Smith College, Northampton, in honor of the inauguration of the new president of the institution. Incidentally a new hall and a new organ will be dedicated.

The orchestra had its first meeting on Monday morning. Mr. Witek, the new concert-master, assumed his place; and at the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Warnke was Mr. Schroeder, a member of the orchestra after seven years' absence. Tickets for Saturday evening concerts are on sale at Symphony hall. The program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week will be devoted entirely to Schumann, in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. It consists of the "Manfred" and "Genoveva" overtures, the Rhenish symphony and the seldom-heard violoncello concerto. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

* * *

BOSTON TIMES
OCTOBER 8, 1910.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces the usual eight concerts in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, Thursday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19. Feb. 9, March 2, March 30, and April 27. At the first concert Charles Gilibert, the distinguished French baritone, will sing. The soloist at the second will be Miss Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; at the third, Josef Hofmann, pianist; at the fourth, Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; at the fifth, Edmond Clement, the French tenor, who made a marked impression in New York last winter; at the sixth, Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, contralto; at the seventh, Miss Corneille Overstreet, pianist, and at the eighth and last, Alwyn Schroeder, 'cellist.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY
OCTOBER 6, 1910

News of Music

As a part of the ceremonies for the installation of the new president of Smith College, the Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last night in the auditorium lately built at Northampton. Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon," Beethoven's fifth symphony, Liszt's concerto of the triangle for piano and orchestra and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812" made the programme, which certainly lacked the dignity of the list arranged for the similar concert in Cambridge at the inauguration of President Lowell last year. What fitness such an orgy of din, such a brass-band piece as the overture "1812" had for such an occasion it is hard to discover, though the truth is that not Mr. Fiedler, but the authorities of Smith College, suggested it. Presumably, too, the reason for the inclusion of the concerto—another anomaly—was the desire of a teacher of music at the college to play the solo part.

ADVERTISER, THURSDAY
OCTOBER 13, 1910

DEATH OF CHARLES GILIBERT, FAMOUS FRENCH BARITONE

Was to Have Sung Next Week at Boston Symphony Concert—Came From Paris Saturday.

New York, Oct. 12.—Charles Gilibert, a widely known French opera baritone, died here suddenly last night at a hotel. News of Mr. Gilibert's death did not become known until today. He arrived here from Europe last week to sing during the coming season with the Metropolitan Opera Co., after four seasons with the Manhattan Co. Mr. Gilibert was to have sung one of the parts in Puccini's new opera "The Girl of the Golden West."

Mr. Gilibert was to have sung next week with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Boston and at Cambridge, Mass.

Mr. Gilibert suffered from an abscess in the ear. Though he was suffering on his arrival from Paris on Saturday, his illness did not develop dangerously until yesterday when he became unconscious and remained so until the end. The body will be sent to Europe in a few days.

Mme. Gilibert, who was to have sailed for New York this week, has been notified by cable of her husband's death, and will remain in Paris. Mlle. Marianne Flahaut, a well known contralto, a lifelong friend of Mme. Gilibert, was with M. Gilibert when he died.

Besides Mme. Gilibert, well known as a singer, under the name of Gabrelle Lejeune, M. Gilibert is survived by a son, aged eight.

THE BOSTON HERALD
OCTOBER 13, 1910.

CHARLES GILIBERT DEAD.

French Baritone Was to Sing with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, Oct. 12—Charles Gilibert, the widely known French operatic baritone, died suddenly last night at the Hotel Gregorian. He arrived here from Europe last week to sing during the coming season with the Metropolitan opera company, after four seasons with the Manhattan, and was to sing one of the parts in Puccini's new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West." He was also to sing next week with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Boston and Cambridge.

Mr. Gilibert's trouble was an abscess in the ear. Though he was suffering on his arrival from Paris on Saturday, his illness did not develop dangerously until yesterday, when he became unconscious and remained so until the end. The body will be sent to Europe in a few days.

Mme. Gilibert, who was to sail for New York this week, has been notified by cable to remain in Paris.

Mlle. Marianne Flahaut, the well known contralto and a lifelong friend of Mme. Gilibert, was with M. Gilibert when he died.

Besides Mme. Gilibert, well known as a singer under the name of Gabrelle Lejeune, M. Gilibert is survived by a son, aged 8.

Gilibert was best known in Boston through his appearances with the Boston Symphony orchestra, but he had appeared also in opera. In 1903 he visited Boston on a concert tour with Melba.

Gilibert was born in Paris on Nov. 19, 1866. He first studied singing at the Paris Conservatory, where he took many prizes. His teachers were Barbot, Giraudet and Ponchard. He was a member of the Opera-Comique company of 1889, when he made his real debut as Gil Perez in Auber's "Le Domino Noir," although he had earlier taken the part of the Bishop in Massenet's "Esclarmonde." He appeared in repertory pieces and created the part of De Cagli in Diaz's "Benvenuto" in December, 1900. In 1891 he joined the Monnaie company of Brussels. He sang at the Monnaie for several seasons, also at Covent Garden in London until he became a member of the Metropolitan in New York. He was brought to this country by Maurice Grau, long his personal friend, for the first performance in this country of the opera "La Tosca."

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY
OCTOBER 7, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A Word About Mr. Witek—The Considerable Place That He Occupied in the Musical Activities of Berlin—Puffs Preliminary for Elgar's New Violin Concerto—Mr. Fiedler's and Dr. Richter's "Schumann Programmes"—A Hint from the Boston Opera House—The Revival of "Armide" to Begin the Season at the Metropolitan—Reger Writes Choral Music—A Beethoven "Festival House" in Holland

IN the Berlin correspondence of the current issue of the Musical Courier is this interesting paragraph about Mr. Witek, the new concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, who makes his first appearances here this afternoon and tomorrow evening: "Berlin is sorry to lose Witek. For sixteen years he was a prominent figure in the musical life of this city and he made a host of friends and admirers here, as a man as well as concert-master, soloist, ensemble performer and teacher. As a concert-master, Witek is unexcelled and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra will find it difficult to replace him. He came here from Prague in 1894 and for a full decade and a half he led the violins of this band of musicians. He was also the leading soloist among the personnel of the orchestra and his frequent appearances at the Tuesday, Wednesday and Sunday popular concerts were always signals for full houses. It happened that I came to Berlin the same year that Witek did, and I distinctly recall hearing him play for the first time at one of the Tuesday 'Pops' in the fall of 1894. His number that night was Mendelssohn's concerto; he gave a beautiful, finished, artistic performance of the well worn piece, his technic was impeccable, his intonation faultless, even then, and he played with the ease and assurance of the brilliant virtuoso. Witek at that time was only about eighteen years old. Since then I have heard him play practically his entire repertory, which embraces everything of interest in violin literature. Witek prefers, however, the big symphonic concertos, like Brahms's, Beethoven's and Tschaikowsky's, although he is thoroughly at home in the virtuoso pieces of Wieniawski, Ernst and Paganini.

"As an ensemble player, Witek has made an enviable reputation for himself in Germany. The annual series of concerts given by his trio in this city ranked among the best that Berlin had to offer in this genre. It was always a marvel to me how Witek retained his technic and repertory, as with his orchestra work, his solo and ensemble playing and teaching, he was an exceedingly busy man. Many Americans studied under him during his stay in the German capital and they always spoke of their teacher with enthusiasm. Witek is a Bohemian, not a German, and he studied at the Prague Conservatory under Bennewitz, who was also the teacher of Halir, Ondricek and Zajic. He came to Berlin at the age of eighteen and he was identified with the musical life of this city uninterruptedly up to the end of last season. Vita Witek, the violinist's wife, is a pianist of ability and attainments. A pupil of Leschetizky and Carreño, she has been the pianist of the Witek Trio ever since it was founded and she has proved to be an able partner for her husband. The artist couple will continue their ensemble work in Boston."

News of Music

IT is interesting to compare the programme that Mr. Fiedler has arranged for the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow to commemorate the centenary of the birth of Schumann with that which Richter has prepared for a like purpose for the Hallé Concerts at Manchester in England. The two conductors agree only in the choice of the overture to "Manfred." Mr. Fiedler's symphony is the "Rhenish" and Richter's, the symphony of the spring. Mr. Fiedler has chosen the concerto for violoncello, and Richter, the concerto for pianoforte, with Harold Bauer to play it. Then the schemes of the two programmes separate widely. Richter's continues with choruses from "Manfred" and the piano piece, "Kreisleriana." Mr. Fiedler's list remaining orchestral, adds only the overture to "Genoveva."

As usual, Richter's programmes for the whole series of twenty concerts remain rigorously faithful to Bach, Brahms and Beethoven and the lesser classics. As the conductor grows older, he seems less and less disposed to play the music of any living composer. He cannot quite ignore Strauss, and it is interesting to see that he, as well as Mr. Fiedler, has picked "Macbeth" for performance. (The tone-poem is as unknown in England as it is in America.) In spite of vigorous protests from his more enlightened public, Richter will have none of the new Frenchmen, except Dukas. They play "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" in Germany. Therefore Manchester may also hear it. The conductor even designates it by its German title!

[24]

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1910.

Methods of Symphony Interpretation

Max Fiedler's reading of the orchestral composers modern in spirit.

WHAT does this music tell me? asks one man who is about to interpret a symphonic masterwork to an audience.

Quite a different question is in the mind of another interpreter who takes his preparatory look at a score.

Instead of seeking for the thing that tradition says the composer put there, he tries to divine in the work new possibilities of self expression for his hearers and himself.

The creation of new emotions in his listeners rather than the recrudescence of old ones is his aim.

The question he asks himself—and the answer will lead him in a path at right angles to the other man's—is: "What can I make this music say?"

One orchestral conductor makes it his first duty to reveal the composer's intention.

If the symphony under consideration belongs, let us say, to the nineteenth century romantic school, he thinks he must bring into prominence all those elements which have been generally accepted as having the quality of romance.

The interpretations of such a musician will be praised for their historic atmosphere, for their insight into the spirit of the times in which the composer lived.

Another leader will test his music for its capacity to respond to his own feelings or to those of his audience. He will expect music of the romantic school, or of any other, to be pliant to his will and reflect the sentiments of men of today, rather than to intrude its own epoch and to present thought in the dress of a bygone mode.

Admitting that any classic composition is in a more or less definable way a picture of the decade in which it was written, admitting that works exist in which recognizable moods of intellect and emotion are voiced, admitting the truth of almost any of the historic formulas, as for example that Beethoven's music is romanticism in the bud, Schumann's music romanticism in the flower; admitting, too, that the makers of programme music have carried their art far into the realm of pictorial representation, we yet find large interpretative possibilities for the orchestral leader, who ignores all these things; or who, in any event, puts them in the background.

It is of the greatest importance to us to consider a conductor's ideas on these points when we are listening to his performance of a symphony.

Perhaps as he directs it he is less concerned than we are whether it is an Austrian product of a century ago, a German work of the fifties or something French of today.

Perhaps when we are thinking of the Danube, the Rhine or the Seine, he is trying to get a smooth legato from his violins in the second subject of the allegro.

Perhaps when we are surrendering ourselves to a mood which a generation or two of musical commentators have agreed the composer meant to induce in us, the conductor is estimating his reserve of tone for a crescendo.

It may be we have been told that the music denotes the march of a series of events, that it is a biography in tone, as plain to read as a book; that it is tonal landscape, philosophy or what not; and while we are struggling to get at some incident in a career, to perceive a detail in a picture or to comprehend a theory, the interpreter of the piece as likely as not is putting his whole energy into contrasting the tone volume of his string choirs and wind choirs quite regardless of any descriptive text that may be printed on the front page of the big book whose leaves he is turning so rapidly.

No conductor, of course, whatever his disregard of the extramusical meaning of a symphony, puts his whole mind on the mechanics of phrasing, tone power and color.

If he gives no particular thought to the locality whence a musical work arose, is not careful to remind us of its historic significance, takes no pains to make 200 pages of lines and notes live up to the character prefaced for them in one page of poetry or prose, he nevertheless has some good reason for asking us to hear his interpretations.

If the conductor of the kind described holds the baton over the Boston Symphony orchestra, if it is Max Fiedler who asks the question, "What can I make this music say?" we know that he has something for us of greater moment than orchestral technique.

We can be assured that when Mr. Fiedler performs Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony" at the concert wherewith the Boston music season opens, we shall waste our time studying the interpretation as a tone picture of Cologne cathedral, no matter what the books may say were the composer's open declarations about the first movement or the fourth.

Vain study for us to ponder how Mr. Fiedler senses the romanticism of the "Rhenish Symphony," even granted that in this mid-nineteenth century work the Schumannesque quality should show itself mellow ripe.

If the symphony, as read by Mr. Fiedler, moves us, it will be because it sharpens our consciousness of our present day aspirations.

Its survival through 60 years of comparison with other symphonies in the concert repertory will be accounted for not by its documentary interest, but by its power to unfold thought to us in 1910 that it never made known to listeners before.

It is a serious mistake to draw comparison between a conductor like Mr. Fiedler and an interpreter who regards his music from the historic and program standpoint, unless at the outset the fundamental difference between the method of the one and the other is recognized.

We should not estimate the readings of the present Symphony leader in the light of the readings of his predecessors without bearing in mind that his aims are not the same as theirs.

We hear a Busoni play Beethoven's Sonata, op. 111, and we cry out at him "Technique!"

We hear Max Fiedler conduct Schumann's Third symphony, and we cry "Tone! Tone!"

As though the pianist had not developed that execution of his because through it he can tell what he cannot tell through the old technique; and as though Mr. Fiedler had not developed that tone flexibility and tone volume in his orchestra because it answers a rhetorical demand of the times.

NOTES.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gives its first concert of the season this evening at Smith College, Northampton, in honor of the inauguration of the new president of the institution. Incidentally a new hall and a new organ will be dedicated.

The orchestra had its first meeting on Monday morning. Mr. Witek, the new concert-master, assumed his place; and at the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Warnke was Mr. Schroeder, a member of the orchestra after seven years' absence. Tickets for Saturday evening concerts are on sale at Symphony hall. The program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week will be devoted entirely to Schumann, in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. It consists of the "Manfred" and "Genoveva" overtures, the Rhenish symphony and the seldom-heard violoncello concerto. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

* * *

BOSTON TIMES
OCTOBER 8, 1910.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces the usual eight concerts in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, Thursday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov, 17, Dec. 15, Jan. 19. Feb. 9, March 2, March 30, and April 27. At the first concert Charles Gilibert, the distinguished French baritone, will sing. The soloist at the second will be Miss Bessie Belle Collier, violinist; at the third, Josef Hofmann, pianist; at the fourth, Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra; at the fifth, Edmond Clement, the French tenor, who made a marked impression in New York last winter; at the sixth, Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, contralto; at the seventh, Miss Corneille Overstreet, pianist, and at the eighth and last, Alwyn Schroeder, 'cellist.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY
OCTOBER 6, 1910

News of Music

AS a part of the ceremonies for the installation of the new president of Smith College, the Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last night in the auditorium lately built at Northampton. Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon," Beethoven's fifth symphony, Liszt's concerto of the triangle for piano and orchestra and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812" made the programme, which certainly lacked the dignity of the list arranged for the similar concert in Cambridge at the inauguration of President Lowell last year. What fitness such an orgy of din, such a brass-band piece, as the overture "1812" had for such an occasion it is hard to discover, though the truth is that not Mr. Fiedler, but the authorities of Smith College, suggested it. Presumably, too, the reason for the inclusion of the concerto—another anomaly—was the desire of a teacher of music at the college to play the solo part.

ADVERTISER, THURSDAY
OCTOBER 13, 1910

DEATH OF CHARLES GILIBERT, FAMOUS FRENCH BARITONE

Was to Have Sung Next Week at Boston Symphony Concert — Came From Paris Saturday.

New York, Oct. 12.—Charles Gilibert, a widely known French opera baritone, died here suddenly last night at a hotel. News of Mr. Gilibert's death did not become known until today. He arrived here from Europe last week to sing during the coming season with the Metropolitan Opera Co., after four seasons with the Manhattan Co. Mr. Gilibert was to have sung one of the parts in Puccini's new opera "The Girl of the Golden West."

Mr. Gilibert was to have sung next week with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Boston and at Cambridge, Mass.

Mr. Gilibert suffered from an abscess in the ear. Though he was suffering on his arrival from Paris on Saturday, his illness did not develop dangerously until yesterday when he became unconscious and remained so until the end. The body will be sent to Europe in a few days.

Mme. Gilibert, who was to have sailed for New York this week, has been notified by cable of her husband's death, and will remain in Paris. Mlle. Marianne Flahaut, a well known contralto, a lifelong friend of Mme. Gilibert, was with M. Gilibert when he died.

Besides Mme. Gilibert, well known as a singer, under the name of Gabrelle Lejeune, M. Gilibert is survived by a son aged eight.

THE BOSTON HERALD
OCTOBER 13, 1910.

CHARLES GILIBERT DEAD.

French Baritone Was to Sing with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, Oct. 12—Charles Gilibert, the widely known French operatic baritone, died suddenly last night at the Hotel Gregorian. He arrived here from Europe last week to sing during the coming season with the Metropolitan opera company, after four seasons with the Manhattan, and was to sing one of the parts in Puccini's new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West." He was also to sing next week with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Boston and Cambridge.

Mr. Gilibert's trouble was an abscess in the ear. Though he was suffering on his arrival from Paris on Saturday, his illness did not develop dangerously until yesterday, when he became unconscious and remained so until the end. The body will be sent to Europe in a few days.

Mme. Gilibert, who was to sail for New York this week, has been notified by cable to remain in Paris.

Mlle. Marianne Flahaut, the well known contralto and a lifelong friend of Mme. Gilibert, was with M. Gilibert when he died.

Besides Mme. Gilibert, well known as a singer under the name of Gabrelle Lejeune, M. Gilibert is survived by a son, aged 8.

Gilibert was best known in Boston through his appearances with the Boston Symphony orchestra, but he had appeared also in opera. In 1903 he visited Boston on a concert tour with Melba.

Gilibert was born in Paris on Nov. 19, 1866. He first studied singing at the Paris Conservatory, where he took many prizes. His teachers were Barbot, Giraudet and Ponchard. He was a member of the Opera-Comique company of 1889, when he made his real debut as Gil Perez in Auber's "Le Domino Noir," although he had earlier taken the part of the Bishop in Massenet's "Esclarmonde." He appeared in repertory pieces and created the part of De Cagli in Diaz's "Benvenuto" in December, 1900. In 1891 he joined the Monnaie company of Brussels. He sang at the Monnaie for several seasons, also at Covent Garden in London until he became a member of the Metropolitan in New York. He was brought to this country by Maurice Grau, long his personal friend, for the first performance in this country of the opera "La Tosca."

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY,
OCTOBER 7, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A Word About Mr. Witek—The Considerable Place That He Occupied in the Musical Activities of Berlin—Puffs Preliminary for Elgar's New Violin Concerto—Mr. Fiedler's and Dr. Richter's "Schumann Programmes"—A Hint from the Boston Opera House—The Revival of "Armide" to Begin the Season at the Metropolitan—Reger Writes Choral Music—A Beethoven "Festival House" in Holland

IN the Berlin correspondence of the current issue of the Musical Courier is this interesting paragraph about Mr. Witek, the new concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, who makes his first appearances here this afternoon and tomorrow evening: "Berlin is sorry to lose Witek. For sixteen years he was a prominent figure in the musical life of this city and he made a host of friends and admirers here, as a man as well as concert-master, soloist, ensemble performer and teacher. As a concert-master, Witek is unexcelled and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra will find it difficult to replace him. He came here from Prague in 1894 and for a full decade and a half he led the violins of this band of musicians. He was also the leading soloist among the personnel of the orchestra and his frequent appearances at the Tuesday, Wednesday and Sunday popular concerts were always signals for full houses. It happened that I came to Berlin the same year that Witek did, and I distinctly recall hearing him play for the first time at one of the Tuesday 'Pops' in the fall of 1894. His number that night was Mendelssohn's concerto; he gave a beautiful, finished, artistic performance of the well worn piece, his technic was impeccable, his intonation faultless, even then, and he played with the ease and assurance of the brilliant virtuoso. Witek at that time was only about eighteen years old. Since then I have heard him play practically his entire repertory, which embraces everything of interest in violin literature. Witek prefers, however, the big symphonic concertos, like Brahms's, Beethoven's and Tschaikowsky's, although he is thoroughly at home in the virtuoso pieces of Wieniawski, Ernst and Paganini.

"As an ensemble player, Witek has made an enviable reputation for himself in Germany. The annual series of concerts given by his trio in this city ranked among the best that Berlin had to offer in this genre. It was always a marvel to me how Witek retained his technic and repertory, as with his orchestra work, his solo and ensemble playing and teaching, he was an exceedingly busy man. Many Americans studied under him during his stay in the German capital and they always spoke of their teacher with enthusiasm. Witek is a Bohemian, not a German, and he studied at the Prague Conservatory under Bennewitz who was also the teacher of Halir, Ondricek and Zajic. He came to Berlin at the age of eighteen and he was identified with the musical life of this city uninterruptedly up to the end of last season. Vita Witek, the violinist's wife, is a pianist of ability and attainments. A pupil of Leschetizky and Carreño, she has been the pianist of the Witek Trio ever since it was founded and she has proved to be an able partner for her husband. The artist couple will continue their ensemble work in Boston."

News of Music

IT is interesting to compare the programme that Mr. Fiedler has arranged for the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow to commemorate the centenary of the birth of Schumann with that which Richter has prepared for a like purpose for the Hallé Concerts at Manchester in England. The two conductors agree only in the choice of the overture to "Manfred." Mr. Fiedler's symphony is the "Rhenish" and Richter's, the symphony of the spring. Mr. Fiedler has chosen the concerto for violoncello, and Richter, the concerto for pianoforte, with Harold Bauer to play it. Then the schemes of the two programmes separate widely. Richter's continues with choruses from "Manfred" and the piano piece, "Kreisleriana." Mr. Fiedler's list remaining orchestral, adds only the overture to "Genoveva."

As usual, Richter's programmes for the whole series of twenty concerts remain rigorously faithful to Bach, Brahms and Beethoven and the lesser classics. As the conductor grows older, he seems less and less disposed to play the music of any living composer. He cannot quite ignore Strauss, and it is interesting to see that he, as well as Mr. Fiedler, has picked "Macbeth" for performance. (The tone-poem is as unknown in England as it is in America.) In spite of vigorous protests from his more enlightened public, Richter will have none of the new Frenchmen, except Dukas. They play "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" in Germany. Therefore Manchester may also hear it. The conductor even designates it by its German title!

[24]

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY
OCTOBER 8, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON IS BEGUN

FIRST PROGRAMME A SCHUMANN MEMORIAL

Alwyn Schroeder Welcomed Back to Orchestra Ranks—New Concert-Meister Appears.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schumann—Manfred Overture.
Schumann—"Rhenish" Symphony.
Schumann—Concerto for Violoncello.
Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Schumann—Genoveva Overture.

It was a noble beginning of the symphonic season. Not but the careful observer might have detected a point of roughness here or there such as is inseparable from the first concert after the summer vacation, but there was a glow of enthusiasm among the men and a degree of warmth in the conductor. The occasion was the celebration (a trifle belated) of the 100th anniversary of Schumann's birth. We are glad to count Mr. Fiedler among the most devout of Schumannites and it was quite evident that his heart was in his task.

How much of Music is sifted by a century! A hundred years ago they thought Hummel quite the equal of Beethoven, a little later they believed Kalkbrenner preferable to Chopin; a little later still and they much preferred Mendelssohn to Schumann.

A degree of sadness must always mingle with a Schumann celebration. A pensive seriousness speaks in his tones and constantly reminds one of the scourgings of Fate which followed the composer so constantly. The Byronic Manfred was to him a congenial type and his presentation of the unhappy hero, in the overture, is one of the finest things that Schumann ever achieved. The yearning tenderness of Astarte was also a most sympathetic character for Schumann's dual nature, and was certain to become a masterpiece in his hands.

Schumann called his resolute and masculine self, "Florestan," and his sympathetic and more feminine side "Eusebius," and carried this duality through much of his literary work and his music. In no single work can one find this "two-in-one" better displayed than in the "Manfred" overture. The contrasts were vividly brought out by the orchestra and none of the poetry of the work went unrecognized. The struggle which is omnipresent was finely portrayed, and the startling blare of the defiant three trumpets was thoroughly effective, while the death of Manfred was dramatically outlined. Schumann is not generally credited with good orchestration; yet the use of the trumpets in this work, and the trombones in the fourth movement of the symphony are masterly. In his first symphony, in the transition from the Larghetto to the Scherzo there is a similarly noble use of the trombones. The overture was evidently appreciated by the large audience.

The third symphony was one of the gleams of sunshine in Schumann's life. He had settled in Dusseldorf and entered with some zest into the happy Rhineland life. The symphony is largely idealized folk-music. This is in fine contrast with the movement marked "Feierlich," which pictures a lofty religious ceremony in Cologne cathedral wherein all possible dignity and majesty is displayed. After the ceremony (in the Finale) the happy hubbub of the chattering crowd as they pour into the streets of Cologne is a most genial companion piece. But even here there is never the jovial fun-making of a Mendelssohn or the grotesque humor of a Beethoven. But the playful second and fifth movements of this symphony are to our mind far more poetic than a "Midsummer-night's Dream Overture" or the "Jolly gathering of the Peasantry" of the Pastoral Symphony. It is noticeable in the Scherzo here that Schumann goes to the opposite extreme of form from his usual shape. In many Scherzos he used a double Trio, while here he uses none at all, but develops figures continuously, in a single movement.

We were glad that the two movements referred to were not taken too boisterously. With Schumann even a joy was a serious thing. The delicate beauty of the third movement was very effectively portrayed. But the majestic power of the first movement and the geniality of the Finale, seemed to us, on the whole, the most striking parts of the work. The symphony is too rarely given. We have had half-a-dozen performances of the Schumann B-flat symphony to one of this E-flat symphony, yet we find the latter fully as powerful as the former.

The final orchestral number, the "Genoveva" overture, is certainly the best part of that opera, but it is not so powerful as the "Manfred" which began the programme. Its beautiful second theme is decidedly Schumannesque, but its chief theme is less striking. The fact remains that Schumann was not a dramatic composer for the large forms and, although "Genoveva" holds a standard place among the overtures of the concert-room, we do not long for it as we do for many other of the master's works.

It was a keen delight to welcome Alwyn Schroeder back to the orchestral ranks. His violoncello-playing is a thing of beauty and a joy forever. He was greeted with warmth when he took his place in the orchestra, before the first number; with still more fervor when he came forward to begin his solo-work; and with long-continued enthusiasm when he had completed his task. And it was a task of abnegation, for this violoncello concerto does not rank with Schumann's other large works. It is far behind the piano concerto in musical value. Composed about the same time as the Rhenish symphony, it seems but a step-sister of that work.

The first movement was brimful of technical display which left us cold, in spite of Mr. Schroeder's admirable playing. There was some effective C-string work in this movement, but too much of fioritura.

The second movement was quite another story. It was a true Schumann romanza, which Mr. Schroeder played with all possible fervor. In the finale, although there was again much technical work, this display seemed more interwoven with the orchestral thoughts and did not seem an extraneous exhibition as it sometimes did in the first movement. If four recalls at the end meant a popular success then it was won, but we suspect that this enthusiasm was rather a personal tribute to Mr. Schroeder than indicative of affection for the composition.

Mr. Schroeder was, however, not the only hero of the concert. When the new concert-meister—Mr. Witek,—appeared, he was the recipient of much applause, and Mr. Fiedler was welcomed back with open arms, or at least with open hands, which were vehemently used in applauding him upon his entrance. A bust of Schumann, upon the platform, impressed the meaning of the concert upon every auditor. It is rather a severe test of any composer to give 10 of his movements in succession, but in this concert Schumann bore the test bravely.

GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1910.

PLAY IN HONOR OF SCHUMANN

Opening Symphony Rehearsal.

Witek Makes His Debut as Concert Master.

Alwin Schroeder Is the Solo 'Cellist.

The musical season of 1910-11 was launched at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon by the first Boston symphony rehearsal of the year. It is the 30th season of concerts by the orchestra in this city, the third for Mr Fiedler as its conductor.

This concert was in celebration of the centenary of Schumann's birth, which fell on the 3d of June. To this end the program was composed entirely of the works of Schumann as follows: The "Manfred" overture, the E flat major symphony (Rhenish), the concerto for violoncello and orchestra (Alwin Schroeder, soloist) and the "Genoveva" overture.

The audience arrived and bestowed itself in quite the habitual fashion. There was to be seen the eager exchange of greetings between friend and friend or the expression of pleasure upon each discovery of propinquity of seats.

There was lively conjecture as to the new concert master. His advent was no mere incident, for in our orchestra the principal of the strings is not merely the chief henchman of the conductor, but his office is invested with a marked distinction of its own. This is in no small way attributable to the dignity of bearing which characterized Mr Hess.

It was therefore a significant moment when, after all the members of the orchestra were seated, Mr Witek appeared, stood with unobtrusive, yet commanding authority for a few moments, receiving the welcoming applause which greeted him, and then took the chair which henceforth becomes his.

Mr Witek received but one of the welcomes yesterday. After eight years of wandering a prodigal, Alvin Schroeder was received again at his former post—the first chair of the 'cellos. Although he was to play the concerto after the intermission, he took his place in the ensemble for the "Manfred" and the symphony, which came before, and as he did so was warmly applauded.

Then it was Mr Fiedler's turn as he came on. The clapping of hands was instant at his appearance, was cordial and prolonged.

Had it been possible to choose a program sufficiently varied and cumulative in quickening interest, the first concert might have arrived at no inconsiderable brilliance, notwithstanding the heavy atmosphere and dispiriting drizzle without.

There was a more worthy end yesterday, however, than merely a brilliant concert. The bust of Schumann, garlanded in a frame of green, just below the conductor's desk, was the guiding motif for the spirit of the afternoon.

Beside reassembling orchestra and audience, the occasion was to remind of a maker of a new epoch in music, who added a new volume to the literature of the orchestra, if is true, but who is known with more distinction for his enrichment of the literature of song, of the piano, of chamber music and, by no means least, of the literature of musical journalism and criticism.

A recital by voice, piano or string quartet with a more intimate audience room and a program of music setting forth the exquisite workmanship in small and interior design, in which Schumann delighted, would be perhaps even more fit as an environment for such a memorial. For it is through certain of his songs, through his works for piano, the great string quintet, and to lesser degree, the quartet, and through the words preserved from his pen, that the reforming spirit, the light, the sympathy, the emotional appeal of the romantic Schumann may best be known.

It was not a mere commonplace, but a fateful utterance when at 20 he wrote his mother that his life had been "a battle between poetry and prose." He wrote that "nature is the great widespread handkerchief of God, embroidered with his eternal name, and serviceable to man for wiping away all his tears of sorrow"; and yet to oblige his mother and "the honorable Herr Rudel," his guardian, he tried to prepare himself for the sober exactions of a legal career.

Had the years spent at Leipsic and later at Heidelberg, where he took more cognizance of the companionship of Thibaut the musician than of the lectures of Thibaut the lawyer—had they been spent in acquainting himself with counterpoint and the technic of the orchestra, he might have written for that instrument with as unerring a sense as for the piano.

The spirit of the man, his sensing of the musical signs of the times and his message to posterity did not find their full expression in the orchestra.

Weber had first caught the spark of emotional fervor in the new romanticism which would uplift the mood and the idea, in distinction from the classicism which had magnified form. This ideal came to self consciousness in Schumann, although he scarcely realized it perhaps. At any rate his inspiration derived its origin from a poetic conception of beauty, which gave his music plasticity of mold and a freshness, radiance, fervor and color.

This ideal it was that led him to enter and reform the precarious field of musical journalism, which, in the middle of the last century, by its tendency to flatulent praise on the one hand, or to prejudiced detraction on the other, mirrored the superficial musical thought in Germany.

With his little coterie of "Davidsbundler" as associate editors he made his Neue Zeitschrift fur Musik a far reaching tongue of advocacy and defence of what he deemed worthy in this new light of romanticism and of frank denial to that which upheld a mere radical principle of form.

This is not the time or place to attempt any searching analysis of Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred" or of the "Rhenish" symphony. The day for that is past. Schumann's volatile and imaginative temperament was enkindled by the fiery vigor and sensuous beauty of Byron's verse. He made his musical setting of "Manfred" worthy in fancy and ardor—worthy of Byron's work, about which Goethe said, "This singular intellectual poet has taken my 'Faustus' to himself and extracted from it the strongest nourishment for his hyperchondriachal humor."

In the symphony the cathedral scene (fourth movement) seems somewhat more austere than suggestive of august and stately ceremonial; but how keenly restive the first movement, of what convivviality the scherzo, of what suave and gracious elegance the third, Nicht schnell, and how vivacious the last of the movements.

It has been said that the five movements characterize Schumann and four friends, all of the Davidsbund—the first himself, the second Dr Julius Knorr, the third Mendelssohn, the religioso Dr Hauptmann, and the last David, the violinist.

The concerto grows tedious at times in its development of phrases by sequence and in its more declamatory passages. It is most truly expressive in the long and curving melodic lines of the romanza. Here it is indeed the acme of lyric beauty.

It was good to hear Mr Schroeder with such a background of tone for an accompaniment. He played with commendable surety of technic in the florid portions, but it was in the cantabile passages of the slow movement that the breadth and nobility of both his tone and style were apparent.

Next week, Mr McMillen, the American violinist, will play for the first time at these concerts. Rachmaninoff's E minor symphony will be played for the first time in Boston.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1910.

NEW FACES GREETED AT THE SYMPHONY

Concert Master Witek Receives Cordial Reception on First Appearance.

Max Fiedler was enthusiastically welcomed back by Symphony patrons yesterday afternoon at the opening concert of the thirtieth season. Coming here two seasons ago comparatively unknown, he has surely established himself as one of the most popular conductors the world's finest orchestra has ever had. This, by the way, marked the beginning of the second half of his stay here.

Another cordial welcome was extended to the new concert master, Anton Witek, from the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, who has exchanged places with Professor Willy Hess. This is the most notable change the orchestra has seen since last season. Mr. Witek, who enjoys the reputation of being an excellent virtuoso as well as concert master, is a Bohemian by birth. He studied chiefly with Bennewitz at the Prague Conservatory. He was with the Berlin orchestra for sixteen years, taking the important position of first violin there at the age of 22.

Mr. Witek's youthfulness is rather in his movements than in his appearance. His manner is spirited and authoritative. He appears to be one of the heaviest men in the orchestra; a man of middle height and ample girth, with large head and the typical German artist's big shock of hair, and with glasses to lend a touch of scholarliness.

His appearance yesterday was somewhat unexpected, owing to a little accident that overtook him Thursday, when an impetuous automobile came swooping down on Mrs. Witek, involving a rescue and a wrench; and his seat was, in fact, occupied by Second Concert Master Sylvain Noack until just before the bell rang.

Afternoon of Welcomes.

Indeed, it was an afternoon of welcomes. Alwin Schroeder, once again a member of the orchestra after an absence of seven years, except for two single appearances, received a greeting that brought smiles to his face. This was as he sat down to share the first 'cello desk with Heinrich Warnke. Later in the afternoon, when he enjoyed the distinction of performing as the first soloist of the season, in the Schumann concerto played here years ago by Fritz Giese and by Leo Schultz, he won the biggest applause of the occasion.

There are several new faces on the platform this season. C. Fabrizio takes a place among the first violins, C. Van Wynbergen among the violas, A. Jaeger among the basses, A. Mosbach furnishes an additional contra-bassoon, and J. Neuman is the new tympanist. Altogether the orchestra now numbers ninety-nine, including Conductor Fiedler, and when the new trombone comes later in the season there will be an even hundred for the first time on record—a big jump from the original sixty-five organized in 1881.

The attendance yesterday was large, but the hall was not filled. The weather may account for it; also the none too magnetic all-Schumann program, in commemoration of the centennial of the romantic Robert. The "Manfred" and "Genoveva" overtures, the concerto previously mentioned and the third, or "Rhenish," symphony were the offerings. The audience especially enjoyed the second and fifth movements of the symphony, which were indeed melodious little masterpieces, most gracefully played. The same program will be repeated tonight.

Next Week's Program.

Next week's soloist will be Francis MacMillan, the young American violinist, who will play the Goldmark concerto in A minor. Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor will appear as the first novelty of the season. The other number will be Weber's delightful "Oberon" overture.

JOURNAL OCTOBER 13, 1910

GILIBERT DIES ON WAY TO BOSTON

Grand Opera Barytone Was to Sing Here Next Week.

Charles Gilibert, French grand opera baritone, who was to have sung here with the Boston Symphony orchestra, next week, is dead in New York. Mme. Gilibert has been notified. She will remain in Paris and take charge of the body on its arrival there.

Gilibert died suddenly in Hotel Gregorian last night. Mlle. Marianne Flahaut, a popular contralto and life-long friend of Mme. Gilibert, was with Gilibert when he died.

An abscess in the ear is said to have caused death. Gilibert was ill when he arrived from Europe last week, under contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company. He had been with the Manhattan company for four seasons until this year. He was also engaged to appear in Puccini's new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West."

He was born in Paris 43 years ago, and besides Mme. Gilibert, who is known in opera as Gabrelle Lejeune, a son 8 years old survives.

Women Wait in Rain for Symphony Rehearsal

PHOTO BY POST PHOTOGRAPHER TAKEN YESTERDAY AT 11 A. M., SHOWING THE CROWD OF WOMEN WAITING IN THE RAIN FOR ADMISSION TO THE FIRST WEEKLY REHEARSAL OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The one time of all times when the music lovers of Boston show that their love is genuine is the occasion when the rains descend upon the opening public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The opening rehearsal took place yesterday afternoon. At 8 o'clock in the morning a young woman appeared on the steps of Symphony Hall with a camp stool under one arm, and a copy of a magazine and an umbrella under the other arm. She arranged her camp stool, opened her magazine, adjusted her skirts, and sat down to wait.

By 9 o'clock there were 20 women on the steps. By 10 o'clock 50 more had arrived. At 11 o'clock there were nearly 200 grouped upon the steps, chattering amiably with each other while the cascades of water trickled from their shining black umbrellas.

When the doors finally opened, nearly 400 women, all of whom had waited in the rain from one to five hours to be sure of hearing good music from good seats at reasonable prices, crowded in out of the wet.

In the crowd there were not more than five men.

Those who pack the steps of Symphony Hall on the Fridays when the orchestra rehearses don't care whether the sun shines or the rain [illegible] They come to hear the music, and the weather never enters their thoughts.

Yesterday's programme was Schumann from beginning to end—a typical initial rehearsal. There were no soloists.

WELCOME TO WITEK

Fiedler Without Moustache Warmly Greeted by Symphony Audience—'Cellist Schroeder Resumes Old Position

BY OLIN DOWNES

The musical season of 1910-11 commenced yesterday afternoon with the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. The rainy weather in no wise interfered with the attendance, either on the floor or in the "rush" seats above, and when Mr. Fiedler appeared, minus the moustache of other days, he was welcomed with prolonged applause. The appearances of Anton Witek, the new concert-meister, and Alwin Schroeder, soloist of the occasion, who will now occupy the first 'cello desk with Mr. Warnke after an absence of seven years from the orchestra, lent additional interest to this concert.

Nor did the weather interfere with the bucket hats, and similar devices. Was it fact or delusion—a "hobble" skirt disappearing in the scurry when the last bell rang and the doors swung to?

According to German custom, Mr. Fiedler had arranged his first programme in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann, June 8, 1810. A bust of that composer, hung with a wreath in the midst of greenery, occupied the centre of the stage, just before the conductor's stand. The programme consisted of the "Manfred" overture, the E-flat symphony, the 'cello concerto, and the "Genoveva" overture.

Mr. Witek entered, according to custom, after the other members of the orchestra, and before Mr. Fiedler. He acknowledged a greeting from all parts of the hall.

Spirited Performance

There was, indeed, exceptional spirit in the playing of the opening overture and the symphony. The music was new again, and of engrossing interest. Given, even, a performance of less merit, the "Manfred" overture is likely to hold the hearer. For the stage, as we know, Schumann seldom if ever displayed aptitude, but when he approaches such a figure as the Manfred of Byron, and though this figure, as Hazlitt observed with perfect justice, is merely a bedraped Byron, he becomes strikingly dramatic as he depicts traits, psychology, in consonance with his own character. And how many artists have been inspired by this famous poem, over-drawn as it is, and an expression from a period past! There is greater music than Schumann's on the same theme. Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony will be heard later in the season.

When Mr. Schroeder came upon the stage he was given an enthusiastic welcome. Since his first appearance as soloist with the orchestra he has lost none of his skill. It was well to hear again the concerto, which will now probably be shelved for some seasons to come. It is not surprising that the piece is not often heard, that it is unpopular with 'cellists. The virtuoso is not adequately recompensed, in performance, for the difficulties which he overcomes, but a 'cellist as well as an audience may well stride through certain passages neither particularly important in themselves or idiomatic for the instrument, for the sake of the slow section of the concerto, a lyric of the most exquisite and appealing simplicity.

Mr. Schroeder's performance was masterly in every detail, and he was warmly applauded for his playing if not for his concerto. At the concerts of next week Rachmaninoff's second symphony, an important work, will be played for the first time in Boston, and Francis MacMillen, violinist, will be the soloist.

SUNDAY GLOBE
-OCTOBER 9, 1910.

...ond Concrt by the Symphony Orchestra.

The first symphonic novelty of the season has been placed on Mr Fiedler's program this week. This will be Rachmaninoff's second symphony, in E minor, opus 27. When this eminent Russian composer was engaged for his appearance in Boston a year ago he expressed an earnest wish that this symphony should be put on the program instead of his symphonic poem, "Toteninsel."

But it was found that with the symphony and his concerto and the other works that Mr Fiedler proposed doing, the program would be too long, therefore the honor of the first performance of this work fell to the Philadelphia orchestra, which played it at its home concerts in November of last year. It was later played in New York.

The soloist will be Mr Francis MacMillen, the American violinist, who appears for the first time with the Boston orchestra. He will play the seldom-heard concerto in A minor, by Goldmark, which was last played at a symphony concert in April, 1906, by Jacques Hoffmann of the orchestra. The other number will be the familiar "Oberon" overture by Weber.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

Subscribers to last year's symphony concerts in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, have until next Wednesday in which to renew their subscription for the coming season with the guarantee of securing the same seats they had last year. No promise can be made that those who renew after that date will be able to get their old seats. Such seats as are unclaimed will be placed on sale at the University book store, Harvard sq, Cambridge, next Saturday morning.

The scheme of concerts calls for eight, the dates being Oct 20, Nov 17, Dec 15, Jan 19, Feb 9, March 2 and 30 and April 27, all of these being Thursday evenings. At the first concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the eminent French baritone.

RECORD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8. 1910

Symphony Season Begins With Schumann Memorial

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schumann—Manfred Overture.
Schumann—"Rhenish" Symphony.
Schumann—Concerto for Violoncello.
Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Schumann—Genoveva Overture.

It was a noble beginning of the symphonic season. Not but the careful observer might have detected a point of roughness here or there such as is inseparable from the first concert after the summer vacation, but there was a glow of enthusiasm among the men and a degree of warmth in the conductor. The occasion was the celebration (a trifle belated) of the 100th anniversary of Schumann's birth. We are glad to count Mr. Fiedler among the most devout of Schumannites and it was quite evident that his heart was in his task.

The third symphony was one of the gleams of sunshine in Schumann's life. He had settled in Dusseldorf and entered with some zest into the happy Rhineland life. The symphony is largely idealized folk-music. This is in fine contrast with the movement marked "Feierlich," which pictures a lofty religious ceremony in Cologne cathedral wherein all possible dignity and majesty is displayed.

The delicate beauty of the third movement was very effectively portrayed. But the majestic power of the first movement and the geniality of the Finale, seemed to us, on the whole, the most striking parts of the work. The symphony is too rarely given. We have had half-a-dozen performances of the Schumann B-flat symphony to one of this E-flat symphony, yet we find the latter fully as powerful as the former.

The final orchestral number, the "Genoveva" overture, is certainly the best part of that opera, but it is not so powerful as the "Manfred" which began the programme. Its beautiful second theme is decidedly Schumannesque, but its chief theme is less striking. The fact remains that Schumann was not a dramatic composer for the large forms and, although "Genoveva" holds a standard place among the overtures of the concert-room, we do not long for it as we do for many other of the master's works.

It was a keen delight to welcome Alwyn Schroeder back to the orchestral ranks. His violoncello-playing is a thing of beauty and a joy forever. He was greeted with warmth when he took his place in the orchestra, before the first number; with still more fervor when he came forward to begin his solo-work; and with long-continued enthusiasm when he had completed his task. And it was a task of abnegation, for this violoncello concerto does not rank with Schumann's other large works. It is far behind the piano concerto in musical value. Composed about the same time as the Rhenish symphony, it seems but a step-sister of that work.

The first movement was brimful of technical display which left us cold, in spite of Mr. Schroeder's admirable playing. There was some effective C-string work in this movement, but too much of floritura.

Mr. Schroeder was, however, not the only hero of the concert. When the new concert-meister—Mr. Witek,—appeared, he was the recipient of much applause, and Mr. Fiedler was welcomed back with open arms, or at least with open hands, which were vehemently used in applauding him upon his entrance. A bust of Schumann, upon the platform, impressed the meaning of the concert upon every auditor. It is rather a severe test of any composer to give 10 of his movements in succession, but in this concert Schumann bore the test bravely.

[26]

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1910.

SYMPHONY HAS FIRST REHEARSAL

Thirtieth Season Opens Auspiciously with Robert Schumann's Works.

IN HONOR OF HIS BIRTH

Alwin Schroeder, 'Cellist, the Soloist in an Excellent Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The first public rehearsal of the 30th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, cellist, was the soloist. The program was made up of these compositions by Schumann: Overture to Byron's "Manfred"; symphony in E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish"; concerto for violoncello; overture to "Genoveva."

"Let us now praise famous men and our fathers that begat us * * * such as found out musical tunes, and recited verses in writing."

This concert was in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Schumann, who was born on June 8, 1810. It is meet that the births of great composers should be celebrated with pomp and ceremony, even when the composers were so thoughtless as to be born in months out of the musical season. And yet Schumann is one of the few composers to whom this public tribute seems incongruous; for his most characteristic music, the music that is individual, that sets him apart from others, was written for intimate friends rather than the great public; and the exquisite genius of Schumann is not revealed as a rule in his more ambitious and orchestral compositions.

It has been urged against him that his symphonies were thought for the pianoforte and then orchestrated crudely as by an amateur. This, however, is not the fatal objection. He had his own orchestral speech. Good, bad or indifferent, it was his own. He could not have otherwise expressed himself through the orchestral instruments. His speech is to be accepted or rejected, as the hearer is impressed chiefly by ideas or by the manner of expression.

A more serious objection is this: The genius of Schumann was purely lyrical, although occasionally there is the impressive expression of a wild or melancholy mood, as in the chords of unearthly beauty soon after the beginning of the overture to "Manfred." Whether the music be symphonic, chamber, a pianoforte piece or a song, the beauty, the expressive force lies in the lyric passages. When Schumann endeavored to build a musical monument, to quote Vincent d'Indy's phrase, he failed, for he had not architectonic imagination or skill.

His themes in symphonies, charming as they often are, give one the impression of fragments, of music heard in sleep chasings. Never a master of contrapuntal technic, he repeated these phrases over and over again instead of broadly developing them, and his filling in is generally amateurish and perfunctory. There is one marked exception, the heavenly theme in the adagio of the second symphony, and this movement is marred by the impertinent entrance of schoolboy counterpoint in the middle section.

The best of Schumann's music is an expression of states and conditions of soul. This music is never spectacular; it is never objective. Take, for instance, his music to Goethe's "Faust." The episodes that attracted the attention of Berlioz, Liszt, Gounod, were not to Schumann a source of inspiration. It was the mysticism in the poem that led him to musical interpretation. His music, whether for voice or instruments, is, first of all, "innig," and this German word is not easily translated into English. Heartfelt, deep, ardent, fervent, intimate; no one of these words conveys exactly the idea contained in "innig." There is the intimacy of personal and shy confession.

Schumann in his life was a reticent man. He dreamed dreams. He was lost in thought when others, in the beerhouse or at his home, were chattering about art. He put into his music what he would with difficulty have said aloud to his Clara. As a critic, he was bold in praise and blame. As a composer he was not often assertive as one on a platform. He told his dreams, he wove his romantic fabrics, for a few sympathetic souls. It is true that in his days of wooing he was orchestrally jubilant, as in the first movement of the symphony in B flat; but in this movement the anticipation aroused by the first measures is not realized. The thoughts soared above the control of the thinker; there was not the mastery over them that allows no waste material, that gives golden expression without alloy.

At his best this composer was an improvisator, and the only one to be compared with him in this respect is Chopin, who had the finer taste and the more artistic grasp. The genius of Schumann is revealed in songs and pianoforte pieces; in the lyric passages found here and there in the symphonies, especially in the symphony in D minor and in the sustained song of the movement in the second symphony to which I have alluded. In his own field, Schumann is lonely, incomparable. No composer has whispered such secrets of subtle and ravishing beauty to a receptive listener. The hearer of Schumann's music must in turn be imaginative and a dreamer. He must often anticipate the composer's thought. This music is not for a garish concert hall; it shrinks from boisterous applause.

The large audience was in holiday mood. Mr. Schroeder, who is again a member of the orchestra; the new concert master, Mr. Witek, and Mr. Fiedler were applauded heartily in turn as they took their place. The performance of the several compositions was also warmly applauded, and without discrimination. It is the custom to dwell upon the music played at the first concert of the season rather than upon the performance. Let us respect the tradition. Yet it may be said that the romantic charm of Schumann's music was too often missed in the performance yesterday, especially in the lovely third movement of the symphony.

Mr. Schroeder was more successful in the second movement of the concerto than in the florid passages. His cantabile was distinguished by purity and richness of tone; his bravura was dry and labored. But the concerto, as a whole, is a thankless task, and in reverence to Schumann it might well have been omitted.

The program next week will include Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor (first time here); Goldmark's concerto for violin (Mr. Macmillan, violinist); overture to "Oberon."

BOSTON POST, OCTOBER 15, 1910

2d Symphony Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES.

There was exceptional enthusiasm yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, when Rachmaninoff's second symphony was played for the first time in Boston at the second public rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Following that performance, Francis Macmillen, violinist, played the Goldmark concerto, and Weber's "Oberon" overture brought the concert to an end.

Those who were deeply impressed last season by the symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," may have wondered on reading advance notices, that the author of a haunting rhapsody should have deliberately encumbered himself with symphonic harness. But the symphony heard yesterday is a superb work. Great formal principles are adhered to with exemplary strictness, but it is without thought of formality, of pedantic worship of tradition. Yesterday, indeed, it was as if the composer, the man himself, with his steady eyes, his serious, sensitive face, were speaking.

The second symphony is an extraordinary personal document. It has strong physiognomy, its dramatic energy and romantic sweep compel. The potency of the musical ideas and their treatment is greatly augmented by the dark brilliancy of the instrumentation. Who will forget the wild vigor of the second movement, with its suggestion of barbaric marches and hurryings in the night, or the headlong rush of emotion in many other pages? The symphony owes its life partly to its tremendous rhythmic energy, and many passages display Rachmaninoff's extreme admiration and love of the music of Tschaikowsky. The work is big. The big grip, the big idea and the stronger the feeling the better ordered its expression. It is a master of himself as well as his material, who pens this symphony. The performance was one of the utmost effectiveness, and Mr. Fiedler was exceedingly fortunate in his reading of the new work. No wonder that there were recalls. Mr. Macmillen played a boresome concerto creditably. There will be occasion tomorrow to discuss his performance in detail. He was twice recalled.

SUNDAY POST OCTOBER 9, 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, what promises to be an important novelty, Rachmaninoff's second symphony, Op. 27, in E minor, will be played for the first time in this city. When Rachmaninoff paid Boston a memorable visit last season, he expressed a very earnest wish that this symphony should be put on the programme instead of the symphonic poem, "Toteninsel," which made such a profound impression upon the Symphony audiences, but it was found that the programme of the concert was of too great length to permit of doing such a thing. The honor of the first American performance fell to Philadelphia, where it was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra on the 26th and 27th of last November.

This symphony is in four movements, which adhere closely to the classic symphonic form, the form, it may be added, which is observed in the spirit as well as the letter, for the themes are very closely interrelated and derived from each other. The symphony, in fact, owes its being to the first short brooding phrase played by the 'celli and basses. This phrase is the motto of the work, and its despondency and melancholy are only effectually put to rout in the finale, an "allegro vivace" in tonic major, alla breve. It is developed at some length in the slow introduction, and it recurs again and again in different manifestations.

The first movement, again, in the course of the development of its themes, gives birth to many an idea which comes to fruition later in the work. A very breezy, vigorous rhythmed "allegro moderato" follows the opening movement, replacing the traditional scherzo. The scoring is exceedingly effective; the movement itself should be very successful. The finale is in rondo style. This symphony was probably published in 1909. It is dedicated to Sergei Tanieff. The score demands three flutes and piccolo, three oboes, English horn, two clarinets in A and a bass clarinet of the same pitch, horns in E, horns in F, 11 trombones, trombone and tuba, three kettledrums, percussion instruments.

The concentrated and unassuming style which is one of gratifying characteristics of the music of the later Rachmaninoff is here in evidence: the simplicity of the themes, which are as often as not a very brief melodic pattern, repeated in sequence; the instrumentation, at times dark, though again savagely brilliant; the harmony in which there are so many passages of interesting chromatic progressions, though the composer keeps well to his tonality, nor wanders from the straight path to say any of the things in which so many of his countrymen delight.

The soloists at the concerts of this week will be Mr. Francis MacMillen, who will then play with the orchestra for the first time. Mr. MacMillen will play the Goldmark A minor violin concerto, and the concert will come to an end with Weber's "Oberon" overture.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1910.

OPENING OF SYMPHONY'S THIRTIETH SEASON

By EDITH BURNHAM.

The 30th season of the Boston Symphony opened with the Friday afternoon rehearsal. The customary welcoming applause was given the conductor, Mr. Fiedler, Mr. Schroeder, 'cellist, and to the new concert-master, Mr. Witek, expressing a feeling of gladness that audience and orchestra had met after the long vacation. A laurel-decked bust of Schumann at the front of the stage indicated that this the opening concert was a Schumann memorial, the centenary of the birth of the composer having been June 8, too late for last season's concerts.

The programme included Schumann's Manfred and Genoveva overtures, the Rhenish Symphony and a concerto for violoncello and orchestra. The opening number was the overture to Byron's Manfred. In this the composer traces with somewhat less passion and emotion than does the poet the development of a soul from a state of guilt to its salvation and peace.

The theme and "environ" are at once suggested by the quick burst of notes at the start—which is characteristic of Schumann; he rarely wastes time in merely prefatory notes, but immediately enters on or plainly suggests his theme. The torture of guilt, the contention of the soul with all the spirits of darkness, is told in rent, torn harmony, which later becomes intermittently calmer; its turbulence is lulled and the music grows low and sweet, till the scarcely audible harmony bursts into long, liquid notes that are calm and strong and full of peace. Yesterday's orchestration expressed more fully the triumph and final peace of the soul than it did the awful turbulence of guilt, but the entire composition is marked by rare restraint, in striking contrast to the closing Genoveva overture, which is a riot of emotion at times.

Rhenish Symphony Bit of Allegory.

The Rhenish Symphony is a bit of allegory, a kind of memorial painting to the Rhine of Schumann. The allegory is never delicately illusive, but rather merely pictorial. The opening movement, full of life and animation, at once suggests the German folk-life, then follows the song of conviviality, which sings itself through the semi-bacchanalian moods into a pretty cantilena and then resolves itself again into the joyous folk-life. The third movement, slow and at times almost stately, has an anthem-like, paean-like strain which leads up to the fourth, or Cathedral, movement. This movement is particularly impressive; one pictures the Rhine bank, vaster and more beauteous than the groves of Ilex, a place of worship, and the paeans and anthems mount to its very dome, which is the dome of heaven itself. The Festival number following it, although full of local color and equally as pictorial, seems an anti-climax; its theme is so much smaller and its execution so much narrower.

The concerto for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment in A minor, Op. 129, with Mr. Schroeder as soloist, held most of the pure charm of the afternoon. It is romantic, full of youth and joy and passion. Mr. Schroeder executed it with rare emotional understanding, making his instrument throb with the deep, sustained note of passion at times, then delicately express all the light intricacies of feeling; now it seemed full of infinite longing, then the longing ceased and it was soothed and even radiant. The orchestra accompaniment seems always in a little higher key than the 'cello, and the two are as voice calling to voice, finally to melt into unison of tone and sentiment. Mr. Schroeder was recalled many times to respond to enthusiastic applause.

The Genoveva overture sounds the tragic note in its first measure, then changes to the romantic, erotic, and even epic. It has an almost rhythmical ebb and flow of feeling; undulations of joy and sadness sweep over it and make it a sea of emotion, over which soft breezes of feeling play, now sad, now rapturous, yet always with tragedy lurking in them. It is highly keyed, in the finale all the emotions being like the fine strings of an instrument strained to their uttermost to produce sound. The orchestra rendered this overture with much freshness and buoyancy; its rapidly changing emotions progressing with fine cumulative effect in the finale.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN SUNDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1910.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS 30TH YEAR

Director Fieldler Honors Schumann in the Initial Programme.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Without ceremony of display the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun its thirtieth season. A full generation has elapsed since Major Henry L. Higginson founded the band which has come to be considered the first in the world. And there were no speeches, no congratulations, no flowers; nothing to distinguish the first performance of the season from the eleventh or twenty-third.

The usual Symphony audience assembled, quiet, refined, and lacking gaudiness. The orchestra took its place to the accompaniment of hand-clapping as favorite players were recognized. Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist who left the orchestra seven years ago has returned, and when he appeared with his faithful instrument, there was a round of welcoming applause to which he bowed as pleased as Punch.

Then entered Herr Witek, the conductor master whom Boston has taken from Berlin in exchange for Willy Hess. He advanced slowly and impressively, clad in a long frock coat of German make, and, bowing when the audience applauded him as a newcomer of note. He turned to take his seat and found another musician in it, which was very embarassing, so he continued to bow until the chair was vacated.

It seems that Mr. Witek was crossing Huntington avenue with his wife when a disrespectful automobile threatened to run him down. He swung his wife back to the curbing in the nick of time and thereby sprained his right thumb, a most important member for playing the victim. That was why he was not expected at the first rehearsal.

Director Max Fiedler gained his stand unrecognized because he had shaved off those gorgeous Hamburg mustaches, which proves that America influences even the greatest musicians if they stay here long enough.

The opening concert and rehearsal was a memorial for Robert Schumann, born a hundred years ago and dead since half a century. A bust of Schumann half hidden in mourning stood in front of the platform.

Mr. Fiedler selected for performance four Schumann compositions which well represent the various phases of the composer's orchestral efforts. Schumann was greatest in his songs, and it is a pity there was no singer to interpret some of them. But the weird, mystic overture to Byron's Manfred, the familiar melodious and enchanting Symphony in E flat, No. 3, known as the Rhenish because it breathes the spirit and the moods of the Rhine people, and the beautiful and imposing overture to "Genoveva" made a satisfying program, while the violin concerto with orhcestral accompaniment in A minor, Opus 81, was endured because of its lovely slow movement. It is a work that presents enormous difficulties for the virtuoso, and yet it is not showy, so most soloists have no use for it.

Mr. Schroeder displayed his old-time agility of technique, and can still draw from his magic box rich, deep, thrilling tones.

Mr. Fiedler's vigor and energy has not departed with his mustache, and the playing of the orchestra at the first concert was what might have been expected from such a band and suhc a conductor.

[27]

SCHUMANN COMMEMORATED

The First Symphony Concert Devoted Wholly to His Music

A Necessarily Belated Celebration of the One Hundredth Anniversary of His Birth — The Four Pieces, Familiar and Unfamiliar, That Mr. Fiedler Chose from the Music of Schumann's Last Years — The Concerto for Violoncello for a Curiosity — The Rhenish Symphony for Schumann, the Symphonist — The "Manfried" and the "Genoveva" Overtures for the Romantic Schumann — A Desultory Word About His Songs and Piano Pieces — The Incidents of the Concert — Mr. Schroeder's Return

FOR once the first Symphony Concert of a new year brought its variations from routine. As many eyes traversed the familiar hall, the familiar orchestra and the familiar audience, yet with the pleasant sense of newness that return, each autumn, brings, they saw between the conductor's platform and the edge of the stage, a bust set in a little square of greenery. If, at a distance, it seemed to resemble the head of the young Augustus, it represented really the head of Robert Schumann. Perhaps the sculptor was not as sympathetic and penetrating as he should be, perhaps he lacked executive skill to work his cold material to his purpose; but, somehow, the bust seemed too austere—to lack the rhapsodic hair, the visionary eyes, the sentimental lips with which the prints of the forties and the fifties mark Schumann for the romanticist he was. The sculptor had represented the Schumann who could study diligently, even a little pedantically, not the Schumann who dreamed the dreams of romance and heard the fugitive voices of visions. The bust, however, sufficed as "signal," as the French say, the purpose of the concert. Schumann was born on June 8, 1810. On June 8, 1910, befell the centenary of his birth. Now only in London, the world over, are orchestral concerts customary in June, and elsewhere the conductors had either to celebrate the anniversary in the spring or defer their commemoration until the fall. Mr. Fiedler chose the autumn and the first concerts of a new season; made his programme wholly of Schumann's music; and picked the particular pieces wholly from the work of Schumann's last years; the overture to Byron's "Manfred" (1849); the Rhenish Symphony (1850); the concerto for violoncello (1850); and the overture to his opera "Genoveva" (1847). The two overtures were familiar by many repetitions; the Rhenish Symphony has been played less often at the Symphony Concerts; the concerto has not been heard here for fourteen years.

Before Schumann, however, came the processional ceremonies proper to the beginning of a new series of the concerts. One by one or in rambling groups, the men of the orchestra took their places. There were few new faces among them; but one —that of the new leader of the double-basses—is curiously like Mr. Puccini's. Then, quite by himself, came Mr. Schroeder, to resume after seven years of absence and vicissitude, his old place among the violoncellos—yet not quite the old since Mr. Warnke now divides with him the first desk of that choir. A public that for nearly twenty years has kept its admiration for him, applauded him warmly as he took his seat and renewed its plaudits still more warmly before and after his playing of the solo part in the concerto. Next, and quite by himself too, came Mr. Witek, the new concert-master, substantial of presence, quiet of manner, scholarly of face, and, though he is still in his thirties, with curling hair touched with gray. Polite applause suggested the good will and the expectancy of the public of the concerts toward him. So far as the afternoon disclosed him—and he was hampered by a chance hurt to one of his hands—he seemed an able and efficient concert-master, without the individuality of tone or the communicating fire of Mr. Hess at his best. Last came Mr. Fiedler himself, unchanged in presence from last spring, unless he is a shade the slimmer, and not a whit less eager and energetic of spirit. The audience received him heartily; recalled him at the end of the symphony; and throughout the concert was plentiful in applause. Schumann's music, even two continuous hours of it, gave the company pleasure. It had cause for pleasure, too, in the performance.

Not that the conductor's ways or the men's response to them have materially changed. Mr. Fiedler still loves the massive, full-throated orchestral tone; courts the incisive contrast, be it of pace, volume or instrumental color; cultivates large or minute insistence; is emphatic in all things; each according to its kind, and a little unwilling, in his zeal as an interpreter, to let the music flow for long unmoulded by the conductor's hand. Fortunately, Schumann's orchestral pieces require such moulding, and yesterday, as in the past with them, Mr. Fiedler was often skilful in lightening tonal thickness, clarifying dark places, lessening the monotonous impression of Schumann's frequent repetitions and occasional emptiness, and gaining some of the desired intensities almost in spite of the composer's clumsy or scanty use of his means. Schumann's music, moreover, is romantic, and by so much accords with some of Mr. Fiedler's fervors, antitheses and emphases. The conductor and his strings were alike happy in the romantic shiver—the very breath of sombre mediæval romance—that stirs in the beginning of the overture to "Genoveva." He and the whole orchestra were as imaginative in the shadowed and oppressed close of the overture to "Manfred." The first and insistent melody of the opening allegro of the Rhenish Symphony came and went in intense gusts. The close of the scherzo had exactly its idealizing quality for all the hearty gemuthlichkeit that had gone before. The swift transitions from the voices of external pomp to those of inner emotional response, were vivid in the so-called music of the cathedral. In all the symphony, indeed, except in the Andatino, where he was heavy and inflexible, Mr. Fiedler so adjusted his pace and moulded his phrases that Schumann's melodies brought their indubitable suggestion of the richly colored and intense musical expression of our own particular time. Wagner has deigned to imitate their accent; they have their tokens of an ardent instrumental coloring that, had Schumann only been articulate with his orchestra, would have matched our own. The concerto, outside the song of the slow movement, and a few incidental passages, like the grave beginning and the return of the mood of melancholy for an instant toward the close, is but tedious "passage-work" and dry music-making that seemed the dryer yesterday, because Mr. Schroeder's tone somehow lacked vitality, elasticity, body. It warmed, as the concerto warms, only in the fugitive but luminous beauty, as of some vision caught in brightness, of the slow song. As for the orchestra, the strings have produced a finer, steadier, more resilient tone; but the wood winds and the horns were good to hear; the trumpets struck fire in the symphony and the trombones of "the cathedral" were richly mellow. As the beginnings of the orchestra go, a beginning that was not nervously overdone.

Presumably the purpose of a commemorative programme is to set in array as many as possible of the qualities of the composer whose centenary it celebrates—the qualities that have kept his music living to a third generation and the defects, as well, that it has withstood. When, however, a symphony concert so seeks to commemorate Schumann, examples of some of his most characteristic and most nearly perfect work, must go by the board.

His songs, almost always songs of intimacy, of secret and fugitive sentiment, the inmost speech of the Schumann, who was born lover, as well as born poet and born composer, can have no fit place there. His piano pieces—the concerto aside—that with the songs filled the first decade of his productive life, are equally inadmissible. Yet in them are qualities that the orchestral pieces seldom or never attain. No musical form was ever quite so natural a medium of expression to the striving Schumann as every musical form was to the facile and almost instinctive Mendelssohn. Schumann, in his youth, was so far from musical composition that he actually collaborted in the making of a Latin lexicon, and he long believed that verse and words, and not music and tones, were his natural voice. He toiled terribly over Bach, over Beethoven, even over Mendelssohn before he ventured to write in the larger forms. Yet he never mastered them on their architectural side, or fully grasped their processes of development.

Of all the musical forms that he essayed—and he overlooked very few—that of his shorter and more fantastic piano pieces was easiest to him and most characteristic of him. His imagination was exquisitely sensitive. It was like a plate across which incessant visions chased, intimate, colorful, evasive, now of picture, now of whim, now of sentiment, now of pure fantasy. They were fugitive, almost furtive, visions of intensely subjective and sensitive moods. Very seldom did they spring from glorified realities. The whole body of his pianoforte music—the concerto again aside—might have been called "Carneval," as plausibly as he so named one piece of it—a kaleidoscopic carnival of these fleeting, variegated, highly personal visions. They were of poet's fancy and dream, and Schumann turned poet when he translated them into tones. To do so cost him no obvious labor; vision and expression are exquisitely fused; he achieved instinctively a lyric perfection.

Intimate songs and still more intimate pianoforte pieces—pieces that are all the translation of the fugitive subjective mood that Germans call stimmung—may not make the programmes of a pair of Symphony Concerts. No more at the beginning of a season may choral fragments of the alternately majestic and ethereal music of the "Scenes from Faust." "Manfred," with Schumann's music, fills a whole evening, and half of it is Byron's—and the reader's. There was, then, no choice outside the orchestral pieces, and among them Mr. Fiedler chose well. One could reasonably be a curiosity, and the concerto for violoncello was such. One could reasonably show the dry and the laboring Schumann, and the concerto, outside the slow movement and the incidental passages already noted, served this end to no unbearable length. Schumann had his vein of pedantry; the French reproach him with it in his harshness toward Berlioz; and the Wagnerians are sure of it when they recall his judgment of "Tannhäuser." He could be virtuously scholastic—and dull—even in some of the pianoforte pieces. He is all three in the wearisome stretches of the concerto—pedantic in his deference to the violoncello; scholastic in his orthodoxy of form and a kind of petty precision; and dull because he was toiling unimaginatively and unsympathetically. But Schumann was also the writer of pure song, be it for voice or for instruments—of song of clear and sustained melodic beauty, delicate, intimate, surcharged with sentiment, crystalline without hardness, melancholy oftener than passionate, the voice oftenest of tenderly or dolorously ecstatic mood. The slow section of the concerto for violoncello is such a song, and naught else preserves the piece even as a curiosity. And this song is more characteristic of the composer and of more immediately comprehensible qualities than the Andantino of the Rhenish Symphony.

First impulse hesitated for the instant upon Mr. Fiedler's choice. Recollection glowed over the elated warmth, the rushing ardor, the youthful glamour of the symphony of the spring or lingered quietly over the gentler and the more intimate beauty of the symphony that was the child of Schumann's first happy wedded years. Yet, in the actual hearing, the seletion of the Rhenish Symphony justified itself. The ardent, exhilarated, glowing, almost shouting, Schumann wrote the beginnings of the music of the Rhine, no less than the beginnings of the music of the spring. Through the first movement the richness, the passion, the breadth and the fire of his own melody possess him. He will not have done with it; he slurs form that he may return to it; he will not let it out of earshot for his joy of it; he would hear it always somewhere in his orchestra. Schumann loved his river; the beauty, the sweep, the power of it stirred him; and the mood and the stimulus stir again through the first movements of the Rhenish Symphony. It gushes like his river, with feeling and with melody. True, nothing in the Rhenish Symphony quite attains the poignant and the intimate beauty of parts of Schumann's hymeneal song, but moments in the Andantino approach it, and still more the moments in the "cathedral scene"—to borrow again a convenient designation—in which the composer seems to turn from the voices of the solemn ceremony to hear the gentler and the secret voices that the emotions of the hour are stirring in his own heart. Schumann could not long write objectively. When he does, he is prone to be rhetorical, as he is in this cathedral scene, even with his gravely Wagnerian brass. He must be subjective, and when he passes to the mood and the emotions within him, his music regains its more sensitive, characteristic and lyric beauty.

A symphony by Schumann, to be representative, must have his sudden lapses into melancholy, when he has been most jocund. Jocund he certainly is in the scherzo of this Rhenish Symphony; at the pace at which Mr. Fiedler took it, he is as gay as in some of the piano pieces; the rhythm is infectious; it sets to toe-tapping; his Rhenish folk and—what is much more important—his own spirit, make merry. Then at the end, as swiftly as a little cloud slips by the sun in its own golden track, the scherzo ends in a few measures of idealising melancholy. The representative symphony should have, too, its passage where Schumann repeats and repeats, doubles and redoubles, lets development and distribution go hang, in exuberance of intense mood, that in turn intensifies the melodies that are its expression. You shall hear, you shall feel, he seems to be saying. Of such is the rushing finale of the Rhenish Symphony and of such often is the first movement.

The music, moreover, is the mirror of Schumann, the symphonist in the narrower side of the word—with his characteristic excellences and his characteristic limitations. He was no master of instrumental coloring in the modern sense. Sometimes he was clumsy; sometimes inarticulate. He seems to be always thickening his tonal mass as though by doubling and tripling it, he could gain glowing power of tone. Yet in all this procedure, unskilful as it is and heavy, sometimes as are its results, is plain anticipation of our modern feeling for the richest of tonal splendor, and on occasion, in the first movement and the "cathedral scene," clear attainment of it. Schumann's instrumental strokes are few; and he may have little sense of the variously expressive qualities of the strings; but he feels the plaintive or the soothing voice of the wood-winds, searches out the loveliness of the horns and turns confidently to the mellow richness of the brass. His melodies, too, anticipate and achieve some of the characteristics that our time applauds. Out of his intensity of emotional life—Schumann might not have been poet and composer had he not loved passionately and died in the fear of madness—comes the intensity of melodic expression that is of our time and our emotions, too. He imagines his melodies largely; he clothes them richly. Sometimes, seemingly, he cannot develop them; for the developing, the form-spinning, the constructive imagination was not in Schumann. He gropes; he writes "imitative" passages wherein different groups of instruments carry and slightly vary his melody; or he repeats outright and unashamed. He does so sometimes by sheer intensity of preoccupation. His melody possesses him, mind and spirit; he can hear nothing else; write nothing else. Reiteration, each time, if possible, with new emphasis, shall make it to his hearers what it is to him. And he reiterates or else gropes for breath in the pauses between these strenuous blows.

The romantic Schumann, the Schumann who would sit for hours absorbed in his Byron, who drank in the fantastic tales of Hoffmann, who devoured Jean-Paul Richter, who could forget his intimate visions before the crowding phantasmagoria of streaming and sombre romance, wrought the overtures to "Manfred" and to "Genoveva." The shiver of the strings near the beginning of this prelude to Schumann's tedious, forgotten opera, still thrills the listening and the expectant imagination, as a sentence of Hoffmann or an image from Jean-Paul thrilled his. The trumpets of high romance blow through the overture. It laments with romantic intensity, it exults in romantic triumph. The stress, whatever the emotion, never abates. The passion and the expression of it seem in the good modern fashion to condition the form. There is no need to boggle over development. Schumann's Pegasus of romance pushes it away with his eager hoofs.

The overture to "Manfred" turns the other side of Schumann's romanticism. It is all high intensities still, as romanticism must be; but it is anguished music as though some ultra-modern had written it; and the strings are as resentful of its exactions after fifty years, as though it had newly come from Reger or Strauss. Romantic tumult alternates with romantic despair, even though Schumann must take refuge now and then in his emphasizing repetitions. He spares not his strokes of romantic surprise, like the three trumpets, and they come off. He turns his basses as black and ominous as night; makes the voice of his horns as solemn as Fate's. The music chafes and rebels with Manfred, wails and wears itself away. Astarte has a characterizing motive. Schumann is writing delineative music—delineative of romantic vision born of romantic tale—but as graphic and imagiaative as though he had finished it the day before yesterday, in the full tide of the "modern movement." His hundred years have gone lightly over his head. H. T. P.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

Establisl

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTON KETTLEDRUMMER IS A MOVING PICTURE.

Brooklyn's Concert Season Starting Early To-night—The Czar of Russia Remembers His Dancer —Some Orchestra Stars and Why the Hub Mourns Gilbert.

The last of the kettledrummers, who amassed a fortune of a quarter-million in New York and became for years a distinct figure in the public eye, the late Mr. Bernstein, seems to have a possible successor in another town. The Boston Transcript discovers the new man, and "Neumann" is his name:

"There is a new player of the kettledrums in the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Neumann, with an individuality, a style and a picturesqueness even, that are all his own. A small, slight, swarthy, bearded figure, he sits gnome-like above his big, potlike instruments, oblivious to all else but the conductor's beat and the engraved pages before him. The motions of his predecessors have been mere beatings, light or heavy, of their drums. Mr. Neumann's make arabesques, now intricate and wheedling of curve, now direct and peremptory of descending line. The arabesque suits the nature of the beat that the music exacts. It has individuality and style; it is the fruit of a conscious and unabashed artistry that cares not whether the audience sees and smiles, so long as it gains its end. The end on Saturday night was a vitality, vibrancy and variety of tone that has not always come from the kettledrums of the orchestra. Mr. Neumann is good to hear; interesting, a little amusing, to see. He is new to America. He has escaped our fear of 'being different.' May he escape it long."

[28]

SUNDAY HERALD,
OCTOBER 9, 1910

THE CONCERT SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its prospectus published last month stated that there would be comparatively few visiting virtuosos this season. The announcements in strictly musical periodicals confirm this statement. America is no longer looked upon by European pianists, violinists and concert singers as Tom Tiddler's ground, though operatic singers still reap prodigious harvests. The season of 1909-10 was a disappointment to many, especially in Boston and New York. The famous opera singers who sang in concerts drew large audiences, but not so large as in former years. The comparatively unknown, although their foreign triumphs were duly heralded, attracted little or no attention. Even the Kneisel Quartet sensibly announces only four concerts in Boston this season.

The prima-donnas will return, of course, although one or two of them are now singing to the injury of their reputation. Perhaps they are self-deceivers and think their powers are unimpaired; or they may be conscious of worn tones and pitiable scantiness of breath. They have long been rich, but they cannot endure the thought of missing the applause and the box office receipts. Yet they cannot be said to lag superfluous, as long as they gratify the curiosity of those that have not happened to hear them. The list of distinguished violinists and pianists who will visit Boston this season is short and not conspicuous.

The concert audiences in this city have changed not only in size, but in quality. It is no longer the fashion, the correct, indispensable thing for young women to go to concerts except to the public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra. Even Mr. Paderewski's great audiences are made up largely of dwellers in the suburbs, who also are in the great majority at the prima donna concerts. There is little curiosity among the class characterized by suave shopkeepers as "our best people" concerning newcomers who have won fame in Europe, and there is still less curiosity about new compositions over which in Europe there is hot discussion.

Yet the coming season will have certain attractive features. There should be interest in the series of concerts to be given by the Cecilia, with the Symphony Orchestra. The return of the Flonzaley Quartet will be welcomed by many. Mr. Fiedler promises to produce orchestral compositions that should be heard. Whatever may be said of his merits and failings as a conductor, he is catholic in his programs. Thus is he in marked contrast to Mr. Witek, the new concert master, who is reported as saying with a sniff: "There are some who like modern French music." Yes, Mr. Witek, there are many in Boston who like this music, even though it be unintelligible to the hidebound conservatives of Berlin.

From EVE. SUN
Address New York City.
Date

Anton Witek of Berlin, succeeding to the place left vacant by Willy Hess, is the only change of note in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz. He is 38 years old and for the last sixteen years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Boston's symphony season opens next week and the orchestra has been experiencing this fall, in common with our tourists abroad, the difficulty of securing passages to America. In the course of last summer, it engaged a number of musicians in Europe, including a double bass player, a viola player, a bassonist, a tympanist and a new trombone.

Some of these will not be able to get here until November, owing to the absolute impossibility of getting passage for them earlier in the fall.

From TIMES
Address New York City.
Date OCT 9 - 1910

Anton Witek, for sixteen years concert meister of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and now concert meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will become a member of the faculty of the Van Endert Violin School in New York. His wife, Vita Witek, who is a pianist, will also teach at the school. A competition for scholarships will be held on Nov. 11.

From EVE. GLOBE
Address New York City.
Date OCT 8 - 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been experiencing this fall the difficulty of securing passages to America from Europe. During the past summer it engaged a number of musicians in Europe, including a double bass player, a viola player, a bassoonist, a tympanist, and a new trombone. Some of these gentlemen will not be able to reach here until the early part of November owing to the absolute impossibility of getting passage for them earlier in the fall. The subscription sale for the ten New York concerts has been going on during the past week and surpasses all expectations, and the house will be practically sold out for both series of concerts before another week has passed.

From Daily Eagle,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 8 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been at work one week in its home city. Rehearsals started last Monday and on Wednesday night the orchestra gave a concert in Northampton, Mass., in honor of the inauguration of the new president of Smith College. On Friday afternoon and last night the first pair of concerts were given in Boston to the usual overflowing audiences. Boston seems to be as loyal as ever in the support of its orchestra and the coming season promises to be the most prosperous in the orchestra's history. It will be pleasing to the friends of the orchestra in Brooklyn to know that this first week has been sufficient to see that in Anton Witek, the new concert master, the orchestra has secured an artist of highest value, one well able to continue the traditions which were made by his distinguished predecessors.

From HERALD
Address New York City.
Date

During its twenty-fifth New York season the Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler, will give five evening and five afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, beginning on Thursday evening, November 10. The only change of importance in the personnel of the orchestra, which now numbers one hundred men, is the engagement of Mr. Anton Witek as concert master in place of Mr. Willy Hess. Mr. Witek, a Bohemian by birth, has been for the last sixteen years concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Miss Geraldine Farrar is to be the soloist at the first evening concert, and Mme. Melba at the first afternoon concert, November 12. Other soloists announced for these concerts are Messrs. Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman and Ferruccio Busoni.

Among the music to be heard Mr. Fiedler announces Mr. Rachmaninoff's E minor symphony, Mr. Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," Mons. d'Indy's "Istar," Mr. Henry Hadley's "The Culprit Fay" and Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles."

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

* * *

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the last day upon which the subscribers of last year to the five concerts in Philadelphia can renew their subscriptions with certainty of securing the seats occupied by them last season will be next Wednesday, October 12. After that time the books will be thrown open to new subscribers and it will be impossible to promise that any seats can be held for last year's subscribers. The five concerts as already announced will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, March 20, with the following artists as soloists, in order: Mme. Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be; Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Heinrich Warnke and Mme. Kirkby-Lunn.

* * *

From STANDARD UNION,
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date OCT 9 - 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been at work one week in its home city. Rehearsals started last Monday and on Wednesday night the orchestra gave a concert in Northampton, Mass. in honor of the inauguration of the new president of Smith College. On Friday afternoon and last night the first pair of concerts were given in Boston to the usual overflowing audiences. Boston seems to be as loyal as ever in the support of its orchestra and the coming season promises to be the most prosperous in the orchestra's history. It will be pleasing to the friends of the orchestra in Brooklyn to know that this first week has been sufficient to see that in Anton Witek, the new concert master, the orchestra has secured an artist of highest value, one well able to continue the traditions which were made by his distinguished predecessors.

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address New York City.
Date OCT 9 1910

Herr Anton Witek, Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, 16 Jahre hindurch Konzertmeister der Berliner Philharmonie, und seine Gattin, die Pianistin Frau Vita Witek, werden während ihres hiesigen Aufenthalts in der hiesigen bekannten Violinschule von Ende pädagogisch wirken. Ein Gönner der genannten Schule beabsichtigt, mehrere Stipendien zu begründen, um talentirten Schülern die Unterweisung des bedeutenden Künstlerpaares angedeihen zu lassen. Die diesbezügliche Konkurrenz soll am 11. November abgehalten werden.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date OCT 9 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been experiencing this fall the difficulty of obtaining passages to America from Europe at certain seasons. During the last summer it engaged a number of musicians in Europe, including a double bass player, a viola player, a bassoonist and a tympanist and a new trombone. Some of these men will not be able to get here until the early part of November, owing to the absolute impossibility of getting passage for them earlier in the fall. The subscription sale for the ten New York concerts, which has been going on during the last week, surpasses all expectations, and the house will be practically sold out for both series of concerts before another week has passed.

From TIMES
Address New York City.
Date OCT 9 - 1910

A BOSTON PLAYER.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I was surprised to notice in your article on the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Sunday the omission of the name of Louis Schmidt among the distinguished violinists who had been members of that orchestra.

Mr. Schmidt was not only a member during Mr. Henschel's and Mr. Gericke's conductorship, but he was soloist five times, playing the Beethoven concerto for the first time with the orchestra after it was organized.

Later Mr. Schmidt was concert meister for Theodore Thomas, and is now a member of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

I shall be obliged if you will print this correction. S. B. FIELD.

Oct. 5, 1910.

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address New York City.
Date OCT 9 1910

* * *

Die Subskription für die 10 New Yorker Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters hat, wie man uns mittheilt, selbst die rosigsten Erwartungen übertroffen. Es steht jetzt schon fest, daß alle zehn New Yorker Veranstaltungen schon vor ihrem Beginn thatsächlich ausverkauft sein werden.

Mehrere wichtige europäische Mitglieder des berühmten Orchesters werden in dieser Saison verspätet hier anlangen. Man hat gehofft, diese Künstler schon Anfang Oktober hier zu sehen, angesichts des sensationellen Zudranges zu den Dampfern war es jedoch nicht möglich, für die Herren entsprechende Passage zu erlangen, so daß sie hier kaum vor Anfang November eintreffen werden.

* * *

From SUN
Address New York City.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been experiencing this fall the difficulty of securing passages to America from Europe. During the past summer it engaged a number of musicians in Europe, including a double bass player, a viola player, a bassoonist, a tympanist and a new trombone. Some of these will not be able to get here until the early part of November owing to the absolute impossibility of getting passage for them earlier in the fall. The subscription sale for the ten New York concerts, which has been going on during the past week, surpasses all expectations, and the house will be practically sold out for both series of concerts before another week has passed.

[29]

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

LIST FOR SYMPHONY WILL BE CLOSED

Renewals for Boston Orchestra Must Be Filed by October 12.

Announcement was made today that renewal of subscriptions for the Boston Symphony Concerts this season will not be accepted after Wednesday, October 12.

Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, manager for the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony, said today that there are a few subscribers for last season's concerts who had not signified their intention of renewing their subscriptions for this year. Inasmuch as the list of applicants for seats at the concerts this year is extremely large, it has been decided to give them an opportunity to purchase season tickets after October 12.

After that date the privilege extended to last year's subscribers will be withdrawn, and on Tuesday morning, October 18, the unsubscribed seats will be placed on sale at Droop's Music Store, Thirteenth and G streets.

From

Address

Date OCT 9 - 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been at work already a week in its home city. Rehearsals started last Monday and on Wednesday night the orchestra gave a concert in Northampton, Mass., in honor of the inauguration of the new president of Smith College. On Friday afternoon and last night the first pair of concerts were given in Boston to the usual overflowing audiences. Boston seems to be as loyal as ever in the support of its orchestra and the coming season promises to be the most prosperous in the orchestra's history.

It will be pleasing to the friends of the orchestra in Brooklyn to know that this first week has been sufficient to see that in Anton Witek, the new concert-master, the orchestra has secured an artist of high value, one well able to continue the traditions which were made by his distinguished predecessors.

From AMERICAN

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Thursday, October 13, is the last day on which subscribers of last year's Boston Symphony concerts may renew their subscriptions for the coming year with a certainty of securing their old seats. The dates of the concerts are November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22 in the Lyric Theater, and the soloists in their order of coming will be Madame Melba, Josef Hofman, Mischa Elman, Madame Rider-Kelsey and a quartet in Beethoven's ninth symphony, and Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra.

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York City.

Date

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirtieth season in Boston's Symphony Hall with a somewhat belated commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann, who entered this life June 8, 1810. Familiar pieces made the programme, which was devoted entirely to Schumann's works—the "Manfred" overture, the "Rhenish" symphony, the 'cello concerto, and the "Genoveva" overture. The 'cellist was Alwin Schroeder.

The second concert of the orchestra, which occurs this week, will introduce to Boston the E minor symphony of Rachmaninoff. After this novelty such well-worn pieces as Goldmark's violin concerto and the overtures to Weber's "Oberon" will be played to complete the programme. Francis MacMillan will be the violin soloist.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, OCTOBER 10, 1910.

Schumann Program in Mr. Fiedler's Best Manner

-Symphony season opens with a style of interpretation that has won its place in Boston.

PUT into a single memory picture all the music you have ever heard Max Fiedler conduct, and observe what you find there.

Notice the things that stand in large outline and those that stand in small.

Study his subject matter, his method of treating it.

Search for his art purpose and say in what direction he is causing the musical current of the city to flow; or if that current moves inevitably in a direction of its own, tell where it is taking him and us.

Shape another picture to compare with this one, calling on your recollection of Dr. Muck's concerts for your material.

Let the second picture be made up, say, of Beethoven's fifth symphony, Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute," the Tschaikowsky piano concerto in which you heard Mme. Samaroff play, and the Domestic symphony of Strauss.

Your Fiedler memories will hasten to arrange themselves into the semblance of an old Italian picture that has a principal figure in the foreground with supporting figures, and with a background which answers certain formal requirements of beauty and yet does not enter into the artist's main idea.

That figure at the front of the picture, the figure to which all else is subordinate, which gains emphasis from the presence of the groups to its left and its right and from distant landscape and architecture, will symbolize in your imagination the modern symphony.

Your recollection of the Dr. Muck performances will be a Corot.

And what is the principal thing in the picture?

The tree in the foreground, of course; no, the dimly silhouetted figure beneath it; perhaps so, but those far off village towers around the turn of the river seem to make the essential appeal.

But you cannot place it.

First you fix on the Domestic symphony, then you point to Beethoven's Fifth or to the Tschaikowsky concerto and lastly you say it can as well be the little overture as any of the other things.

Mr. Fiedler's conducting of his first concert of the season on Saturday evening is of a piece with your general impression of his manner.

There were small works at the unimportant extremes of the program, a symphony before the intermission, a concerto after it; and the symphony occupied the place where, as things are ordered at the concerts, a piece of music makes itself most felt, since it gets the comment of the social 10 minutes.

The performance was quite a marvel for the way the conductor brought out all the strong points of Schumann's work and slighted its weak points.

A masterful reading of the first movement, the time moderated to give the composer's melody, which is the chief inspiration of this part of the work, a fair chance to make its effect; the second subject, according to Mr. Fiedler's unique conception of a larger rhythm, contrasted with the first in the repetitions by an elusive accent of expression, color and tempo; the whole thing done to let Schumann, the musician, outshine Schumann, the writer of orchestral scores.

A tactful conductor, we say, but not one to hide music of base grain under varnish. That gratuitous fourth movement could not take care of itself by any device of conducting that Mr. Fiedler thought it fair to use; so it sounded its hollow five minutes and made way for some concluding play of the larger rhythm in the fifth.

As to Symphony soloists. Some day a soloist will come along who will put himself entirely in the hands of Mr. Fiedler, one who will tell the conductor to make the music his own, as if audiences knew nothing about A strings or double stopping and had no interest in technical marvels.

Then we shall hear an interesting performance of a concerto.

We shall, if it is a concerto in which the composer has wrought the sounds and not merely the themes of solo instrument and orchestra into something organic, unified, blended. Until such soloist comes, bringing such a concerto under his arm, we shall have the scholarly execution from the front of the platform and the judiciously tempered outbursts and murmurings of tone from the back that we had in the Schumann concerto for violoncello, as Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Fiedler performed it Saturday evening.

But there was a moment in the middle division when it was to the conductor's and everybody's liking. Mr. Schroeder's pride in his technique could not have been less because he gave his listeners greater pleasure here than in the first division or the third.

And the new concertmaster; did the tone of his instrument at any time during the concert stand out beyond the other first violins—ever so little?

No, never so little at any moment.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE FIRST EVENING SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Incidents of Saturday Night and the Shortcomings of the Orchestra—Mahler and Kreisler in Vignette—Criticising the Critics—The New Drummer at Symphony Hall—Mme. Sembrich's Novel Programme—The Haendel and Haydn Society Chooses Its Pieces—Mr. Caruso in Germany and Grove—Mr. Strube's Music Published at Last—Mr. Stock's Enigma of Conductors' Conferences

EVIDENTLY the processional entrance, around the corner on the left, as the audience looks at the stage in Symphony Hall, along the edge of the platform and then inward to the designated seat, is becoming a formula with the leaders of the choirs of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hess set the precedent last year, Mr. Schroeder repeated it Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and Mr. Witek fell as naturally into it as though it were the way of orchestras the world over. Of course Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Witek were applauded; and there might have been applause for Mr. Longy or Mr. Kloepfel for the opposite reason. The one leads the oboes, the other the trumpets, and each, is a virtuoso of the first rank, but they still somehow found their seats without a pilgrimage around the edge of the platform. Mr. Fiedler, who has his right to such distinction from the rest, was heartily applauded when he came to his place and whenever there was pause in the progress of the concert. He found, too, the usual greenery and autumn flowers upon his stand, and at the end of the evening, he had the satisfaction of the voluble Dr. Friedländer's praises. No; the learned professor had hardly believed what he had heard of the orchestra from Strauss, from Paderewski, from Dr. Muck in Berlin. Now he had heard the band with his own ears. With much vehement gesture, he averred that it was unsurpassable, especially in its "klang."

Certainly to its accustomed public the orchestra did not surpass itself in "klang" or in any other of its attributes on Saturday night. It is doubtful even that it played as well as it did on Friday afternoon. Then, and again on Saturday evening, the wood-winds, the horns and the brass far excelled in quality of tone, in euphony and in precision their brethren of the strings. Mr. Witek indeed gave new proof of his ability as a concert-master. His bowing, for example, was beautifully flexible to the music of the instant and his tone began to have individual character. He could not, however, save the strings from the roughness, the lack of euphony, the blurred and blurring tone that seemed to beset them. It was big enough as so much mass, and it was certainly resonant but it had scarcely any other of its usual distinctions. The men have still to play themselves into form or they are losing their keen sense of it, and especially of euphony, perhaps from too much driving to bigness. They—and indeed the conductor and the whole orchestra spread out the tonal tumults of the "Manfred" overture as so much excited and strenuous blur. And they were not good to hear in the Andantino of the Rhenish Symphony. It is long-breathed song, not short-breathed phrases.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST, OCTOBER 13, 1910

GILIBERT, THE BARITONE, DIES

(Copyright by Aime Dupont.)
CHARLES GILIBERT,
Noted French opera baritone, who died suddenly in New York.

Charles Gilibert, 48, the widely known French opera baritone, who was billed to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city and Cambridge next week, died suddenly Tuesday night at the Hotel Gregorian in New York.

The news of Mr. Gilibert's death did not become public until yesterday, however, although his wife, who is in Paris, was notified by cable.

ABSCESS PROVES FATAL

Mr. Gilibert suffered from an abscess in the ear, and though he was suffering when he arrived from Paris Saturday, his illness did not develop dangerously until Tuesday, when he became unconscious and remained so until the end.

Mlle. Marianne Flahaut, the well known contralto and a life long friend of Mr. Gilibert, was with him when he died.

Mr. Gilibert came to this country on this occasion to sing during the coming season with the Metropolitan opera company after four seasons with the Manhattan company. He was to have sung one of the parts in Puccini's new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West."

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Kate Wilson Greene, who manages the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, desires to make the announcement that there are still a few subscribers to last season's concerts who have yet to signify whether it is their intention to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and thus have the privilege of retaining the seats they had last year. As the list of prospective subscribers is very large, it will be impossible to hold the seats that have not been resubscribed longer than Wednesday, October 12. On that date, the privilege extended to last year's subscribers will be withdrawn and the seats unscribed for will be placed on sale at Droop's Music Store, Thirteenth and G streets, on Tuesday morning, October 18.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

n

ress

e

tab

Boston Symphony Concerts

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra desires to announce that subscribers of last year's series will have until next Saturday, Oct. 15, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats held by them last year. The general sale to new subscribers will open on Monday, the 17th, at M. Steinert & Sons Co., 327 Westminster street and such as have not renewed their subscriptions by Saturday will have no guarantee that their seats will not be disposed of to new applicants.

As already announced five concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, January 3; Feb. 14 and April 4. The soloists to be announced at this time are Josef Hofmann, pianist, Mischa Elman, violinist, and Yolando Mero, pianist. At the first and last concert there will be eminent singers.

[30]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Address .....

Date ..... OCT 9 - 1910

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony Subscribers to Have Until Saturday to Renew.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra desires to announce that subscribers of last year's series will have until next Saturday, Oct. 15 in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats held by their last year. The general sale to new subscribers will open on Monday, the 17th, at M. Steinert & Sons Company, 327 Westminster street, and such as have not renewed their subscriptions by Saturday will have no guarantee that their seats will not be disposed of to new applicants.

As already announced, five concerts will be given on Tuesday evening, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14 and April 4. The soloists to be announced at this time are Josef Hofman, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist, and Yolando Mero, pianist. At the first and last concerts there will be eminent singers.

Estab ... 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that subscribers of last year's Providence series will have until next Saturday, Oct. 15, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats held by them last year. The general sale to new subscribers will open on Monday, Oct. 17, at M. Steinert & Sons' Company, 327 Westminster street. Those who have not renewed their subscriptions by Saturday will have no guarantee that their seats will not be disposed of to new applicants. As already announced, five concerts will be given, on Tuesday evening, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14 and April 4. The soloists already announced are Josef Hofman, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist, and Yolando Mero, pianist.

* * *

Estab ...

From PRESS

Address PHILADEL...

Date .....

* * *

The dates announced for the Kneisel Quartet concerts at Witherspoon Hall are: Monday evenings at 8.15, October 24, November 28, March 6, April 10, May 1. Tickets are now obtainable at 1117 Chestnut Street. The quartet first came into existence in November, 1885, because of the desire of Mr. Henry L. Higginson that chamber-music be brought into more prominent notice. The artists at present composing the quartet are Franz Kneisel, first violin; Julius Roentgen, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Willem Willeke, violoncello. Mr. Kneisel is a Roumanian, a graduate of the Vienna Conservatory, and was for eighteen years concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Svecenski was for years the first viola of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Roentgen is a pupil of Joachim and Mr. Willeke was solo 'cellist at the Royal and Imperial Opera of Vienna until 1907.

Estal ... 1884

From EVE. TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date .....

of about thirty weeks.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirtieth season in Boston yesterday afternoon with a programme devoted entirely to Schumann in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of his birth. A total of 117 concerts are to be given, these including the two pension fund concerts and the three choral concerts, which are the result of the new alliance between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the famous Cecilia Society of that city.. The Philadelphia concerts will be given on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert in November the soloist will be Mme. Nellie Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this year, either in concert or opera, this will be.

ork, 1884

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date .....

...delphia, October 17.

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirtieth season in Boston this week, and will open its series of five concerts in this city, at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, November 7, the succeeding dates being December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. Madame Melba will be the soloist at the first concert, others to appear, in the order named, being Josef Hofman, Mischa Elman, Heinrich Warnke and Mme. Kirby-Lunn.

Es ... 1884

From PRESS

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date OCT 9 - 1910

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begs to announce that the last day upon which the subscribers of last year to the five concerts in Philadelphia can renew their subscriptions with a certainty of securing the seats occupied by them last season will be next Wednesday, October 12. After that time the books will be thrown open to new subscribers and it will be impossible to promise that any seats can be held for last year's subscribers. The five concerts as already announced will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, March 20, with the following artists as soloists, in order: Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be; Josef Hofman, Mischa Elman, Heinrich Warnke and Madame Kirky-Lunn. All communications should be addressed to Miss H. Harris, 1119 Chestnut Street.

Estal ... 1884

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begs to announce that the last day upon which the subscribers of last year to the five concerts in Philadelphia can renew their subscriptions with a certainty of securing the seats occupied by them last season will be next Wednesday, October 12. After that time the books will be thrown open to new subscribers and it will be impossible to promise that any seats can be held for last year's subscribers. The five concerts, as already announced, will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, March 20, with the following artists as soloists, in order: Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be: Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Heinrich Warnke and Madame Kirkby-Lunn. All communications should be addressed to Miss H. Harris, 1119 Chestnut street.

Es ... 1884

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date .....

MUSIC NOTES

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the last day upon which subscribers of last year to the five concerts in Philadelphia can renew subscriptions with a certainty of securing seats occupied last season will be next Wednesday. After that time the books will be thrown open to new subscribers. The concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, March 20, with the following artists as soloists, in order: Madame Melba, Josef Hofman, Mischa Elman, Heinrich Warkne and Madame Kirby-Lunn. All communications should be addressed to Miss H. Harris, No. 1119 Chestnut street.

Es ... k, 1884

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date .....

...isella and "The Lake of the Swan."

Bright For Boston Symphony.

Thursday will be the final day on which subscribers of last year's Boston Symphony concerts may renew their subscriptions for the coming year with a certainty of securing their old seats. Mr. Albaugh, who has charge of the subscription sale in Baltimore, reports that a great majority of last years' subscribers have already renewed their places and advises all who have not but intend doing so to communicate with him at once.

The number of applications from new subscribers is large and there will be very few seats left for single concerts. The dates of the concerts are November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22. The performances will be held at the Lyric Theatre. The soloists in their order of coming will be Madame Melba, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Madame Rider-Kelsey and a quartet in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the orch...

I ... ork, 1884

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEATS GOING FAST

October 13 Is Last Day On Which Subscribers May Be Assured Of Getting Old Places.

October 13 is the last day on which subscribers of last year's Boston Symphony concerts may renew their subscriptions for the coming year with a certainty of getting their old seats.

The dates of the concerts are November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22, in the Lyric Theater, and the soloists in their order of coming will be Mme. Melba, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Mme. Rider-Kelsey and a quartet in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the Orchestra.

Esta ... 1884

[31]

From .....

Address .....

Date OCT 12

MISCHA ELMAN

Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Est ... 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

ANTON WITEK

Concert-master and soloist, with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...ork, 1884

From EVE. NEWS.

Address Newark, N. J.

Date .....

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, while nominally the possession of "The Hub," has made so many annual excursions into the field of music in New York that "Welcome to our city" is always the greeting its members receive. It gives in New York this season its customary two series of five concerts each on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons.

The Thursday evening concerts begin November 10 and continue on December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23. The Saturday afternoon series opens on November 12, the following dates are December 10, January 14, February 25 and March 25. The assisting artists are Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mme. Melba (her only concert appearance in New York), Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Busoni and the violinist, Anton Witek, whose first appearance in New York it will be.

Establish ...

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date OCT 8 - 1910

Artists for Boston Symphony.

The local management of the Lyric announce as soloists for the Boston Symphony concerts in the coming season such artists as Melba, Josef Hofman, Mischa Elman, Rider-Kelsey and a quartet in Beethoven's ninth symphony, and Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. The concerts will be held on November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22. Subscribers for last year's concerts have until next Thursday to renew their subscriptions for their former seats.

E ... ork, 1884

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE UNTIMELY DEATH OF MR. GILIBERT

His Two-Fold Eminence as a Singer of Songs in Concert Rooms and as a Singing-Actor in the Opera House—The Pure Artistry That Was the Man—A Few of Its Rare Qualities—Rachmaninoff's New Symphony—A Hint of the Music That Will Be Played at the Symphony Concerts This Week—An Orthodox Piece with a Distinctive Scherzo—The Possibility of a "Cycle" of Wagner's "Ring" Operas Next Spring in Boston—Other News of the Day

THE untimely and the wholly unexpected death of Mr. Gilibert—still in his earlier forties and in the very prime and ripeness of his powers—takes from the theatres and the concert rooms of America, France, England and Belgium, a singer and an actor who was pure artistry itself. Mr. Gilibert had not a remarkable voice; it was almost less than an ordinary voice, as voices go in the sensuous appeal of musical sound, in brilliancy of timbre, in pliancy of mere vocal execution. His figure was ponderous; his face in spite of eyes that twinkled with intelligence and wit, was heavy; his movements were those of a man weighty with flesh. Yet, when he sang songs in the concert-room, there came no thought of his vocal limitations, and when he appeared as a singing actor in the opera house, the physical obstacles in his way melted before the illusion that he achieved. The impression in the one was of finer qualities than mere voice, however sensuously delightful, can by itself compass, and in the other of a faculty of operatic characterization that substituted the personage of the music-drama for the singing-actor who had fashioned it.

Mr. Gilibert had insight and imagination of a Gallic acuteness and fineness, and of more than Gallic breadth. He saw the end of a song from the beginning and adroitly adjusted his interpretation of it. He grasped its substance, felt its spirit as a whole, as the expression of a mood, the revelation of a character or a trait, the suggestion of an episode, or the light play, for their own sake, of lyrical or humorous fantasy. Into this larger conception he fitted with ingenuity, felicity and imagination, pointing, shading, illuminating details that gave almost to each phrase its musical value and its poetic or emotional significance, yet never halted the flow of the song, nor clouded the seeming spontaneity of the singer with conscious elaboration. For the communication and the expression of these things he had a diction that was all clarity, suppleness and adroitness, and as delicate and sure a skill in the coloring of his tones with the precise shading of a mood, suggestion of a trait or implication of a momentary feeling that he sought. In all his Gallic finesse he never forgot Gallic charm or Gallic regard for artistry that shall be a pleasure in itself. He had, beside, and rather more than most French singers, l'esprit Gaulois—as Taine called it—the spirit that cannot forbear when such a mood is in place, its light playfulness, its fine mockeries. Of playful or satiricial song, especially of the naive humors and the sportive sentiment of folk song, Mr. Gilibert was a master.

To the operatic stage Mr. Gilibert brought the art which is singularly and gloriously of our particular time—the characterizing art of the singing-actor, trained, assimilative, individualizing, controlling. Always he was impersonating a character, who happened to be clothed with the rich and expressive speech of music. The voice that he would have his audiences hear was not the voice of Charles Gilibert, but of the Father in "Louise," of the monk who was the abbey cook in "Le Jongleur," of the gay old Sergeant in "The Daughter of the Regiment." As in a song he would have his tones disclose every shading of verse and music and their implications, so in opera, he would have them disclose every shading in the character, every obvious or implied suggestion, as music, text and action brought it. He composed his impersonations with the same insight and imagination, the same felicity and ingenuity of illumination, the same sense of them in mass and detail, the same thoughtful artistry that hid itself as he composed his singing of songs. The Father in "Louise," as he characterized him, was a Parisian workingman as well as the particular personage of Charpentier's music-drama. He lived less than he acted, and his music seemed but the accident of his speech. His Boniface in "Le Jongleur" was as the milk of human kindness, the honey of human sympathy; yet this Boniface had his masculine humors and his monastic ways. As for Sergeant Sulpice, outside Coquelin's Flambeau in "L'Aiglon," there was not a Napoleonic veteran on the stage to match it in homely humor, loyalty and goodness of heart.

As a whole, the symphony is notable for its ready acceptance of conventional symphonic form, and the traditional manner of working out its themes. Even the practise of quotation or "cross-reference" of themes or episodes from other movements is not carried to greater lengths than either Brahms or Tschaikowsky have done. But within these conventional limits, Rachmaninoff has shown no little creative vitality, especially in the original and brilliant scherzo, and his workmanship is steadily resourceful and fluent. It is undeniable that the native charm of much of this music is greatly increased by the remarkable skill and sonority of its orchestration. E. B. H.

given to violoncellos and basses is answered by sombre chords for wood wind and horns, while a tentative figure steals in through the first violins to the seconds. The bass phrase is modified, and subjected again to the same procedure. A new figure, tending upwards, is worked out with logical insistence to a climax at which the tentative first violin figure is announced with some insistence, then subsides gradually until the main body of the movement allegro moderato is reached. This portion of the movement is noticeable for its simple conformity to tradition. The opening theme is a simple modification of the opening violin figure. After a lucid transition, the second theme appears in the normal key, divided between woodwind and strings. The "exposition" section is terminated with a normal repeat. The "development" section, in which the composer usually exhibits the resources of theme-transformation, and contrast of mood is on the whole unusually simple and direct. It is easy to follow the modifications, rhythmical and harmonic, to which Rachmaninoff has subjected his themes. For the most part he uses as material the principal theme of the movement with occasional reference to the "violin phrase" of the introduction. Towards the end of this section, he employs greater freedom of modulation, and the "recapitulation" section begins with a climax in which the principal theme is announced with more emphasis. The transition to the second theme is concluded with more of a climax than in the "exposition," but the "second theme" itself is treated in much the same manner. The conclusion or "coda" is rather long and elaborate, but does not, as is so often the case with Brahms, involve the use of new material. This movement on the whole, is a striking example of submission to convention, and of willingness to gain its effects through legitimate treatment of simple and direct material.

The second movement, Allegro molto, is a brilliant scherzo of far less conventional type. First and second violins, with oboes, begin an incisive accompaniment figure, while four solo horns give out a vigorous theme. The strings answer with a phrase, in which an upward leap of a seventh is prominent, a figure of which much is made. There is free modulation, both themes appear in different keys, leading to a new section with a broad melody given out by strings. After this the first portion is repeated. There is an episode in canonic style, in which the figure with a leap of a seventh appears in notes of smaller value (diminution). The entire first section, including the episode with a broad melody in the strings, is repeated, and the movement ends pianissimo. This movement is conspicuous for its inimitable vivacity, striking use of orchestral resources (especially the glockenspiel) and its intrinsic musical originality.

The third movement "Adagio" is naturally of a lyric cast, and at the same time is more conventional in its musical treatment It opens with an expressive phrase for the strings, to which the clarinet answers with a melodic episode. The strings return to their theme, with more ornamentation; the secondary phrase is also repeated. Then comes an episode constructed on the "violin figure" from the introduction to the first movement. This is continued at some length, including a subordinate passage developed also from the episode, and leading to a climax. The opening theme of the adagio returns, followed by the clarinet solo, the whole repeated with more florid accompaniment and fuller orchestral emphasis. After this the movement comes to a close with a retrospective reference to the "introduction phrase." The most salient characteristics of this movement are its melodic grace and straightforward simplicity of construction.

The finale begins with a reference to the "canonic episode" of the scherzo in triple time, leading directly to a brilliant and forceful theme. There is a cheerful subsidiary scored chiefly for wood-wind and strings, leading to a repetition of the first theme. This in turn leads to a broad second theme given out by all the strings (except double-basses) with accompaniment of wood-wind and horns. A portion of this theme suggests the theme of the adagio in notes of double the length (augmentation). There is an episode from the adagio, built up from the introduction phrase. The first theme returns with some skilful canonic workmanship (in augmentation and diminution). The "cheerful subsidiary" returns, this time chiefly in the brass leading to a repetition of the broader second theme. There is a brilliant ending in which the first and second theme appear in contrapuntal opposition.

These were major parts. Upon secondary and minor characters to which Mr. Gilibert was often assigned since he "strengthened" the cast, he bestowed as sedulous and fruitful pains. Figures in the older Italian operas that in the hands of the ordinary singing players to whom they usually fell, had been the mere dull routine of a moment, became under his creating and animating imagination and execution, vivid personages in the drama. Probably Verdi himself had no idea of such an image of dignified and mournful endurance of injustice as he made out of old Monterone in "Rigoletto," or of such a kindly and humorous old wordling as he wrought out of the nameless doctor in "Traviata." From Masetto in "Don Giovanni," all show peasant humors and dull peasant comprehension, Mr. Gilibert could pass with equal illusion to the shrewd alertness of the Dancairo in "Carmen," to the gay foolery of Schaunard in "La Bohéme" to the dissolute humors and tranquil philosophy of the Roman of "Messalina." His imagination sounded all his characters; his re-creating spirit gave them life; his voice endowed them with characterizing speech; his controlling artistry ordered all to illusion. H. T. P.

Rachmaninoff's New Symphony

DURING his recent visit to this country, Rachmaninoff chose two works as being the most representative of his creative personality in the orchestral field. One was the symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead," op. 29, after the picture by Arnold Boecklin; the other his second symphony in E minor, op. 27. Both were the product of his more mature activity in Dresden, but here all resemblance virtually ceases. In "The Isle of the Dead," Rachmaninoff showed himself a genuine modern, in spite of his conservative tendencies, in that he treated his subject in the free symphonic poem form; in that his music was unwontedly graphic and subjective in its essence. On hearing this work one's imagination involuntarily constructed a tragedy to which the music supplied a vivid and effective background. Its force and its sombre poetry were all the more remarkable in that Rachmaninoff had as a rule clung so deferentially to classic form and general content.

The E minor symphony, on the contrary, seems a direct antithesis to the dramatic symphonic poem, a reversion to his normal manner, in which he is content to conform to the letter and spirit of tradition. The first performance of this work was by the Russian Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 14, 1909; other performances were those of Nov. 26 and 27 at Philadelphia in the same year, under the composer, and later at Chicago. In view of the first performances here at the coming Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, a brief analysis of its characteristics may be not unwelcome.

Unlike "The Isle of the Dead" which demanded an orchestra of "modern" fulness, this symphony is content with the normal forces with the simple exception of the glockenspiel. The symphony begins with an introduction "Largo"; a stately phrase

THE BOSTON GLOBE—OCTOBER 15, 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Rachmaninoff's Work Given For First Time Here.

McMillen's Initial Appearance in These Programs in a Concerto.

At the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon Rachmaninoff's symphony No. 2 in E minor was played for the first time in Boston. Francis McMillen, the American violinist, appeared at these concerts for the first time. His number was Goldmark's concerto, op 28. Weber's "Oberon" overture filled out the program.

Mr Rachmaninoff's symphony was played at Carnegie hall, New York, Thursday evening, Jan 14, 1909, by the Russian symphony orchestra, Modest Altschuler conductor, for the first time in America. It was also played by the Philadelphia orchestra Nov 26 and 27 of the same year.

The new symphony is vital, deeply impressive and at times tremendously puissant. It is big, not with the thoughts, the ideas or the learning of men, but with the spell of the infinite. Within the hour of its duration, moments are to be found which betray artifice, labor and even tedium, but they are, indeed, brief.

Through it flows a wondrous and enkindling vitality which does not always express itself in mere vigor, in enlivening clangor, in sensuous appeal or by any merely extrinsic means.

In this work the composer has let his fancy lead him upon excursions into lighter conceits. In the insistent beat of the tripping rhythm in the opening bars of the second movement and in the leaping melody to which they lead, he is airily nonchalant. Later in the same movement the sudden entrance of the soft chant of the stately brass bears a playful mockery. But this is not transparent or trivial lightness.

An undercurrent of mystery endures. Rachmaninoff is ever the introspectionist. It is said he would be bizarre in this substituted second movement for the scherzo. He is so, not by drawing a garish procession of bumpkins, but by keeping repressed more the spirit of abandon than he permits himself to reveal.

His style of conducting was the symbol of the idiom—if so stenciled a word is fit—of his writing. He charged the orchestra with a species of unobtrusive dynamics and it sang, accented, interpreted; but more was withheld, or better still, more was suggested, to the auditor than was openly given.

Mr Rachmaninoff, it is true, has not fashioned themes of only Russian pattern, whatever that may be, and labeled them accordingly. When the work was produced in New York he was gently rebuked for this by some. He can curve a melodic line with deftness, suavity and grace and clothe it with a color and warmth which again and again suggest Puccini—why should he limit his musical geography to the bleak steppes of his native country?

In the Goldmark concerto Mr McMillen exhibited a well-poised tone of pure and sympathetic quality in the cantilena passages. He played the technical portions with accuracy, fleetness and spirit.

THE BOSTON HERALD, OCTOBER 15, 1910.

NEW ORCHESTRAL WORK IS HEARD

First Performance Given in Boston of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony.

IMPORTANT WORK, BUT LONG

Francis Macmillen, Violinist, Plays Goldmark's Concerto.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted, and Francis Macmillen, violinist, played for the first time at these concerts. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 2.....Rachmaninoff
Concerto for violin.....Goldmark
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphony is about two years old. The first performance in the United States was at Philadelphia in November of last year, when the composer conducted. The performance yesterday was the first in Boston.

The symphony is a long one. The performance lasts a few minutes over an hour. There are some who believe that extreme length in the case of an orchestral composition is a grave fault. This depends largely on what the composer has to say and how he says it. There are short pieces that are jejune and boresome.

Mr. Rachmaninoff has a good deal to say, and as a rule he says it well. The first two movements are the best in thought and in expression. The introduction to the opening allegro not only contains a motive that may be called the leading thought of the symphony; it also arouses anticipation, excites curiosity, and is not merely as a preliminary flourish, like that of the virtuoso testing an instrument before he plays. The allegro is thematically rich. The song themes are of long breath, and they are beautiful in themselves without reference to accompaniment or orchestral dress. The first theme is singularly beautiful with its touch of melancholy that is northern rather than sensuously southern. The contrasting motives are interesting and effective. Here is absolute music that is full of suggestion that moves many, each in a different way according to his individuality; here is music that is above and beyond a fixed program to be musically illustrated; it is music that leads each hearer to dream his own dream, to find encouragement or consolation, and takes him away from the everyday world.

The second movement is fresh, original, without being deliberately capricious, without taint of bizarre affectation. The horn theme with the continuation by the violins is inspiriting and irresistible and the more tuneful section has a peculiar charm. The combination of dance and fugal passages that follows is in strong contrast, and the desire to show contrapuntal dexterity does not interfere with the purely musical flow and rush. In other words the composer is not disclosed as saying: "I have written to please the public; now I will show the pedantic what I can do." The scherzo is well-rounded and homogeneous.

The Adagio is the least successful of the movements. The themes though pleasing have not marked distinction. Sentiment is dangerously near sentimentalism. The music is as spun-out sugar. The composer is so in love with his themes that he cannot bear to let them go. And in this movement the length is detrimental.

The finale with its jubilant first theme, its march-like episode, its lyrical motive and its sonorous apotheosis with the combination of themes that have been heard in preceding movements is well contrived to arouse applause, but it does not rise to the high level of the first movement and the scherzo.

The workmanship displayed is masterly. The first movement reveals Mr. Rachmaninoff as a symphonic composer of indisputable power. The arrangement of thought is logical; the expression is lucid; the ornamentation is tasteful and in keeping with the general architecture. Here as in the Scherzo and in the finale, the composer thinks clearly and writes not as one experimenting but surely and with a master's confidence. The instrumentation is sonorous and well-contrasted. It is never muddy; it is never thin; it is never too evidently fantastical. The composer is often happy in his contrasts and blends of timbres. His fine sense of color is shown in his alternations of tonal effects, in the exquisite detail in transitional passage, where there is continuity of orchestral thought though there are shifting nuances.

All in all, this symphony is an important work. Mr. Fiedler conducted con amore and with refreshing elasticity. The orchestra was euphonious and brilliant. The audience applauded with a spirit unusual at a public rehearsal when a long and serious composition is performed for the first time.

Mr. Macmillen was also warmly welcomed. He has indisputable talent. His tone in lyric passages is full and of fine quality; it is emotional, and his technic is fluent in florid passages. His faults are those of youth and they may be easily overcome. Playing melodic phrases, he too often slurs and sobs in order to emphasize expression. Playing brilliant passage work, his tone is sometimes dry and colorless. In his endeavor to play "with great expression" he sometimes forces tone until it is coarse and raw. As I have said, he is young and he is leading the life of a virtuoso. He has time before him in which to gain serenity and poise.

The program of the concerts next week will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for strings; Beethoven's symphony No. 2; Scriabin's symphonic poem, "The Poem of Ecstacy," and "Finlandia," by Sibelius. The sudden and lamented death of Charles Gilibert necessitated a change in the program [illegible] announced.

[32]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER OCTOBER 15, 1910

SYMPHONY DEALING WITH RHYTHMIC EFFECTS

RACHMANINOFF WORK COMMENDABLY CLEAR

Francis Macmillen, Soloist, Impresses Favorably, Showing Improved Technique.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Rachmaninoff. Symphony in E minor.
Goldmark. Violin Concerto in A minor.
Soloist, Francis Macmillen.
Weber. "Oberon" overture.

It was pleasant to find Rachmaninoff receding from the modern formlessness and creating a symphony that, while strongly emotional, did not utterly leave the time-honored sonata-form. Rachmaninoff is treading along the Tschaikowsky path instead of following the ultra-Russians. In St. Petersburg they held Tschaikowsky not Russian enough, they regarded him as too cosmopolitan. Such an accusation is never a reproach. Beethoven was cosmopolitan in music, and did not succeed with local color, or folk-song effects. Goethe declined to make his poetry merely German and never wrote a national hymn. Local color and national music has its charm, but it may be pushed too far, and the best music appeals to different nations with almost equal effect.

The Rachmaninoff symphony is modern enough in its scoring and demands a very large orchestra. It is a symphony which deals rather with moods and rhythmic effects than with clear-cut melodies. It has the usual modern transference of figures and themes from movement to movement, the finale especially bringing forth reminiscences of the preceding movements. It is big with Fate even from the very first, when there are "lamentations heard i' the air," and everything from big shudders to tiny shivers passes in review. Kettle-drum crashes and crescendoes burst forth most frequently, and these were excellently played.

The movement which might be called the scherzo, although not at all playful, had some poetic idealization of dance rhythms, and subsequently a bitter and aggressive vague, such as Browning describes in "Master Hugues of Saxe-Gotha." The strongly rhythmic effects were not unattractive and the performance of this, and of the entire work, was commendably clear, but one could not find the surety of a Brahms, a Bruckner or a Tschaikowsky in the turgid measures.

The adagio seemed to us the noblest movement of the work. It is given to but few men to develop an adagio to a true climax, but Rachmaninoff has here displayed nobility of thought from beginning to end. At times it suggested a Russian "Waldesweben" (there are wolves in the woods in Russia) and the mighty sweeps and grand crescendoes were given in a manner truly magnificent.

In the finale Rachmaninoff takes to pianissimo mysteries as a duck takes to water. The composer, however, seems sure of what he is aiming at in this part, and he makes his reminiscences drawn from the earlier parts of the symphony, speak with telling power. It is rather a long symphony for a work at such high pressure, but it is greater than some of the long symphonic works that recent seasons have inflicted us with, even if the power of the greatest moderns is not attained. It is a work that will be heard again and one that will probably hold its place in the modern repertoire. It was warmly applauded after each movement and recalls took place at its end. We believe that it may grow in power on a second hearing.

Francis Macmillen must have spent a certain part of his life in being photographed. There is no prominent artist who bubbles up so constantly in the musical press in various interesting poses. He is seen upon mountain peaks and in caverns, upon arid plains and amid tropical verdure; he is pictured walking, rowing, hunting, fishing and even engaged in musical occupation. He must, however, have done some practising in the intervals of posing, for his technique and his expression have advanced.

We do not greatly admire Goldmark's violin concerto. The beginning is as heroic as if a bardic theme were to be sung, but the mountain only brings forth a mouse. It promises war and ends with confectionery. There was over-much embellishment in the first movement, fioritura which displayed the soloist much better than the composer. Mr. Macmillen mastered the great difficulties here with commendable steadiness, although one could have borne with more breadth. The slow movement he gave with romantic beauty, and in this kind of sensuous melody Goldmark is on his native heath and appears at his best. Mr. Macmillen worked up to a fine technical climax in the finale. The cadenza was rather long, but its double-stopping and its G-string work was broad and full, and after the cadenza (an unusual place for display in a concerto) there came a very effective ending in which the soloist also bore part.

We begin to think the whole violin cadenza business a rather empty school, but it always serves to excite the public, and Mr. Macmillen was recalled again and again with what (for a Friday matinee) may be called popular frenzy.

Weber's "Oberon" overture is as theatrical and as full of vivid contrasts as any work in the repertoire. If it smells a trifle of the footlights, that is no very great defect. The horn-calls that picture Sir Huon summoning the fairies to his aid, were not very boldly sounded. They punctuate the introduction and the themes in a manner which is distinctly Weberish, for that composer loved the natural horn above all other instruments.

Next to the horn he enjoyed the clarinette, and this is evidenced in the beautiful subordinate theme of this overture, which is given to this instrument. Weber and Mendelssohn might almost be called discoverers in the domain of clarinette colors, for they used that instrument in a manner that Beethoven, the orchestral innovator, had never dreamed of. The crash at the end of the introduction was given with all that emphasis which Mr. Fiedler is master of. No explosion of Richard Strauss could have been greater.

The dainty little march of the fairies, in the introduction, the muted violin passages in the same part, the grandeur of the development, the triumph of the coda, all these were finely read, and the overture was the most flawless part of the excellent concert.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sudden death of Charles Gilibert, the French baritone, who was to have been soloist with the Symphony orchestra at its third rehearsal and concert on Friday afternoon, Oct. 21 and Saturday evening, Oct. 22, respectively, has compelled Mr. Fiedler to make a radical change in his programme. There will be no soloist. The first number will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for string orchestra. Then will come Beethoven's Second Symphony.

The third number will be a novelty—the symphonic poem, "Le Poeme de l'extase," by Alexander Scriabine, who is the leader of the neo-Russian school.

The death of Gilibert also compelled changes in the first Cambridge Symphony programme that was to be played in Sanders theatre. In his place as soloist will appear in Cambridge, for the first time with the Symphony orchestra, Miss Edith Thompson, the talented pianist, of Boston. The revised programme is: Schumann's "Manfred" overture and "Rhenish" symphony, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Sibelius' "En Saga," and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL

OCTOBER 15 1910.

SYMPHONY

HIGH HONORS FOR YOUNG VIOLINIST ON HIS BIRTHDAY

Francis Macmillen Gives Much Pleasure to Audience as Soloist.

Francis Macmillen, the violinist from Marietta on the Ohio, yesterday celebrated nis 25th birthday by appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He thus received as a sort of birthday present the highest honor of his professional career, an honor which he shares with such memorable artists as Ysaye, Kreisler and his own teacher, Cesar Thomson. Both teacher and pupil, by the way, chose to offer here the Goldmark concerto in A minor. The concerto is not often given here. It is reported that Mr. Macmillen not long ago played it for the venerable composer himself, who is now living in Vienna, and that Goldmark spoke of the young American's interpretation as original and attractive."

Yesterday the performance was moderately impressive. Mr. Macmillen succeeded in bringing out the romantic qualities of the work. But he did not play without evident strain, as if somehow he felt that he could give still more freedom to style and sentiment.

However, something must be allowed for the almost inevitable nervousness attending these performances. It at least may be said that this youngest of the American violinists who have achieved fame abroad has rare talent and that yesterday he gave a great deal of pleasure to one of the most critical audiences in the world.

This was not Mr. Macmillen's first appearance here. He gave recitals in this city three years ago, when The Journal reviewer said that he was in the bud. He is not in full bloom yet.

The novelty on the program—the first novelty of the new feature of the season—was Rachmaninoff's second symphony, which was played in Philadelphia last year during the composer's visit to this country.

The symphony is regarded by Rachmaninoff as one of his best works. It takes rank with "The Island of the Dead." It is suggestive at times both of "La Boheme" and of "Tristan und Isolde." Running through it are solo passages which yesterday were played with an artistry that, on the whole, furnished the greatest pleasure of the occasion. Moreover, the symphony was most sympathetically read by Mr. Fiedler. When it was over the audience waxed enthusiastic.

NEW FALL GOWNS MAKE APPEARANCE AT THE SYMPHONY

Many Prominent Men Among Audience at Rehearsal Yesterday.

There were interesting features in connection with yesterday's attendance at the Symphony rehearsal and one was the new fall gowns of society women. Another was the presence of many prominent men, among them George Bruce Cortelyou, Gustav Frohman, George W. Perkins, J. W. Haensal, Charles G. Dawes, Mr. Macmillen, brother of the cornet soloist, all from New York; George W. Proctor and many Back Bay club men. There were also a few brides, notably Mrs. Arthur Blake (Leslie Knowles), looking girlish in a soft clinging gown of black and drooping hat nearly concealing her features, and Mrs. Barrett Wendell, Jr. (Barbara Higginson), in a dark blue tailored suit.

Seen in the crush also were Mrs. George C. Brooks and daughter, Mrs. Charles J. Rich with Mrs. F. Stackpole, Mrs. George Silsbee and sister Mrs. Lewis, Mrs. John C. Phillips, who came up from "Moraine Farm" on the North Shore, Helen Allen Hunt, stunning in blue with rich embroidery, Mrs. Eugene N. Foss, Juliet Higginson, Rosamond Fay, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Long, Laura Simmons, Mrs. Maud Huntington Benjamin, Mme. E. F. Bates, Emma Wethern, Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. B. F. Pitman, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Mildred Bond, Mrs. Max Zach, Mrs. William W. Vaughan, Mrs. Horace P. Jealous, Mrs. W. W. Fay, Mrs. Edgar Pierce, Mrs. Edward Brandegee, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. Robert Stow Bradley, Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, Mrs. B. F. Keith with Mattie Batcheider, Harriet Hardy, Mabel A. Bennett, Ida Vose, Mrs. Guy Lowell, Mrs. Francis Stanley, Mrs. John Reece, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. Fred Carpenter, Mrs. Anna D. West, Mrs. F. L. W. Richardson and Mrs. Arthur A. Carey.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1910

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

The Next Programmes of the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Macmillan's Recital—Mme. Sembrich's Return—Other Signs of the Beginning of the Season—Miss Farrar's Coming

THURSDAY, Oct. 20, in Sanders Theatre, at Harvard, the first of the annual series of concerts in Cambridge by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Fiedler conducting and Miss Edith Thompson as the assisting pianist. From Schumann, the programme takes the overture to Byron's "Manfred" and the Rhenish Symphony of the first pair of concerts in Boston; from Sibelius, it takes the tone-poem, "A Saga," and from Weber, the overture to his opera "Oberon." With the orchestra, Miss Thompson will play Franck's imaginative and unfamiliar Symphonic Variations.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 21, in Symphony Hall, the third concert of the afternoon series by the Symphony Orchestra, for the first time this season unassisted. The programme traverses the third of Bach's "Brandenburg" concertos for strings; Beethoven's second symphony (in D-major); a rhapsodic piece, "Poem of Ecstasy," by the Parisianized Russian, Scriabine, and the stern and forthright tone-poem of Sibelius, "Finland." Scriabine's music, though he once visited New York, is little known in America, and the "Poem of Ecstasy" is quite new to Boston. It is rhapsodic of form and mood, and it riots in all the resources of an ultra-modern orchestra. Out of this orchestral toil springs what Scriabine would have the song of a "freed soul."

Saturday evening, Oct. 22, in Symphony Hall, the third concert of the evening series by the Symphony Orchestra, with the programme just noted.

Monday afternoon, Oct. 24, in Chickering Hall, a recital by Francis Macmillen, the violinist, who reappeared yesterday at the Symphony Concerts. Then the clear suavity, the light brilliance, the rhythmic sparkle and the pleasant zest of his tone commended him. He plays with sentimental and executive charm and in a world of middle-aged virtuosi, his youth gives pleasure. His programme comprises: a concerto by Ernst; Bach's Chaconne: a Minuet from Mozart; a Mazurka from Zarzycki; "Meditations" by Glazounoff; a Pastoral by Massenet; Saint-Saëns's "Rondo Capriccioso," and Paganini's Fantasia on airs from Rossini's "Muses."

Friday afternoon, Oct. 28, in Symphony Hall, the fourth concert of the afternoon series by the Symphony Orchestra, with Brahms's first symphony in C minor and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in E minor, to divide the programme into the vivid contrasts of two acknowledged masterpieces of widely removed composers.

Saturday evening, Oct. 29, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the evening series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, with the programme just noted.

Monday afternoon, Oct. 31, in Symphony Hall, the annual song recital of Mme. Sembrich and the annual proof of her continuing and finely discriminating artistry. Songs—many of them unfamiliar—by Schubert, Schumann and Brahms, will make her entire programme.

Tuesday evening, Nov. 1, in Chickering Hall, a concert of sonatas for pianoforte and violin, with Carolyn Beebe for the pianist and Edward Dethier, a distinguished pupil of César Thomson, for the violinist.

Thursday afternoon, Nov. 3, in Jordan Hall, a recital of songs by Morton Adkins, a newly discovered baritone.

Friday afternoon, Nov. 4, in Symphony Hall, the fifth concert of the afternoon series by the Symphony Orchestra, with Miss Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House for the assisting singer. She will sing two little-known pieces: an air out of Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin," an opéra-comique of 1814; and a concert piece by Mozart that dates from 1783.

Saturday evening, Nov. 5, in Symphony Hall, the fifth concert of the evening series by the Symphony Orchestra, with Miss Farrar assisting in the "numbers" just noted.

HERALD, BOSTON, OCTOBER 16, 1910.

SYMPHONY'S THIRD CONCERTS.

The sudden death of Mr. Charles Gilibert, the French baritone, who was to be soloist with the Symphony orchestra at its third rehearsal and concert on Friday afternoon, Oct. 21, and Saturday evening, Oct. 22, respectively, has compelled Mr. Fiedler to make a radical change in his program. There will be no soloist. The first number will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for string orchestra. Then will come Beethoven's Second Symphony. The third number will be a novelty—the symphonic poem, "Le Poeme de l'Extase," by Alexander Scriabin. Scriabin, no one of whose works has been played at a Symphony concert, is at the opposite pole from Rachmaninoff; the latter leans strongly to classical forms, but Scriabin is a rhapsodist in the modern sense of the word. "Le Poeme de l'Extase" is a musical setting to his own poem, which describes the ecstasy of a freed soul. Scriabin demands the full modern orchestra, including the celesta and organ. The final number will be Sibelius' "Finlandia."

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CHANGE

The death of Mr. Gilibert compelled changes in the first Cambridge Symphony program to be played in Sanders Theatre Oct. 20. In his place as soloist will appear in Cambridge for the first time with the Boston Symphony orchestra Miss Edith Thompson, pianist. The revised program is as follows: Schumann's "Manfred," overture; Cesar Franck's symphonic variations for pianoforte and orchestra; Sibelius' "En Saga" and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE-OCTOBER 16, 1910.

Scriabine For the First time at the Symphonies.

The sudden death of Mr Charles Gilibert, the French baritone, who was to have been soloist with the Symphony orchestra, this week, has compelled Mr Fiedler to make a radical change in his program. There will be no soloist. The first number will be Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra. Then will come Beethoven's second symphony.

The third number will be a novelty, the symphonic poem, "Le Poeme de l'Extase," by Alexander Scriabine, who is the leader of the neo-Russian school. Scriabine, none of whose works have been presented at the Symphony concert, is at the opposite pole from Rachmaninoff, for while the latter leans strongly to classical forms, Scriabine is a rhapsodist in the modern sense of the word, both in method and matter.

The work is a musical setting to a Russian poem which has to do with the ecstasy of a freed soul. Scriabine demands the full paraphernalia of a modern orchestra including even the celesta and organ. The final number will be Sibelius' "Finlandia."

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

The sudden death of Mr Gilibert, the French baritone, has necessitated a change in the program for the first concert at Sanders theatre by the Boston symphony orchestra next Thursday evening, and the arrangement is as follows: Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Cesar Franck's symphonic variations for piano and orchestra, the symphonic poem, "Eu Saga," by Sibelius, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Miss Edith Thompson will be the soloist.

RECORD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1910

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sudden death of Charles Gilibert, the French baritone, who was to have been soloist with the Symphony orchestra at its third rehearsal and concert on Friday afternoon, Oct. 21 and Saturday evening, Oct. 22, respectively, has compelled Mr. Fiedler to make a radical change in his programme. There will be no soloist. The first number will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for string orchestra. Then will come Beethoven's Second Symphony.

The third number will be a novelty—the symphonic poem, "Le Poeme de l'extase," by Alexander Scriabine, who is the leader of the neo-Russian school.

The death of Gilibert also compelled changes in the first Cambridge Symphony programme that was to be played in Sanders theatre. In his place as soloist will appear in Cambridge, for the first time with the Symphony orchestra, Miss Edith Thompson, the talented pianist, of Boston. The revised programme is: Schumann's "Manfred" overture and "Rhenish" symphony, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Sibelius' "En Saga," and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

HE WON RENOWN

The sudden death of Charles Gilibert, the eminent baritone, last Thursday, is not only a great loss to the Symphony audiences of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but to America and Europe. Mr. Gilibert was a French artist in the best sense of that word. As a young man he received his musical education at the Paris Conservatoire. After he had gained many prizes there, he became a member of the Opera Comique Company. There is hardly a better school for artistic finish, and there Gilibert became thoroughly imbued with the traditions of his art. He was not gifted with a voice of great volume or quality, but there was hardly a role or a song which he undertook without clothing it with distinction and inimitable artistry. After leaving the Opera Comique, Gilibert became a member of the Monnaie at Brussels. He sang at Covent Garden. He came to America 10 years ago with Maurice Grau, then director of the Metropolitan company. In 1903 he visited Boston on a concert tour with Melba. He is well known to the public of this city by his appearances at Symphony concerts and other concerts of like nature, and as the admirable interpreter of such roles as that of the Father in Charpentier's "Louise," or of Monterone in "Rigoletto," or in lighter vein of Sergeant Sulpice in "The Daughter of the Regiment," or Boniface in "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame." The present generation of music lovers will forget neither the man, his singing, nor his smile. There is the memory of an evening performance at Symphony Hall, not many seasons since, when the audience remained in their seats through most of the intermission, to applaud the big fellow who had awakened them to the highest pitch of enthusiam. He was big, and his movements were heavy, but no one thought of this as he sang, for no artist in recent years has possessed to a greater degree his finesse, his finest feeling for musical values. When he was in good condition, and he was in good condition most of the time, his technic in music within his metier was almost impeccable, his diction clear and clean-cut as a diamond, and the point and humor, or the poetry and the subtle suggestion, or dramatic force of his interpretations indescribable. Certain of his impersonations will always linger in the memory—the Father in "Louise," Crespel and Spalanzani in "Les Contes d'Hoffmann." He was a singing actor of the highest rank. His impersonations were invariably thought out to the minutest detail, but they were also rich with insight and imagination. And he died in the fulness of his powers.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Mr. Gilibert's sudden death has necessitated a change in the Symphony programme this week. Therefore, Mr. Fiedler will commence the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with Bach's 3d Brandenburg concerto for strings. Beethoven's second symphony will follow. There will be no soloists. The third piece on the programme will be a novelty, Scriabine's "Poeme de l'Extase." This work was played by the Russian Symphony Society in New York, Dec. 19, 1908. Scriabine stands with Rachmaninoff, as head of the so-called "neo-Russian" school. His tendencies, however, are directly opposed to those of Rachmaninoff, for while the latter clings closely to classic forms, as seen in the symphony heard last night, Scriabine is a modern rhapsodist in method and manner. The "Poeme de l'Extase" is a musical commentary upon a Russian poem which has to do with the ecstacy of a freed soul. The score is very full, demanding a complete modern orchestra. The final item of the programme will be Sibelius' "Finlandia," the patriotic piece which, it is said, is forbidden performance in Finland, but which, when played at a Symphony concert two seasons ago, proved as capable of stirring an American audience, for Sibelius speaks of the things which belong to humanity, not only to his native land.

BOSTON JOURNAL

OCTOBER 16, 1910.

NO SOLOIST FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sudden death of Charles Gilibert, the French barytone, who was to be soloist with the Smphony Orchestra this week, has compelled Mr. Fiedler to make a change in his program. There will be no soloist. The first number will be Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra. Then will come Beethoven's second symphony. The third number will be a novelty—the symphonic poem, "Le poeme de l'extase," by Alexander Scriabina, who is the leader of the neo-Russian school. The final number on the program will be Sibelius' "Finlandia," which had such popular success two years ago.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The death of Gilibert compelled changes in the first Cambridge Symphony program to be played in Sanders Theater. In his place as soloist will appear in Cambridge for the first time with the Symphony Orchestra Edith Thompson, the Boston pianist. The revised program is as follows: Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Caesar Franck's symphonic variations for pianoforte and orchestra, Sibelius' "En Saga" and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Mrs. Witek

"JUST LIKE PLAYING IN BERLIN," SAYS SYMPHONY HEAD

Anton Witek Feels Right at Home with the Larger Boston Opera.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

ANTON WITEK, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an imposing figure of a man. He is so impressive that he received the interviewer in a room furnished only with a kitchen chair without losing any of his effectiveness.

He is of good height and a trifle, mind you, only a trifle—if you called him stout you would be wrong—a wee bit upholstered. His hair grows long and thick, a growth only possible in German musicians and not at all like the unkempt shocks of Amertcan football players. His black mustache is an artistic triumph and his black-rimmed pincez-nez lends him atmosphere.

And yet there was no getting away from the fact that the drawing room was furnished with one kitchen chair. The bareness of the surroundings didn't bother Mr. Witek a bit. He explained laboriously that he spoke very little English, but he would be pleased to tell me what he could.

Furniture Hasn't Come.

At this juncture the folding doors parted and there appeared a rosy-faced, jolly little lady with a halo of white hair and a smile that was contagious. She was Mrs. Witek, a bride of four months and, under her maiden name of Vita Gerhardt, a noted German pianist. Mr. Witek beamed at her, but Mrs. Witek went right to the plint.

"Have you explained to the gentleman that our furniture hasn't come?"

"No, but I was about to do so," said the concert master meekly.

"Then I shall explain," said Mrs. Witek. "Our household goods are still on the way from Germany. My husband has packed them carefully in great boxes and given them to an express company which declared they would be in America before us. But we are here in the apartment we have rented, and our furniture is I do not know where."

"Every day they say it will come, and it does not come," said Mr. Witek. "Two of my violins are still on the way. It is most annoying."

Brought All With Them.

"When we left Germany he would bring everything with him. I told him it was not necessary, but he said, 'Once in my life I move from Germany to Amertca. I must take everything.' And now we have nothing."

"They must be here soon," said Mr. Witek and dismissed the subject with a wave of the hand.

Mrs. Witek laughed cheerfully and departed.

"My wife was Vita Gerhardt. We were married the 31st of May," said the violinist. "For sixteen years we have played together in my trio. My wife is an excellent pianist and she is known all over Germany as a soloist. We shall give concerts together here in Boston, I think, when we get settled."

Mrs. Witek sent a porter in with some more chairs, so we made ourselves comfortable.

"You come from the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Do the methods of the Boston Symphony differ greatly from what you have been accustomed?"

"Not at all. It seems like a German orchestra. As soon as I took my seat I felt right at home. It was just as if I were playing in Berlin."

Larger Symphony Here.

"And yet there are differences. The Boston orchestra is larger than the Berlin. It is larger and yet it does not play louder. At my seat I cannot distinguish the different parts, they blend most beautifully together. At home I could hear the clarinets, the oboes, the brasses and the double basses. The tone of the Boston orchestra is more round, more full. It is more noble than the Berlin orchestra, but not so loud. Perhaps it is that the Boston men do not try to play so loud. A smaller orchestra must play louder to get the same effect as a big one.

"At any rate it is a most magnificent band. At the first rehearsal I was surprised to hear the men play as well as if they had been together right along, and yet it had been nearly six months since they last met. They played a Schumann program at the first concert and it was marvelous that they did it so beautifully, because Schumann is not like Wagner, you must read between his notes, you must study to find out what he meant.

The Berlin Orchestra is a splendid one, yet it takes two or three concerts before the members play perfectly together.

"I do not think your audiences are so demonstrative as the German audiences. After a symphony at home the conductor must bow many, many times in response to applause or we think we have not done well, we have failed. But here there is not so much clapping. There are so many ladies in the audience, and with their kid gloves they can not make so much noise, perhaps that is why your audiences are more quiet. The most surprising feature of the Boston concert is the great proportion of ladies in attendance. In Berlin we have many ladies, of course, but also large numbers of men. And then we have the students, the long haired youths with velvet jackets, and beards, who are so demonstrative. They tell me that you have many music students in your audiences, but they are as conventional in appearance as the rest and I cannot tell them apart."

DEATH OF GILIBERT CHANGES PROGRAM

Symphony Concert Plans Rearranged After the Sudden Demise of Baritone.

The sudden death of Charles Gilbert, the French baritone, compelled a radical change in the program of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gilibert was to have been soloist at this concert, and was to have sung the aria "Ombra Mai Fu," from Handel's forgotten opera of "Xerxes." An orchestral transcription of this aria is known as Handel's "Largo," and is known wherever there is music. The aria has not been sung at a Symphony concert in Boston since 1883. The second number was to have been Caesar Franck's "Le Processional," and it would have been the first performance in Boston with the orchestra.

Death has changed all this. It has been decided to have no substitute for Gilibert. Instead, the strings will be heard in the third Brandenburg concerto by Bach. Then will come Beethoven's second symphony.

The third number will be a novelty—the symphonic poem, "Le Poem de l'Extase," by Alexander Scriabine, who is the leader of the neo-Russian school. Scriabine, none of whose works has ever been given at a Boston concert, is the opposite pole from Rachmaninoff; for, while the latter leans strongly to classical forms, Scriabine is a rhapsodist in the modern sense of the word, both in method and matter. The "Poem de l'Extase" is a musical setting to a Russian poem which has to do with the bliss of a freed soul. Scriabine demands the full resources of a modern orchestra, including even the celesta and organ. The final number on the program will be Sibelius' "Finlandia," which had such a popular success two years ago. The death of Gilibert also compels the rearrangement of the program for the Sanders Theatre concert at Harvard next Thursday evening.

ANTON WITEK

PIANIST WHO GETS SYMPHONY PLACE AT SHORT NOTICE

MISS EDITH THOMPSON

TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY AT 6 DAYS' NOTICE

Miss Edith Thompson of Boston will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, in Saunder's Theatre, Thursday evening.

This announcement was made just six days before the concert and only half an hour after Miss Thompson was informed that she had been selected to play with the Symphony.

Only the world's most renowned artists are privileged to play with the Symphony Orchestra as soloists, and it would have been years before she received this honor had not chance come to her assistance.

Gilibert, the famous French baritone, was announced as the soloist at the first Harvard concert of the Symphony Orchestra, but Gilibert died suddenly last Wednesday. The great baritone was also to have sung at the Symphony Hall concerts of the orchestra this week. On Thursday, Director Fielder and Manager Ellis decided to have no soloist for the Boston concert, but it was necessary to secure somebody for the Cambridge concert, as the Saunder's Theatre audiences are fond of soloists.

An appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is worth very much in the way of prestige to any performer, and it brings abundance of engaements. But no performer would dare to appear with this orchestra without long and careful preparation, and it looked as though it would be difficult to secure an artits. At this juncture Mr. Ellis thought of Miss Thompson, who has given many recitals here, and is pianist of the Smalley Trio, an artiste who has won praise wherever she appeared. He called her up. Would she be willing to appear with the Symphony Orchestra?

As soon as she caught her breath she said she would. Then she asked: "When?"

"In six days."

"That's short notice, but I'll be ready," said the pianist.

Since then she has been practicing Caesar Franck's Symphonic Variations for the pianoforte and orchestra. This is a composition that has broken the heart of more than one ambitious pianist, but when achieved it most effective and beautiful.

When the plucky young pianist appeared at her first rehearsal with the orchestra, the gallant musicians applauded, and they applauded more when she had concluded.

The Harvard students and their friends will undoubtedly emulate their example, especially if they know the circumstances under which Miss Thompson is playing.

She is a pupil of Helen Hopekirk and is only twenty-three years of age. Her selection as soloist has delighted the Boston musical colony.

[34]

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN: OCTOBER 16, 1910.

OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

TOPICS OF TIMELY INTEREST.

OPENING OF THE SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Memorial Program for the Schumann Centenary.

Boston has not been entirely satisfied to have the Symphony orchestra's first concert for the season given not in the city but at Smith college, and some rather peevish things have been said. It should be considered that it is not every year that an important college inaugurates a new president and a new auditorium at the same time. Of the first Saturday night concert of the orchestra the Transcript's critic says with some severity:—

Evidently the processional entrance, around the corner on the left, as the audience looks at the stage in Symphony hall, along the edge of the platform and then inward to the designated seat, is becoming a formula with the leaders of the choirs of the Symphony orchestra. Mr Hess set the precedent last year, Mr Schroeder repeated it Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and Mr Witek fell as naturally into it as though it were the way of orchestras the world over. Of course Mr Schroeder and Mr Witek were applauded, and there might have been applause for Mr Longy or Mr Kloepfel for the opposite reason. The one leads the oboes, the other the trumpets, and each is a virtuoso of the first rank, but they still somehow found their seats without a pilgrimage around the edge of the platform. Mr Fiedler, who has his right to such distinction from the rest, was heartily applauded when he came to his place and whenever there was pause in the progress of the concert. He found, too, the usual greenery and autumn flowers upon his stand, and at the end of the evening, he had the satisfaction of the voluble Dr Friedlander's praises. No; the learned professor had hardly believed what he had heard of the orchestra from Strauss, from Paderewski, from Dr Muck in Berlin. Now he had heard the band with his own ears. With much vehement gesture, he averred that it was unsurpassable, especially in its "klang."

Certainly to its accustomed public the orchestra did not surpass itself in "klang" or in any other of its attributes on Saturday night. It is doubtful even that it played as well as it did on Friday afternoon. Then, and again on Saturday evening, the woodwinds, the horns and the brass far excelled in quality of tone, in euphony and in precision their brethren of the strings. Mr Witek indeed gave new proof of his ability as a concert-master. His bowing, for example, was beautifully flexible to the music of the instant, and his tone began to have individual character. He could not, however, save the strings from the roughness, the lack of euphony, the blurred and blurring tone that seemed to beset them. It was big enough as so much mass, and it was certainly resonant, but it had scarcely any other of its usual distinctions. The men have still to play themselves into form or they are losing their keen sense of it, and especially of euphony, perhaps from too much driving to bigness. They—and indeed the conductor and the whole orchestra spread out the tonal tumults of the "Manfred" overture as so much excited and strenuous blur. And they were not good to hear in the Andantino of the Rhenish symphony. It is long-breathed song, not short-breathed phrases.

The program was in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Schumann, and was made up of his music, the soloist, Alwin Schroeder, playing the 'cello concerto, a difficult work which only a first-rate performer can make effective, though the cantilene of the andante is lovely. Philip Hale in the Herald questions whether S[illegible]mann's music is well fitted for such festi[illegible]asions:—

It [illegible]n urged against him that his symphonies were thought for the pianoforte and then orchestrated crudely, as by an amateur. This, however, is not the fatal objection. He had his own orchestral speech. G[illegible]d or indifferent, it was his own. He co[illegible] not have otherwise expressed himself thr[illegible]gh the orchestral instruments. His speech is to be accepted or rejected, as the hearer is impressed chiefly by ideas or by the manner of expression.

A more serious objection is this: The genius of Schumann was purely lyrical, although occasionally there is the impressive expression of a wild or melancholy mood, as in the chords of unearthly beauty soon after the beginning of the overture to "Manfred." Whether the music be symphonic, chamber, a pianoforte piece or a song, the beauty, the expressive force lies in the lyric passages. When Schumann endeavored to build a musical monument, to quote Vincent d'Indy's phrase, he failed, for he had not architectonic imagination or skill.

His themes in symphonies, charming as they often are, give one the impression of fragments, of music heard in sleep chasings. Never a master of contrapuntal technic, he repeated these phrases over and over again instead of broadly developing them, and his filling in is generally amateurish and perfunctory. There is one marked exception, the heavenly theme in the adagio of the second symphony, and this movement is marred by the impertinent entrance of schoolboy counterpoint in the middle section.

The best of Schumann's music is an expression of states and conditions of soul. This music is never spectacular; it is never objective. Take, for instance, his music to Goethe's "Faust." The episodes that attracted the attention of Berlioz, Liszt, Gounod, were not to Schumann a source of inspiration. It was the mysticism in the poem that led him to musical interpretation. His music, whether for voice or instruments, is, first of all, "innig," and this German word is not easily translated into English. Heartfelt, deep, ardent, fervent, intimate; no one of these words conveys exactly the idea contained in "innig." There is the intimacy of personal and shy confession.

Schumann in his life was a reticent man. He dreamed dreams. He was lost in thought when others, in the beerhouse or at home, were chattering about art. He put into his music what he would with difficulty have said aloud to his Clara. As a critic, he was bold in praise and blame. As a composer he was not often assertive as one on a platform. He told his dreams, he wove his romantic fabrics, for a few sympathetic souls. It is true that in his days of wooing he was orchestrally jubilant, as in the first movement of the symphony in B flat; but in this movement the anticipation aroused by the first measures is not realized. The thoughts soared above the control of the thinker; there was not mastery over them that allows no waste material, that gives golden expression without alloy.

At his best this composer was an improvisator, and the only one to be compared with him in this respect is Chopin, who had the finer taste and the more artistic grasp. The genius of Schumann is revealed in songs and pianoforte pieces; in the lyric passages found here and there in the symphonies, especially in the symphony in D minor and in the sustained song of the movement in the second symphony to which I have alluded. In his own field, Schumann is lonely, incomparable. No composer has whispered such secrets of subtle and ravishing beauty to a receptive listener. The hearer of Schumann's music must in turn be imaginative and a dreamer. He must often anticipate the composer's thought. This music is not for a garish concert hall; it shrinks from boisterous applause.

Mr Witek, the New Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston is much interested in the new concert-master of the Symphony orchestra, Mr Witek, who made his first appearance with the orchestra in the concert at Smith college 10 days ago. The Berlin correspondent of the Musical Courier gives this information about him:—

Berlin is sorry to lose Witek. For 16 years he was a prominent figure in the musical life of this city, and he made a host of friends and admirers here, as a man as well as concert-master, soloist, ensemble performer and teacher. As a concert-master, Witek is unexcelled, and the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra will find it difficult to replace him. He came here from Prague in 1894, and for a full decade and a half he led the violins of this band of musicians. He was also the leading soloist among the personnel of the orchestra, and his frequent appearances at the Tuesday, Wednesday and Sunday popular concerts were always signals for full houses. It happened that I came to Berlin the same year that Witek did, and I distinctly recall hearing him play for the first time at one of the Tuesday "Pops" in the fall of 1894. His number that night was Mendelssohn's concerto; he gave a beautiful, finished, artistic performance of the well-worn piece, his technic was impeccable, his intonation faultless, even then, and he played with the ease and assurance of the brilliant virtuoso. Witek at that time was only about 18 years old. Since then I have heard him [illegible] his entire repertory, which embraces everything of interest in violin literature. Witek preters, however, the big symphonic concertos, like Brahms's, Beethoven's and Tschaikowsky's, although he is thoroughly at home in the virtuoso pieces of Wieniawski, Ernst and Paganini. As an ensemble player, Witek has made an enviable reputation for himself in Germany. The annual series of concerts given by his trio in this city ranked among the best that Berlin had to offer in this genre. It was always a marvel to me how Witek retained his technic and repertory, as with his orchestra work, his solo and ensemble playing and teaching, he was an exceedingly busy man. Many Americans studied under him during his stay in the German capital, and they always spoke of their teacher with enthusiasm. Witek is a Bohemian, not a German, and he studied at the Prague conservatory under Bennewitz, who was also the teacher of Halir, Ondricek and Zajic. He came to Berlin at the age of 18, and he was identified with the musical life of this city uninterruptedly up to the end of last season. Vita Witek, the violinist's wife, is a pianist of ability and attainments. A pupil of Leschetizky and Carreno, she has been the pianist of the Witek trio ever since it was founded, and she has proved to be an able partner for her husband. The artist couple will continue their ensemble work in Boston.

„Die Sonntagspost", Baltimore, Md., „Die Sonntags-Post," Balt

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Am MittwochAbend, den 9. Nov., wird die hiesige Saison des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in der Lyric eröffnet werden. Das Orchester besteht aus 100 Musikern und hat als Solisten Melba, Rider-Kelsey, Hofmann, Eluntu und Witek. Das Orchester wird an den folgenden Tagen in der Lyric auftreten: 9. Nov., 7. Dezember, 11 Januar, 22. Februar und 22. März. Die Saison-Billete liegen jetzt schon in Albaugh's Ticket Office, 109 Nord-Charles-Str., zum Preise von $7 und $5 zum Verkaufe auf.

PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL. OCTOBER 16, 1910.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced last week the names of the soloists for its five Providence concerts. They are as follows: Oct. 25, Olive Fremstad, the dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Nov. 22, Josef Hofmann, ranked as the chief pianist to be in America this season; Jan. 3, Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who is familiar here; Feb. 14, Yolande Mero, a Hungarian pianist, who will make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony at the local concert; April 4, Mme. Louise Homer, the principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

This list, music lovers [illegible] agree, is one calculated greatly to [illegible]e interest in the series which, as [illegible] noted, is to include one more concert [illegible] usual this year. Three of the sol[illegible]s, Fremstad, Mero and Homer, are [illegible] to the city. Mme. Fremstad, who [illegible] open the series, has risen rapidly in [illegible] musical world, being regarded as on[illegible] the greatest interpreters of "Isolde" [illegible] the world.

The sale of season t[illegible]kets will open tomorrow morning at Steinert's music store.

* * *

The assertion is made that Dr. Karl Muck, formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to return two years hence to resume that position. He left in 1908, his contract with the Royal Opera compelling his return to Berlin. That his departure was regretted both by himself and by the management of the orchestra was well known, and the Boston Transcript, commenting on recent developments, says:

"The management was prepared to re-engage him as soon as he was free from prior obligations in Germany. It has since been stated that Dr. Muck's contract with the Royal Opera would end in the spring of 1912, and circumstances have lately conspired to disclose the use that he will make of his new freedom. In a word, he will return to Boston and become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, for what dispatches from Berlin call 'a prolonged period.'

"Last June, it will be recalled, Mr. Weingartner offered his resignation as the director of the Imperial Opera at Vienna, the most distinguished post of its kind in the German-speaking world. It was offered promptly to Dr. Muck. Almost as speedily he declined it, saying that he had made engagements which required his return to America for some years.

"The terms of his reply were printed in the German and the French newspapers and repeated freely last summer in Germany by his friends. Bostonians who encountered him in the travels received a like, though more vague, assurance from his own lips, while it was common knowledge, so to say, in the 'musical circles' that the festivals at Munich and Salzburg gathered that Dr. Muck, in the autumn of 1912, would become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again.

TIMES, PAWTUCKET, R. I. OCTOBER 15, 1910.

Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, Providence, Monday morning. It is expected that the subscription this year will be very large if only because of the really astonishing list of soloists that the management has announced.

As already announced, there will be five concerts this year instead of four as last. These will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14 and April 4. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Olive Fremstad, the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. At the second concert the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist at the third concert, while at the fourth the soloist will be Yolande Mero, the Hungarian pianist. To bring the series to a close as brilliant as the beginning, the management has engaged for the last concert Madame Louise Homer, the principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

EVENING TIMES, PAWTUCKET, R. I. OCTOBER 17, 1910.

Boston Symphony.

The subscription sale of seats for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Infantry Hall this winter opens this morning at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street. As already announced the soloists in the order of their coming will be Madame Olive Fremstad, the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Yolande Mero, pianist, and Madame Louise Homer, the principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The dates of the concerts are Tuesday evenings, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14 and April 4.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Thursday and Saturday.

Symphony Orchestra Subscription Sale

The subscription sale of seats for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in Infantry hall this winter, opens this morning at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street. As already announced the soloists in the order of their coming will be Madame Olive Fremstad, the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera company; Josef Hofman, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Yolande Mero, pianist, and Madame Louise Homer, the principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera company.

The dates of the concerts are Tuesday evenings, Oct. 25th, Nov. 22nd, Jan. 3rd, Feb. 14th and April 4th.

Estab 1884

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The general sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts, Max Fiedler, conductor, will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, on Monday morning.

It is expected that the subscription this year will be very large, if only because of the really astonishing list of soloists that the management has announced. Never has the Boston Symphony given Providence anything like it, and a comparison of these soloists with those which the orchestra is offering to cities like New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, shows that the average is higher, or as high, for Providence as it is for any of those cities.

As already announced, there will be five concerts this year, instead of four as last. These will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14, and April 4. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Olive Fremstad, the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera company of New York. At the second concert the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist at the third concert, while at the fourth the soloist will be Yolande Mero, the Hungarian pianist. To bring the series to a close as brilliant as the beginning, the management has engaged for the last concert Madame Louise Homer, the principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera company.

Madame Fremstad assumes all the great dramatic roles at the Metropolitan, Isolde, the Brunnhilde, Sieglinde, Kundry, and she created Richard Strauss' Salome in America. This year she is to open the Metropolitan opera season with Armide, in Gluck's famous opera of the same name, the revival of which will be one of the great features of the operatic season in New York. A beautiful woman of enormous talent and a beautiful voice, Madame Fremstad has no rival today in her chosen field of music the world over.

Josef Hofmann, who will be heard in Providence for the first time in several years, has fulfilled the promise of his wonderful youth, and put to shame all his detractors, who prophesied in years past that he would grow into just a mediocrity. He and Paderewski today stand alone as the greatest pianists of our time.

Mischa Elman needs no introduction to the Providence public, as he has already appeared here with the Symphony orchestra and likewise in recital. So great has his success been with the orchestra in the past two seasons that he has been re-engaged for the coming season for a series of concerts. This is a most eloquent acknowledgment that can be made for his favor with the public.

Yolande Mero, the Hungarian pianist, came to America for the first time last year and made a profound impression upon all those who heard her. Her appearance here in Providence will be her first with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Madame Louise Homer is the greatest of operatic contraltos. This American woman, whose career has been almost entirely confined to the United States both as a student and an artist, reached the summit of her hopes and ambitions last spring, when all Paris acclaimed her as the greatest artist of her kind at the performances the Metropolitan Opera company gave at the Chatelet in Paris. Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, regards himself as most fortunate in being able to present two such great artists as Madame Fremstad and Madame Homer.

Mr. Fiedler returns again as conductor and the only change of note in the personnel of the orchestra is the substitution of Anton Witek as concert master for Willy Hess. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian, 38 years old, who for the past 16 years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, and in that time has made an enviable reputation for himself throughout Europe as a soloist. It is believed that he is fully able to maintain the high traditions of his post.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Willy Hess, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony last year, is now in Berlin and has taken the chair in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra recently vacated by Anton Witek, who succeeded him in Boston. Thus the two cities appear to have made an even exchange. The Berlin correspondent of Musical America, however, reports that "there is a bitter feeling among the Berliners toward Witek; there usually is outspoken resentment when they see long-established favorites suddenly swallow the bait of higher remuneration, andt it may be, higher honors, in this "Dollarland," so heartily loathed and despised by the stay-at-homes. And they have been trying to decide in the affirmative the question, 'Is Witek kontraktbruchig' which, being translated, means guilty of contract breaking, the most undesirable stigma that could befall an artist in Germany or Austria. The whole trouble lies in the fact that Mr. Witek's Berlin contract does not expire till next year."

[35]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Address BOSTON, MASS.

Date OCT 15 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The time limit for old subscribers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats held by them last year will end Saturday and all applications for same should be made to C. A. Ellis, at M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street. This year, as heretofore announced, there will be five concerts instead of four—on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14 and April 4.

The list of soloists is the most brilliant the management has ever been able to offer. At the first concert the soloist will be Mme. Olive Fremstad, first dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, and one of the greatest artists of the world; at the second, Josef Hofmann, the celebrated pianist, will play; at the third, Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist; at the fourth, Yolande Mero, the Hungarian pianist, and at the fifth, Mme. Louise Homer, first contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Estd 1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

* * *

It is a brilliant list of soloists that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has provided for the five concerts the orchestra is to give in Philadelphia during the coming winter. As in past years the concerts will be given on Monday evenings, in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

At the first concert, in November, the soloist will be Mme. Nellie Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this year either in concert or opera this will be, and the chances are that this will be the last time she will sing here for a number of years, for the next two or three years will find her engaged with the venture in grand opera that she is to make in Australia, and she plans not to return to America for several years. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the December concert, Mischa Elman at the January, Heinrich Warnke at the February and Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English contralto, at the March concert.

Miss Harris as in the past will have charge of the subscriptions and ticket sales of the Orchestra at her office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. It is announced that the last day on which subscribers of the season of 1909-10 may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and retain the seats occupied by them a year ago is Wednesday, October 12. On Monday, October 17, the tickets will be on sale for new subscribers.

* * *

Est 1884

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS PLANNED

With the beginning of the thirtieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston next Friday, Washington music lovers are looking forward to the five engagements of the orchestra in this city, which have been scheduled for November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 21. At the first concert the soloist will be Miss Margaret Keyes, one of the foremost American contraltos.

The special attractions arranged for the other engagements include the appearance of Josef Hofmann, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, and Madame Jomelli, soprano, at the December, January, February, and March concerts, respectively. Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, of 2647 Connecticut avenue, again has charge of the Washington subscription. The concerts will be given as usual at the New National Theater at 4:30 on Tuesday afternoons.

Estd , 1884

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York City.

Date

WITH Miss Geraldine Farrar as soloist at its first concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 10, and Mme Melba as soloist at its first matinée on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 12, the New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open with much brilliancy. Moreover, at one of these concerts Mr. Fiedler will probably do Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, which was played here last season by the Russian Sumphony Society. Miss Farrar has shown her usual ingenuity in her selection of solo numbers, and she has departed far from the beaten path. Her first number will be an aria from Nicolo Isouard's opéra comique "Jeannot et Colin," which was performed in Paris in 1814. Her second number will be an entirely forgotten aria by Mozart. So far as it can be identified it was one that was sung at a concert given in Vienna in 1783. Dr. Muck has arranged the orchestration of it for Miss Farrar. Mme Melba will also sing a Mozart number, "Dovo sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and will follow this with the "mad scene" from Thomas's "Hamlet."

Establi

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

Date OCT 15 1910

Geraldine Farrar will, like Mahler, go "forward to Mozart" when she appears as soloist of the first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 10. She will sing (besides an air from Isouard's comic opera, "Jeannot et Colin," of the date of 1814) an entirely forgotten area by Mozart, probably written in 17[illegible]. On the following afternoon Nellie Me[illegible] will sing Mozart's "Dove Sono" from [illegible] Marriage of Figaro," besides the mad [illegible] from Hamlet."

There was a time when Miss Farrar and Dr. M[illegible]k were not friends, presumably because the American prima donna was always too much to have her own way at the Royal Opera in Berlin. Now, however, the tomahawk has been buried, and Dr. Muck has actually arranged the orchestration of the Mozart song just referred to for Miss Farrar, so Mr. Walter, the press agent of the Boston Orchestra, informs us. Moreover, Dr. Muck was evidently among those who most thoroughly enjoyed Miss Farrar's recent triumphs in Berlin. She appeared first in "Manon"; the house was jammed and the welcome back to the scene of her first successes enthusiastic. After the Cour-la-Reine scene, Dr. Muck laid down his baton till the tumultuous applause was over, evidently not in the least indignant over the unprecedented interruption. "Madama Butterfly" (which in Berlin is given in two acts) resulted in another hysterical outburst. Crowded houses also witnessed her appearances in "Romeo and Juliet," "Faust," "Traviata," "Tosca," and "Tannhäuser."

Est 1884

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date

Appropriately coming from the Seat of all Knowledge, the city of good grammar and culture, the glad news has reached Brooklyn that Saint-Saens' hymn to Pallas Athene will be sung by Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, when she appears as the soloist at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy, on Friday evening, Nov. 11. The hymnn was written for the musical festival given in the old Roman Theatre in Ofange, France, in 1894. Saint-Saens has always been most interested in these outdoor festivals which take place from time to time in the ancient Roman amphitheatre in Provence, and has written several works for performance in them.

The concert in November will be the 118th that the orchestra has given in this borough.

Est. 1884

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

* * *

With Miss Geraldine Farrar as soloist at its first concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 10, and Mme. Melba as soloist at its first matinee on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 12, the New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open brilliantly. Moreover, at one of these concerts Mr. Fiedler will probably do Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, which was played here last season by the Russian Symphony Society. Miss Farrar has shown her usual ingenuity in her selection of solo numbers and she has departed far from the beaten path. Her first number will be an aria from Nicolo Isouard's opera comique, "Jeannot et Colin," which was performed in Paris in 1813. Her second number will be an entirely forgotten aria of occasion by Mozart, the first words of which are "Misero! C signo, O son desto?"

* * *

Establi

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York City.

Date

Die ersten New Yorker Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters finden in Carnegie Hall am 10. und 12. November statt. Dirigent Herr Fiedler gedenkt, bei einer dieser Gelegenheiten Rachmaninoff's Zweite Symphonie, welche ihre New Yorker Erstaufführung im Vorjahre durch das Russische Symphonie-Orchester erlebte, zur Aufführung zu bringen. Die Solistinnen bei dieser Gelegenheit sind die Damen Farrar und Melba. Frl. Farrar wird eine Isouard'sche Arie aus der Oper „Jeannot et Colin" des französischen Meisters, sowie eine gänzlich vergessene Mozart'sche Arie: „Misero o Son desta?" singen. (In Wien wahrscheinlich 1783 zum ersten Mal gesungen und von Dr. Muck für Frl. Farrar orchestrirt.) Frau Melba wird „Dove sono" aus Morzart's „Die Hochzeit des Figaro" und die Wahnsinns-Scene aus Thomas „Hamlet" zum Vortrag bringen.

rk, 1884

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

With Miss Geraldine Farrar as soloist a its first concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 10, and Mme. Melba as soloist at its first matinee on the following Saturday afternoon, the New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open with much brilliancy. Moreover, at one of these concerts Mr. Fiedler will probably do Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, which was played here last season by the Russian Symphony Society.

Miss Farrar has shown ingenuity in her selection of solo numbers, and she has departed far from the beaten path. Her first number will be an aria from Nicolo Isouard's opera comique, "Jeannot et Colin," which was performed in Paris in 1813. Her second number will be an entirely forgotten aria of occasion by Mozart, the first words of which are "Misero; O signo, O son desto?" So far as it can be identified it was one that was sung at a concert given in Vienna in 1783. Dr. Muck has arranged the orchestration of it for Miss Farrar. Mme. Melba will also sing a Mozart number, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and will follow this with the mad scene from Thomas's "Hamlet."

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

With Miss Geraldine Farrar as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 10. Mme. Melba will be the soloist at its first matinee concert on Saturday, November 12. Moreover, at one of these concerts Mr. Fiedler will probably present Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, which was played here last season by the Russian Symphony Society. Miss Farrar's solo numbers will include an aria from Nicolo Isouard's opera-comique, "Jeannot et Colin," which was performed in Paris in 1815. Her second number will be an entirely forgotten aria by Mozart, the first words of which are "Misero! O signo, O son desto?" So far as it can be identified, it was originally sung at a concert given in Vienna in 1783. Mme. Melba's contributions at the matinee will be Mozart's "Dove Song," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Mad Scene," from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet."

ork, 1884

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date

With Miss Geraldine Farrar as soloist at its first concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 10, and Madame Melba as soloist at its first matinée on Saturday afternoon, November 12, the New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open with brilliancy. At one of these concerts Mr. Fiedler will probaby do Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony. Miss Farrar's first number will be an aria from Nicolo Isouard's opera comique, "Jeannot et Colin," which was performed in Paris in 1813. Her second number will be an aria of occasion by Mozart, the first words of which are "Misero! O signo, a con desto?" So far as it can be identified it was one that was sung at a concert given in Vienna in 1783. Dr. Muck has arranged the orchestration of it for Miss Farrar. Madame Melba will also sing a Mozart number, "Dove Song" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and will follow this with the mad scene from Thomas's "Hamlet."

E 1884

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which will appear for the first time this season in Carnegie hall Thursday evening, November 10, will have as soloist for the opening concert Geraldine Farrar, while at the following Saturday afternoon concert Mme. Melba will be the soloist. It is evident that the Boston organization wish to popularize their concerts. Miss Farrar will sing an aria from an opera by Nicolo Isouard, "Jeannot et Colin," which was performed in Paris in 1814, and the second number will be by Mozart, an orchestration for which has been made by Dr. Muck. Mme. Melba will also sing a Mozart number from "The Marriage of Figaro" and she will sing the mad scene from "Hamlet."

ork, 1884

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date OCT 16 1910

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

AT the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Brooklyn, on Friday evening, November 11, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, the soloist, expects to sing a most interesting work, which will be heard for the first time in this country. It is a hymn to Pallas Athena, by Saint-Saëns, and was written for the musical festival given in the old Roman Theatre, in Orange, France, in 1894. Saint-Saëns has always been most interested in these out-door festivals which have been given from time to time in the ancient Roman Amphitheatre in Provence, and has written several works for performance in them. This hymn to Pallas Athena shows him at his best.

The concert in November will be the one hundred and eighteenth that the orchestra has given in this city.

Estd

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn on Friday evening, November 11, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, the soloist, expects to sing a most interesting work which will be heard for the first time in this country. It is a hymn to Pallas Athena, by Saint-Saëns, and was written for the musical festival given in the old Roman Theatre in Orange, France, in 1894.

Established: London, 1861; New York, 1884

From EVENING WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date

[illegible] the soloist at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 10, and Nellie Melba the soloist at the first matinee on the following Saturday afternoon. Miss Farrar will sing an aria from Nicolo Isouard's opera comique, "Jeannot et Colin," performed in Paris in 1814, and an almost forgotten aria by Mozart that was sung in Vienna in 1783, for which Dr. Muck has arranged the orchestration. Mme. Melba will also sing a Mozart number, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the Mad Scene from Thomas's "Hamlet."

1884

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date

With Miss Geraldine Farrar as soloist at its first concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 10, and Mme. Melba as soloist at its first matinée on Saturday afternoon, November 12, the New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open with much brilliancy. Moreover at one of these concerts Mr. Fiedler will probably do Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, which was played here last season by the Russian Symphony Society. Miss Farrar has shown her usual ingenuity in her selection of solo numbers and she has departed far from the beaten path. Her first number will be an aria from Nicolo Isouard's opera comique "Jeannot et Colin," which was performed in Paris in 1814. Her second number will be a forgotten aria of occasion by Mozart, the first words of which are: "Misero! O signo, O son desto?" Dr. Muck has arranged the orchestration of it for Miss Farrar. Mme. Melba will also sing a Mozart number, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and will follow this with the mad scene from Thomas's "Hamlet."

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

Geraldine Farrar's quaint airs with the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 10 will include one from Nicolo Isouard's opéra comique, "Jeannot et Colin," sung in Paris in 1814, and a forgotten "aria of occasion" by Mozart, "Misero! O signo, O son desto," heard in Vienna in 1783.

Est

384

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date

Miss Geraldine Farrar will sing at the first concert of the Boston Orchestra this season, in Carnegie Hall, November 10, an aria from a French opera, "Jeannot et Colin," dating from 1814. She will also sing a little known aria by Mozart, beginning, "Misero! O, Signo!" which has been arranged by Dr. Muck. At the first afternoon concert, November 12, Mme. Melba will be heard in the "Dove Sono" air from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and in the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

384

From STANDARD UNION BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Address OCT 16 1910

Date

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn on Friday evening, Nov. 11, Madame Jeanne Jomelli, the soloist, expects to sing a most interesting work which will be heard for the first time in this country. It is a hymn to Pallas Athena by Saint-Saens, and was written for the musical festival given in the old Roman Theatre in Orange, France, in 1894. Saint-Saens has always been most interested in these out-door festivals which have been given from time to time in the ancient Roman Amphitheatre in Provence, and has written several works for performance in them. This hymn to Pallas Athena shows him at his best. The concert in November will be the one hundred and eighteenth that the orchestra has given in this city.

Establi

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 15 1910

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn on Friday evening, November 11, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, the soloist, expects to sing a most interesting work which will be heard for the first time in this country. It is a hymn to Pallas Athena, by Saint-Saens, and was written for the musical festival given in the old Roman Theater in Orange, France, in 1894. Saint-Saens has always been most interested in these out-door festivals, which have been given from time to time in the ancient Roman amphitheater in Provence, and has written several works for performance in them. The concert in November will be the one hundred and eighteenth that the orchestra has given in this city.

Est 1884

From

Address

Date

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Flonzaley Quartet were the only two organizations giving concerts in Boston last year whose seasons were financially successful. One of the first American critics to recognize the exceptional merit of the Flonzaleys was Philip Hale, the well-known critic of Boston. A performance given in that city some seasons ago, Mr. Hale characterized as "one of the most brilliant in the history of chamber music within the last twenty years." The Flonzaleys give a concert in Witherspoon Hall on Monday evening, November 14, under the auspices of the department of music, University Extension Society.

* * *

Esi , 1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Estabi

From EYE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

MUSICAL NOTES

Anton Witek, who this season succeeds Willy Hess as concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, and for the past sixteen years has been concertmeister of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Witek will make his first appearance here at the Boston Orchestra's opening concert of the season, at the Academy of Music, Monday evening, November 7, when Madame Melba will be the soloist. This, it is announced, will be Melba's only appearance in Philadelphia this season, and her farewell to this city for at least two years. She has chosen as her numbers the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the Mad Scene from Thomas's "Hamlet."

rk, 1884

From

Address

Date

* * *

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music during the coming Winter will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, 1119 Chestnut Street, to-morrow morning. This will be the thirtieth season of the orchestra since it was organized and will be the twenty-sixth season in which it has come regularly to Philadelphia, its first visit having been in April, 1886, when Mr. Gericke was in the second year of his first term of service as conductor of the orchestra.

It is the purpose of the management to make this coming season of 1910-1911 the most attractive the orchestra has ever given in Philadelphia and to that end soloists have been engaged who are far above the average, in fact, they represent, generally speaking, the greatest exponents of their different branches of the art who will be in the United States this year.

The five concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this will be.

At the second concert, in December, the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, one of the greatest of living pianists and particularly interesting because he is one of the few artists who have fulfilled the promise of his youth. Mr. Hofmann is under contract for no less than fourteen performances with the orchestra during the months of December and January.

* * *

Est. 1884

SOLOISTS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony dates are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, March 20, with Madame Melba, Hofmann, Elman, Warnke and Mme. Kirby-Lunn as the successive soloists. The general sale of season tickets opens tomorrow at Heppe's.

* * *

After the close of her concert tour this month, Melba will sing four times with the Boston Orchestra in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. She is to sing four times with the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago and four times with the Metropolitan Opera in New York, and these appearances, with one other concert in New England, will finish her work in America, for she sails for England on her way to Australia at the end of December. On the occasion of her appearance here, Madame Melba will sing the aria "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet."

The new concertmeister of the Boston Orchestra is Anton Witek, who takes the place of Willy Hess. Witek is a Bohemian, 38 years of age, who for the past 16 years has been concertmeister of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A NEW SYMPHONY AND A NEW VIOLINIST

The Unusual Length of the Concert and the Liking of the Audience for It—The Orchestra in Form Again—Mr. Fiedler and the Overture to "Oberon"—Why Not Let Weber Speak for Himself?—Goldmark's Concerto Serves Mr. Macmillen Well—The Watercolor Elegance, the Light Brilliance and the Charm of Both Music and Performance—Rachmaninoff's Symphony Proves Remarkable, Rewarding and Baffling

Mr. Fiedler surpassed himself and all his predecessors in the length of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. It continued for two hours and ten minutes, a longer time than even Mr. d'Indy found needful, when he visited Boston in 1905, for his exhibition of specimens of the newer French music. The intermission aside, two pieces divided these two hours, with the exception of the ten or a dozen minutes that they allowed to the overture to "Oberon." One of the two was Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, played for the first time in Boston, and it continued for an hour and five minutes. The other was Goldmark's concerto for violin, with Mr. Macmillen to play the solo part, and it filled forty-five minutes more. The audience took these lengths complaisantly, and departures before the final number have been more numerous in shorter concerts. Mr. Fiedler has taught the public to share his liking for "brilliant overtures" as endings to his programmes, and if the overture be as familiar and warmly liked as that to "Oberon," it stays gladly. Long as the symphony was, the music and the performance seemed to hold the interest of the audience unflaggingly. Applause was hearty at each pause and heartier still at the close. Of the second generation of the Russian composers, Mr. Rachmaninoff's name evidently conjures in Boston. Through the concerto, which has much less intrinsic warrant for its length than the symphony, the audience had the interest of Mr. Macmillen's agreeable presence and the light brilliancy of his playing. Again its applause was hearty.

Throughout the concert, moreover, the listeners had the pleasure of the orchestra in form again. Mr. Rachmaninoff's instrumentation is rich and pungent, and the band attained to a like richness and significance of tone. Goldmark's is gracefully commonplace, and the orchestra played its part in the concerto lightly, elegantly. The strings were clear-toned and euphonious again, and it was possible often in the symphony to note the warmth, the body, and the animation of the voice of Mr. Witek's violin. Mr. Fiedler happens to admire Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphony warmly. He conducted in it then, as he conducts in all pieces that so appeal to him with entire absorption in its musical substance and its emotional spirit, and with no thought of reflective and calculated effect. The result, again as usual, when Mr. Fiedler is so minded, was a very revealing and a very glowing performance. Mr. Fiedler and his men with him sustained the long-breathed power of the music and in its more vivid moments struck appropriate fire. Of course the overture to "Oberon" was "interpreted" to the hilt. It always is nowadays; but Mr. Fiedler was fortunate in a band that could hold the introduction down to soft and remote murmur, and then race flamingly away on the "main body," as the analysts say, of the overture.

It is easy to wonder whether Weber's vivid and outspoken music really needs all the "treatment" that it is the fashion of the hour to give it. Probably it was played very straightforwardly at that first performance of "Oberon" in London when the audience would not be satisfied until it had heard the overture a second time. True, Weber's own direction in the score, "with the utmost possible softness," is warrant for all the effort of the conductors to make the introduction like the echo of Oberon's horn, faint and far, like the lightest footfall of marching elves, like the voices of "faerie" and of romance heard in shadowy and fading dream. Weber's design is clear enough. He had the true romanticist's passion for ardent contrast. He would begin with these echoing and phantom sounds—the gossamer, as it were, of romance, and then fling against them, in "the body" of the overture, its rush, its glow, its eloquence of passion, its splendor of picture. Between the two stands the dividing chord upon which conductors love to spend their "interpretation." It pleased Mr. Fiedler yesterday to reduce it to a kind of orchestral gasp, as though romance and Weber were distinctly out of breath. Is it not the better way to make it full, sustained, crashing? Is not this the intent of the musical and the emotional design? Weber was the outspoken romanticist in opera—own brother to Hugo and his romantic crew in the drama, to Delacroix and his fellow painters. His romantic feeling was not shadowed like Schumann's in music, like Jean Paul's in letters. It was flamboyant. He intended that dividing chord to ring like a sonorous line of Hugo—"Montes d'Aragon, Galice, Estramadoure," for example— and to flame like Delacroix's or Diaz's reds. It does neither when it becomes, as it did yesterday, a mere nervous gasp. Mr. Weingartner was saying the other day that conductors ought to forsake their "interpretations" of Mozart and go back to the plain intent of his music. They might do likewise by Weber's three overtures. They have managed somehow to keep themselvs alive these hundred years.

As a rule, the virtuoso of the violin or the piano is not comely to see. Too often his years of distinction come when middle age with a penurious and laborious youth behind, has set its seams upon him. Mr. Macmillen is young; he happened to be playing yesterday on his twenty-fifth birthday—and with his slim frame, his thin, alert face, his unaffected hair and his gentle manners, he is pleasant to see. He is not obtrusive, as one who takes thought of his "personality"; he is quietly ingratiating. The charm of youth, touching to some of us who have put it far behind, is in him. And Mr. Macmillen is wise with a promising wisdom. As his mind, temperaments and executive talents now go, it is easy to surmise that he would seem rather diminutive in the "great" and severe concertos—in Beethoven's or in Brahms's, for example. Perhaps, in the long run, they will not be for his specific cast of spirit and capacity. His particular individual trait is a light quickness of comprehension, feeling and execution that at its best rises to as light a brilliance. Goldmark's concerto is at one with these qualities; if we are not mistaken, César Thomson, whose pupil he was, schooled him in it, and in the days when Mr. Thomson was a wandering virtuoso he shone in the piece. It has no largeness of design or execution; musically it is commonplace veiled in pleasant grace and elegance. The emotion of it is not rhapsodic—only pleasant sentiment a little accented by Goldmark's vein of romantic musing in the slow movement and a little heightened by his watercolor brilliance in the bright rhythms of the finale. Throughout, it displays the voice and the feats of the violin, not in dry academic but in agreeably florid fashion. Like others of his Semitic race, Goldmark can be showily elegant.

Thus the concerto met Mr. Macmillen more than half way, and he was good to hear in it. His tone, for example, lacks depth and body, but it had precisely the fluent grace and the light brilliance that the music asks. It was a prettily sensitive tone to the rippling flow of the concerto; it caught all the little graces of Goldmark's figures. It was fine and sweet, like Goldmark's sentiment; it had his watercolor brightness. Once and again, Mr. Macmillen mistook this sentiment for feeling, even for passion, and tried to express it. Then his tone grew tight and a little wiry. Or it lost its clearness, its refinement, its light brilliance, blurred and confused itself. Plainly it is too delicate to bear pressure of execution or of overmuch feeling. This delicacy, however, this refined but not effeminate sweetness exactly accorded with the lacework passages, the florid arabesque that Goldmark has woven for his violinist. They are not the rhapsodic bravura that some concertos seem to create out of themselves in a kind of ecstasy for the responsive instrument. They are intricate, graceful, elegant, amiable and agreeable tonal filigree. So Mr. Macmillen spun them, with the air of easy and polished accomplishment that masked their difficulty and pointed their pretty elegance. The concerto is written watercolors. It seeks insistently to charm. Mr. Macmillen seldom "laid on," as though he were painting a tonal fresco in oils, and then all to the detriment of his tone and style. He did charm.

Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphony is of such magnitude—of such just magnitude in spite of its sixty-five minutes—that it may not easily be grasped at a single hearing or briefly dismissed at the end of a review. Mr. Rachmaninoff works with a high and sincere purpose to high and large accomplishment toward a grave and exalted ideal. He is no lazy and ecstatic thapsodist, no bold or self-conscious innovator. He has set himself an unusual task in a musical time that is all for new and daring departures, for self-expression—and sometimes self-display—come what may. He clings to the established forms; he is orthodox in his concertos; orthodox in his symphonies; orthodox, as form in tone-poems goes, in "The Isle of the Dead" that so stirred his hearers last year. Yet he is not orthodox from pedantry, dulness, inertia or mere respect for old and established things because they are traditional. He believes in these forms; he finds that he can make them expressive of his musical ideas, of his moods, passions, imaginings, and without any subservience of mind or spirit or dream to mere academic precedent and dogma. He sees, too, how he can enrich these forms, and the ideas and the emotions that he makes to shape them, with all the diversified amplitude and the multifarious shadings and suggestions of modern instrumentation. He believes, as well, that in a symphony so written he can speak with quite as emotionally imparting and stirring a voice as all the freedom of tone-poem or rhapsody would allow him. Mr. Rachmaninoff, moreover, is little tempted by the possibilities of music to suggest descriptively, to delineate pictorially. He would keep it concerned with itself as so much ordered, beautiful, puissant or expressive sound. He would have it so express the distilled and abstract essence of moods and emotions. He has his passionate voice, but it is of an ideal and idealizing passion. He has turned all this faith into practice in this second symphony. It is remarkable and rewarding as modern symphonies go. It is clear and eloquent on its formal side, eloquent and baffling in its expression of mood and feeling. A second hearing may clarify it, and on Monday more than a final paragraph shall try to appreciate it.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1910

News of Music

At the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 4 and 5, Mr. Fiedler purposes to repeat the symphony by Mr. Rachmaninoff that warmly interested and plainly stirred the audiences of last Friday and Saturday. Requests to the conductor for such a repetition have been many and the symphony in itself amply deserves more hearings. Similarly Mr. Fiedler repeated Mr. d'Indy's symphony last year, and Dr. Muck, in his time, Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," and Debussy's "The Sea." Mr. Gericke so repeated in a single month Mr. Mahler's fifth symphony, and if recollection serves, the custom began with Mr. Paur's repetition of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony when it was new to America. There is no reason to question the justice or the pleasure of these repetitions. The music warrants them; the audiences like them. Yet do they accomplish as wisely and efficiently as they might the desired end—presumably to make hearers well acquainted with the several pieces? Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphony will be repeated next week. It may not be played again at a Symphony Concert for years, and when it does reappear on the programme, it will be as novel to most hearers, since musical memories are short and musical impressions fleeting, as it was last week. A year ago, Mr. d'Indy's symphony, previously unheard for four seasons, came like a discovery to those that heard it. For another four years it may lie on the shelves of the library and then be rediscovered again. If Mr. Fiedler were to play Mr. Mahler's fifth symphony tomorrow, it would be as new and strange to the public of the Symphony Concerts as it was in Mr. Gericke's distant time. It is interesting to hear a new, important and engrossing symphony or tone-poem four times in as many weeks; but the wiser and the more efficient way to make it lastingly familiar would be to repeat the music, at a single pair of concerts, for four successive years. In fact, this is precisely the course Mr. Fiedler is following with the less known and more abstruse tone-poems of Strauss. He played "Zarathustra" two seasons ago and repeated it last winter; he played "Don Quixote" last spring, and "Ein Heldlenben" two years back, and both pieces now stand on his list for the current season.

BOSTON GLOBE-OCTOBER 22, 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

New Tone Poem by Scriabin Heard For First Time.

Beethoven's Second Symphony and Sibelius' "Finlandia" Played.

The 10-minute intermission at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was but a thin partition to separate Beethoven's second symphony, a monument to order, and Scriabin's new "Poem of Ecstasy," which might appear cacophony and chaos.

Bach's concerto for strings, "with the bass for the harpischord," written for the Prussian Prince Ludwig of Brandenburg and bearing his name, began the concert. Sibelius' Symphonic Poem "Finlandia" ended it.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" was heard for the first time in Boston. It was played in New York by the Russian symphony orchestra, Modest Altschuler, conductor, Dec 10, 1908, for the first time anywhere.

Were this "Poem of Ecstasy" not "program music" it might seem wholly confused, unintelligible. Even with a program it is no beatific definition of what is usually reckoned hereabouts as ecstasy, and the most veracious person may say with candor it is not a concord of sweet sounds.

Mr Altschuler furnished for the symphony program book a Russian poem by Mr Scriabin which is somewhat illuminating. It was translated by Lydia L. Pimenoff Noble of Boston.

In it the author apparently takes as his problem the mastery of life. This spirit is pictured somewhat as saying: "When everything rises against me, then will I begin my play." He will excite antagonists by "monsters, torments and serpents, by rain of suns, by lightnings of passion, by fires of desire." He says: "I am affirmation. I am ecstasy. What menaced is now excitement. What terrified is now delight."

This corroborates Browning in the sixth stanza of his "Rabbi Ben Ezra":

"Then welcome each rebuff
That turns earth's smoothness rough,
Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand but go!
Be our joys three parts pain!" etc.

With the Allegro non troppo, a trumpet appears and Scriabin has written wildly, mercilessly, for the first trumpet, music absurdly exacting for a B-flat instrument. Although the part is divided between two players, the 16 measures of continuous playing above the clef and the two excursions to high C sharp are beyond reason. This trumpet reaffirms a theme of battle and triumph. The whole orchestra seems rifted against it in a sea of contending din.

Perhaps there is another kind of ecstasy—the unutterable rapture of victory over time, fate and circumstance. Scriabin's new work concludes with such an apostrophe.

"Finlandia" stirred again as music always will which grips the heart and fires the brain with the picture of a brave and resolute people, tenacious of liberty and courageous, even in suffering.

Mr Fiedler's reading of it was virile. For the performance of the difficult "Poem of Ecstasy" he and the orchestra deserve great credit.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 22, 1910

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A Classical Programme for the Symphony Concert—Mr. Macmillen's Recital

BRAHMS, Beethoven, but not Bach, of Bülow's three B's, has each his place on the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday next. Mr. Fiedler believes that we should hear two symphonies by Brahms each season. Last year it was the turn of the second and the fourth; this winter come the first and the third, with the third in F, to lead the way next week—as some have it, the clearest of voice and the frankest of feeling of the four. The other classic is Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra in which the new concert-master, Mr. Witek, is to prove his skill, understanding and emotion. The larger classics of the violin have been his "battle-horses" in Germany. Naturally, then, he mounts one of them for his first appearance as a "soloist" in America. For ending to the concert and for fantastic relief to it will come Mr. Strube's overture, "Puck," first heard and pleasantly last year. It deserves repetition.

As the way of the violinists is, Mr. Macmillen goes from his appearances with the Symphony Orchestra last week to a recital of his own on Monday afternoon, at three o'clock, in Chickering Hall. His audience of virtuosi at his rehearsal with the orchestra and his audience at one of the concerts heard him gladly since he played with light skill, a pleasant charm, sensitive feeling and ingratiating presence. At the recital, to judge from his programme, he would renew these qualities and emphasize his skill as a virtuoso. His pieces are: A Concerto by Ernst; Bach's Chaconne; a Minuet from Mozart; a Mazurka from Zarzycki; "Meditations" by Glazounoff; a Pastoral by Massenet; Saint-Saëns's "Rondo Capriccioso," and Paganini's Fantasia on airs from Rossini's "Moses in Egypt."

Friday afternoon, Nov. 4, in Symphony Hall, the fifth concert of the afternoon series by the Symphony Orchestra, with Miss Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House for the assisting singer. She will sing two little-known pieces: an air out of Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin," an opéra-comique of 1814; and a concert piece by Mozart that dates from 1783. The orchestra will repeat Rachmaninoff's symphony first and impressively heard last week.

Saturday evening, Nov. 5, in Symphony Hall, the fifth concert of the evening series by the Symphony Orchestra, with Miss Farrar and the programme just noted.

BOSTON JOURNAL OCTOBER 22, 1910

"POEM OF ECSTASY" GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Scriabin's Work on Varied Program Presented to Music Lovers.

Still the musical Russians come. Yesterday the most prominent feature of the Symphony program was a symphonic poem by a young Muscovite named Alexander Nicholaevitch Scriabin. Last week the honor went to his fellow-countryman, Sergei Vassilievitch Rachmaninoff, who, by the way, will achieve the extra honor of having his second symphony repeated by request at the fifth Symphony concert. Rachmaninoff visited this city last season. Scriabin, who is only 38, one year older than Rachmaninoff, visited New York three years ago to hear the Russian Symphony Society perform his first symphony. Cincinnati heard his "Reverie," for orchestra, ten years ago. But yesterday was the first time Scriabin's name found a place on a Symphony program.

The Moscow musician calls this latest of his orchestral works "The Poem of Ecstasy." The ecstasy is expressed as cacophonically as the most ardent devotee of the new music thought could desire. Fortunately the words of the poem—for Scriabin is poet as well as musician—are published in the program book. They will help the earnest student to pick his way through the musical maze. There are people who enjoy these discordant diversions immensely, just as others revel in the "Tannhaueser" overture, which they insist upon hearing at least once a year, and in such smooth and comprehensive, though probably old-fashioned, works as Bach's Brandenburg concerto for strings and Beethoven's second symphony, which last two were also on yesterday's program.

There was no lack of applause for Scriabin, but there was more applause for Beethoven.

Sibelius' "Finland," another symphonic poem, first heard here two years ago, completed the program, which indeed had enough variety to please many tastes.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME AN ADMIXTURE

IT IS HALF MODERN AND HALF CLASSICAL

Fine Treat Afforded in the Masterful Playing of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Bach. Brandenburg Concerto, for Strings.
Beethoven. Second Symphony.
Scriabin. Symphonic Poem. "Le Poeme de l'Extase."
Sibelius. "Finlandia."

There was to have been a soloist, and a splendid one, but Death is no respecter even of symphony programmes, and M. Gilibert's voice has been hushed forever. The drawing power of soloists at these concerts is, however, disproportionately great. In a couple of weeks Geraldine Farrar will sing at these concerts and there will probably be a "rush-line" extending into Gainesborough st. of persons waiting to buy admission to the balcony. Yesterday there were three or four masterpieces, played by the best orchestra in the world, and there was no perceptible "rush-line." Evidently with the general public it is still "vox et preterea nihil!"

But to the real music-lover it was a glorious treat to hear the clear, calm counterpoint of Bach given by our string orchestra. It was interesting to abnegate for a while the glow of modern tone-color and to listen to music for the sake of its contents rather than for its instrumentation. How our strings played this work need not be told, for there is not the equal of this organization in any part of the world.

Yet we longed for it under its original conditions, in a small hall, with a much smaller number of viols. It was pleasant to note the line on the programme—"The Harpsichord is from Chickering & Sons"—for it spoke of a new departure in the concert room. Through the abilities of Arnold Dolmetsch the firm of Chickering give the modern concert-goer an opportunity to hear some of the old effects of tone.

On this occasion, however, the Bach balance could not be attained, for our string orchestra is far too heavy to allow the harpsichord to give a really perceptible tone-coloring to the picture. Nevertheless this was an unavoidable defect, and the Bach concerto was to us the most entirely delightful feature of a concert that presented some remarkable extremes.

The present writer once asked Mr. Gericke which of Beethoven's symphonies he loved the best. "The one I have heard last!" was the bright reply. There is much truth in this. We had fallen into the habit of thinking the second symphony one of the weak sisters of the nine, but heard yesterday we found many a point of deep interest, many a touch of remarkable beauty. The Scherzo (pioneer of all symphonic scherzos) has faded a trifle, yet even here the quaint contrast made by the old-fashioned Trio was very effective, and the oboes and bassoons played excellently here.

It has become customary to call the slow movement the gem of this symphony, but Beethoven made much broader slow movements, and we of the twentieth century demand more "Weltschmerz" and intensity in our emotional movements. But here too, the development appeals to the musician even while the suave melody catches the layman.

The first and last movements are as fresh and inspired as ever. If only some of the moderns could evolve such effective figures and such logical figure treatment! The opening Allegro of the symphony was taken somewhat slower than we have been accustomed to hear it, but we did not find this a defect. The repeat of the exposition was not made, for your latter day conductor is impatient of much repetition. The horns did some excellent work in the Larghetto and the Finale was the most effectively played movement of the four.

And now the concert made up for its conservative tone-coloring by jumping into the seething modern orchestral cauldron. Addison once spoke of "the pale, unripened beauties of the North"! but had evidently never heard the roarings of the instruments in a Finlandic "tondichtung" or a Russian ecstasy.

We are moved by the music of Sibelius, for very much the same reason that we become excited over the music of Smetana. Both were thoroughly in earnest, both were entirely in love with their native land and wanted to translate it to the world in tones. Sibelius has caught the very essence of the melodic sweetness of Finland, and one could readily mistake the themes of "Finlandia" for folk-songs, although they are entirely the work of the composer.

Of course one gets from Music something in proportion to what one brings to it, and the auditor should try to think with, not against, the composer. If one thought of the little nation scourged by the elements, of the isolation of much of the life there, and of the recent super-addition of political oppression, one would be greatly swayed by the darker touches of the poem, would thrill with that tender second theme of Hope, and would cordially wish that the note of triumph of the close might become a true prophecy. One could understand why Russia prohibited the public performance of this particular work, for one can write a Declaration of Independence in tones as well as in words.

The most modern orchestral touches are in the short composition, although the orchestra called for is not a very large one judged by the most recent standards. But the growlings of the deep brasses at the beginning call up memories of Tschaikowsky (strange how these North winds do blow!) and not only cymbal clashes and triangle tinklings are there, but even a thrill upon the bass drum.

"Finlandia" was finely interpreted and was one of the enjoyable points of the most varied programme.

The ultra-moderns all resemble each other. When one of these extreme gentlemen comes at you with a "Poem of Ecstasy" you may be sure of one thing, he is going to use every known instrument, and he is going either to whisper vagueness at you a la Debussy, or roar it at you a la Strauss. Scriabin did both. De Stendhal says that the radical works of one generation become the classical works of the next, in which we pity the next generation. Some of this ecstasy was extremely bitter, while some of it reminded of the ecstasy of the too convivial gentleman who thought that the air was filled with green monkeys with crimson eyes and sparkling tails, a kind of ecstasy that is sold in Russia at two roubles a bottle.

Let the auditor remember that Beethoven also has pictured ecstasy, in the final duet of "Fidelio," or the end of the ninth symphony, for example, and mentally compare his enraptured frenzy with the hurricanes and earthquakes of ecstasy here exploded and he will understand the profound distaste of the present reviewer for the "Poeme de l'Extase." It is almost entirely impressionistic. At frequent intervals the composer shudders himself into tonal epilepsy. The trumpeter plays until his lips are bloody, and his theme is of a most agonized kind of ecstasy.

Yet with all this said we must recognize a certain mastery of the orchestral forces, possibly even a certain unity according to the poem which the composer wrote to elucidate his musical work. But it is all, all, all on a wrong path. It is pushing Music out of its true orbit, and all the tone-coloring, and all the intensity, do not succeed in giving forth a work which is strikingly new or deeply impressive. The beautiful new path which Wagner opened is leading into a dangerous monotony which is striving to disguise itself in tonal decorations.

But all tribute must be paid to Mr. Fiedler and his men for the manner in which this herculean task was executed. It was one of the great triumphs of our orchestra and its leader, and we were glad to see the audience recognize this fact by some enthusiasm.

BOSTON POST OCTOBER 22, 1910

Third Symphony Rehearsal

By Olin Downes

This was the programme of the third symphony rehearsal this season, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: "Brandenburg" Concerto No. 3, for three violins, three violas, three 'cellos and bass, Bach; 2d symphony, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "The Poem of Ecstacy." Scriabine (first time in Boston); "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra Sibelius.

String music by Bach is likely to be interesting. The 3d "Brandenburg" concerto is not an exception. It is cheerful, vigorous music. The counterpoint is not pedantic, but good two-fisted stuff. But what shall be done when music written in 1721, for three violins, as many violas and 'cellos and bass, is performed in a bigger place than Bach dreamed of when he wrote his delightful measures, with the number of instruments in the proportion of 16 to 3, and a poor little tinkling harpsichord thrown in? If such music is to be heard in a big modern concert hall, the instruments should at least be fewer than they were yesterday, and the quality of tone more transparent than is probably possible with some 58 full-grown stringed instruments. The performance had appropriate vigor, if not the utmost finish, but the music was swollen to the ear.

The wondrous beauty and order of the introduction of Beethoven's early symphony—and is there a more perfect introduction to any work of the type?—the delightfully transparent instrumentation and the fine logic of the movements which followed, certainly formed sufficient contrast to the piece of Scriabine which followed. If we do not mistake, a Boston Symphony audience heard Scriabine for the first time on this occasion. Plainly, the majority present were puzzled whether to laugh or sneer. At the end, a certain small band of immediate converts at the back of the hall made known their appreciation of the music and Mr. Fiedler's splendid efforts by continuing to applaud until the conductor returned to his stand to bow his acknowledgments.

This may be said of Scriabine's monstrous composition—that it displays evidence of distinctive ideas and tendencies which are real inborn qualities of the personality of the composer. Ostentatious, striving and extravagant as is this piece, it is the voice of a man who may have in him something worth saying. It is evident that Scriabine is a true rhapsodist, not a self-styled one. It is his nature to disregard form. We need not quarrel with him on that point, but we have indeed the right to take exception to pages which certainly have unhappy effect at a first hearing. There are some striking places in "The Poem of Ecstasy," but the ideas are not, as a rule, well handled for any length of time. A man may be a rhapsodist, yet retain continuity of thought in his compositions. He must do this. There is little coherency in this symbolic poem, and the musical phrases which give what backbone there is to the piece are not always happily chosen. The phrase immediately given to the flute, that drooling, calflike phrase, hints more of the longing of the drawing-room pianist than of the strivings of a noble soul.

The composer has evidently been much influenced, and at times to his injury, by the Frenchmen at Paris. Scriabine's intentions, as we have said, are his own, but his ideas, when he does not forget them himself, are often dissipated by outside influences. It is a pity that the harp of Israfel is not tuned his way, for he undoubtedly has a certain individuality. Perhaps it may be, in years to come.

If there were to be bonfires on Beacon Hill tonight, we would listen with profit and rejoicing to the militant strains of Sibelius' "Finlandia." As the expression of a patriot, they are stirring.

BOSTON HEARS NEW WORK BY SCRIABIN

Interpretation of Russian's "The Joy of Untrammeled Activity."

A GREAT SYMPHONIC POEM

Rhapsody of Emotions as an Expression of the Philosophy of Life.

By PHILIP HALE.

The third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Brandenburg concerto, No. 3.....Bach
Symphony in D major, No. 2....Beethoven
"The Poem of Ecstasy," op. 54....Scriabin
"Finlandia," op. 26, No. 7.....Sibelius

Alexander Scriabin was first known to concert-goers in Boston by small piano pieces, and one of them, a composition for the left hand, became popular; but neither a composer nor a pianist is to be judged by the left hand alone. No one of his important compositions had been played here before the performance of his "Poem of Ecstasy" yesterday.

This symphonic poem was first performed by the Russian Symphony Society of New York, Dec. 10, 1908, when Mr. Altschuler conducted. Mr. Altschuler has done much in bringing forward the works of contemporaneous Russian composers, and he seems to be particularly interested in Scriabin, whom he met in Switzerland three years ago last summer, when Scriabin was at work on this symphonic poem. Mr. Altschuler writes that the composer has sought in this piece to express "something of the emotional and, therefore, musically communicable side of his philosophy of life." Mr. Scriabin, he adds, is "neither a pantheist nor a theosophist, yet his creed includes ideas somewhat related to each of these schools of thought."

The "Poem of Ecstasy" is said to express "the joy of untrammelled activity." The three divisions might be entitled, we are told: "His soul in the orgy of love; the realization of a fantastical dream; the glory of his own art."

Mr. Scriabin has been still more voluminous in explanation, if not so explicit. He wrote a singular poem for this piece, or perhaps the piece was written for the poem, which was published in Russian at Geneva in 1906. This verbal rhapsody, translated into English by Mrs. Edmund Noble (Lydia L. Pimenoff Noble), is published in the program book of these concerts. The task, which must have been difficult, seems to have been admirably accomplished, for the translation has both character and spontaneity, as though it were neither an interlinear translation nor a loose paraphrase.

To express his ecstatic joy and also his untramelled activity Mr. Scriabin employs a huge orchestra, which includes eight horns, five trumpets a celesta and all sorts of pulsatile instruments.

The composition, like the poem, might be described as a wildly fantastical rhapsody. There are some, and I am among them, who are more interested in the musical contents of a composition, the purely musical thought and expression, than in any attempt to give a translation in tones of philosophic thought. If Mr. Scriabin had merely entitled his musical rhapsody "Ecstasy" or "Joy in Free Activity," that would have been a sufficient clue."

It is easy to see how many will dismiss this work after one hearing as chaotic. They will speak of pleasing passages in juxtaposition with those that are barbarously boisterous. They will not find continuous thought, but loosely connected episodes. Our old friends who "dislike discords" will again shake sorrowful heads, and possibly appeal to the Watch and Ward Society.

A composition of this magnitude is not to be so idly dismissed. It calls for more than amiable or excited discussion in a street car on the return from the concert.

There is no doubt of the serious purpose and the sincerity of the composer. He is not merely a poseur with a sense of color; not only a skilful juggler with the instruments. There is a definite plan, though it may escape those to whom music since the death of Mendelssohn offers insuperable difficulties. Mr. Scriabin not only is a harmonist of the advanced school; not only one skilled in instrumentation; he has individuality, and he has imagination.

What matters it whether he be a pantheist or a pedo-Baptist; a man steeped in the religious traditions of India, or a convert to "New Thought"? When the fit was on him and he was at work on this rhapsody his first thought must have been the expression of that which was musical at the time within him.

This rhapsody is not cerebral music; it is emotional, and the emotional will be moved when they hear it. They may not understand the accompanying poem, and it would be better if they were not to read it until after the concert; yet the music will suggest to them thoughts which have come to them, but they themselves could not express these thoughts in music or in words. They will be stirred within; they, too, will for the moment be ecstatic.

Others will be interested in the harmonic expression and in the manner of instrumentation, the blending of timbres, the use of solo instruments in effects of ensemble; and there are twilight and mysterious effects; there are effects that recall operations of Nature, phenomena that are still mysterious, or tumultuous, though familiar for centuries.

Perhaps the highest tribute to this singular composition is this: it is not easy to describe the music to one that did not hear it; it is not easy for two that did hear it to express their views, one to the other. It is better to be silent about emotional music that works its spell. When a great deal can easily be spoken or written about that which is plausibly emotional, the poetic quality of the emotion may well be questioned.

Another high tribute to the "Poem of Ecstasy" is that many will dislike it and some will hold it in detestation.

The orchestral performance of this composition was brilliant and impressive. The performance of the other pieces deserves warm praise. In the concerts of Bach the harpsichord was mere tinkling against the rush and fury of the strings. The problem of piano or harpsichord in the performance of these works of Bach is not yet settled. If the strings are diminished the music should be heard in a small hall. If there is a specially constructed harpsichord, after the manner of the one used by Mr. Mahler with the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, the irreverent are reminded of a mowing machine active in a quiet summer morning, and the purists may say that there is a lack of proportion and the harpsichord becomes a solo instrument.

The performance of Beethoven's symphony was characterized by exquisite clarity and euphony. There is more of Finland in the symphonies, the violin concerto and "A Saga" of Sibelius than in his Finlandia," which is hot with the spirit of revolt. No doubt he wrote this music with a patriotic heart, but patriotism is not an essential quality in a musical work of art.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 3; Beethoven, concerto for violin; Strube, comedy overture, "Puck." Mr. Anton Witek, the concert master, will play as a soloist for the first time in America.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN SUNDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1910.

TO PLAY SYMPHONY AGAIN.

Boston Gets Another Chance to Hear Russian's Work.

For Friday afternoon, October 28, and Saturday evening, October 29, Mr. Fiedler of Boston Symphony Orchestra has decided to repeat the Rachmaninoff symphony before the impression it made at the second rehearsal and concert has died away.

No novelty that has been produced in several years has been received with such genuine enthusiasm by both audiences, and Mr. Fiedler has had a number of requests to repeat it as soon as possible. Therefore he put it as the leading number of the fourth program which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra. As planned originally, Mr. Witek would not have made his appearance until the end of next month, but the death of Mr. Gilibert necessitated the reconstruction of the solo list to a certain extent; therefore he comes earlier in the season. He will play the Beethoven Concerto.

The other number on the program will be Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck."

On the fifth program, to be played on November 4 and 5, the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, who will then make her only appearance of the season with the Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Madam Sembrich, although much of her musical career has been devoted to grand opera, will sing a program entirely devoid of arias. Not every singer of grand opera fame could afford to do this. Madam Sembrich will give a program devoted entirely to Schubert Schumann and Brahms. "Fruhlingsglaube Der Fischer." "Fruhlingssehnsucht," "Schwanengesang," "Dass sie hier gewesen," "An die Quelle," "Du bist die Ruh'," "Ungeduld," by Schubert; "Dichterliebe," "Er ist's," "Die Lotusblume," "Er der herrlichste von allen," "Schneeglockleln," by Schumann; "Er liebt sich so lieblichim Lenze," "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," "Das Madchen Spricht," "Vorschneller Schwur," by Brahms, are among the songs on the program. The recital will be given on Monday afternoon, October 31, in Symphony Hall, and will be her only Boston appearance.

* * *

The first concert of the Apollo Club will be given in Symphony Hall on November 9. The public will be admitted as well as the regular subscribers. The baritone, Amato, who has already been heard in Boston will be the soloist. Mr. Amato is a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

HERALD, BOSTON, OCTOBER 23, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Beethoven, violin concerto in D major; Strube, comedy overture, "Puck." Mr. Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, will be the soloist, and will play for the first time in America. He has an enviable reputation in Europe.

Mr. Fiedler has decided to repeat Rachmaninoff's second symphony before the impression it made at the second concert has died away. No novelty that has been produced in several years has been received with such genuine enthusiasm, and Mr. Fiedler has had a number of requests to repeat it as soon as possible. Therefore, he puts it as the leading number on the fifth program, Nov. 4-5. The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." Miss Geraldine Farrar will sing airs by Isouard and Mozart. This will be her sole appearance this season with the Symphony orchestra in Boston.

BOSTON GLOBE OCTOBER 23, 1910.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Symphony program this week comprises Brahms' symphony No. 3, the Beethoven concerto for violin, and Gustav Strube's comedy overture, "Puck." The soloist will be Mr Anton Witek, who will make his debut here in that capacity. It had been expected that Mr Witek would appear later in the season, but the death of Mr Gilibert necessitated some changes in the schedule.

On his fifth program Mr Fiedler will place the Rachmaninoff symphony, which created so favorable an impression at the second rehearsal and concert. He has had many requests for a speedy repetition of the work and it is in response to these that he will play it, Nov 4 and 5. The soloist at the fifth concert will be Miss Geraldine Farrar.

Will Boston Have Two Symphony Orchestras?

The city's musical growth and traditions. Two sides of the orchestral question discussed.

THAT idea would have appeared to me preposterous once," said Mr. Fengate. "But we are going ahead so fast musically in Boston that we may soon be ready, as you say, for two symphony orchestras.

"I am not one of those who read the census of 1910 and then go right on discussing our civic affairs as if Boston were just the same size it was 10 years ago.

"This idea of yours reminds me of one which a young man, who must have been in college, like yourself—he could not at any rate have been long out of it—once brought to my attention because he knew I was interested in education and music.

"He asked me to encourage a movement for making harmony and counterpoint and musical history subjects of study in public schools.

"I did not see how I could help him much, but I listened to what he had to say.

"That was a dozen years ago, and now I understand that the thing he proposed has become a part of the routine of many progressive high schools.

"Some of the arguments with which he supported his plan did not appeal to me.

"He contended that there was no surer way to give an impulse to the creative spirit in American music than to set public school pupils a-composing.

"I could not follow him there, for I do not think that our art problems are to be solved through educational formulas.

"But the young man, notwithstanding flaws in his reasoning, had a good idea. And you may have a good one.

"I assume that you are not asking me to give up all the musical interests I now have so that I may devote myself to giving your idea a practical test.

"I have thought before now when some one proposed a new civic undertaking that it meant an extra load of responsibility.

"I felt that way when the scheme for a permanent opera company was first set on foot here.

"But I find that a good idea takes care of itself and gains plenty of supporters.

"The census man can probably explain why."

"I lose my bearings every time I walk in this park," said the Sophomore. "But nothing can keep me away from the sunset view here when I am in town at the right time for it."

"The genius of the men who planned the original city got hold of the landscape artists who laid out these walks and roads," returned Mr. Fengate. "However, we are straying from the subject you introduced. Have you figured it out that there is room in Boston for another Symphony orchestra?"

"No, I cannot say that; but it stands to reason, I think, that Bostonians would know how to appreciate a greater variety of interpretation than one orchestra can give them.

"Where can they go now when they want to hear Wagner or Mozart?"

"Well, Wagner was played here a good deal a few years ago, you know; and I think most people are contented to let him be superseded for a while by new composers.

"Perhaps a second orchestra could revive interest in him.

"And as for the old masters they get a reasonable amount of attention, I think, from our present orchestra.

"That paradox, 'Forward to Mozart,' which is current in Germany just now does not impress me much, because the men who praise Mozart the highest are those who at heart are chiefly interested in the colossal modern symphony.

"But do you think," persisted the Sophomore, "that one orchestra can acquit itself equally well in all fields of interpretation? And are not the classic masters worth presenting often and well?"

"It would be progressing backwards to have a second orchestra specializing on music which the present orchestra has exploited thoroughly in past years," was the reply.

"And you will find when you observe a new orchestral movement starting in the neighborhood of an established body of musicians that radically modern music is its propaganda.

"If another symphony orchestra were to try for recognition in Boston it would base its hopes on the production of novelties that cannot find a place on our present programs."

"What are you going to do, Mr. Fengate, with the increasing number of expert instrumental performers in the city?

"Are you going to keep men playing overtures and incidental music and accompaniments to cantatas who ought to bestir themselves in the symphony?

"And what are you going to do with that overflow of the musical public which cannot get accommodated at the symphony concerts now provided?"

"Oh, I admit that some day we must have a second organization devoted to symphony playing.

"The census man again convinces me on that point.

"But I have sometimes noticed, or thought I noticed, that cities with two or more symphony orchestras have none at all.

"It has always been our idea in Boston that we held the lead of the country in symphonic music because of the performance of our orchestra.

"I could not help thinking when I heard Mr. Toscanini in opera last winter that competent instrumentalists can be found when you have a great conductor for them.

"Yes, give us two orchestras, if you believe we must have them. But do not think of anything but a leader of first class abilities for your new one."

BOSTONTRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 25, 1910

News of Music

A YOUNG musician out of the Middle West who chanced to go to the Symphony Concert last Saturday has written to a friend some frankly interesting impressions of it. They go: "The programme was just to my liking. You know my acquaintance with music is pretty limited and it is the classical, 'pre-Reformation' programme that is the special occasion to me. Bach never sounded more powerful and inevitable to me than he did tonight, with fifty or more violins pounding him out. And I was tickled to notice that the orchestra did just what my little orchestra used to do for me—'sawed' on the retard of the final cadence. The symphony was one I had not heard; I have the third and fifth still ahead of me. I confess I was bored as I ever can be with Beethoven, except toward the end of the Finale, when he seems to wake up to previsions of the fifth, and in a few of the divine parts of the Larghetto. I couldn't get a line on the Scriabin piece in one hearing. But you know my weakness for loud noise and plenty of it, and the whole idea of five trumpets, eight horns, bass tuba, bass drum and trombones, reënforced by triangle and celesta, tickled me. I counted just three triads in the piece, and two of those altered ones, and I couldn't help wondering what Haydn would have said. I was also intensely curious to know what the composer was thinking of in his ecstasies—whether it was what Bernard Shaw says the prelude to 'Tristan' is. But at any rate, I have a profound respect for anything a Russian does, and they all seem so intensely in earnest about it that I think we ought never to condemn except on a third hearing. I fancy that when I get on to his idiom (since we must use the term) I shall find him very wonderful, though I must say that I don't think he always knows just what he is about. Sibelius seems to me one of the few great moderns. In point of 'national' flavor, he has Grieg beaten on his own ground, and in structural control and clear-headedness I think it is not too much to place him with Strauss. Of course, I say this after hearing only two of his things, but I don't believe he could write those two without being a master of the very first rank. The piece this evening, while disconcertingly reminiscent of 'Oh! Promise Me,' was as inspiring as 'Les Préludes' and far less theatric. Is it a sign of degeneracy or especial youthfulness that I can concentrate attention on the modern stuff so much more easily than I can on Schumann or Mozart or Bach?"

BOSTONADVERTISER, OCTOBER 26, 1910

WITEK'S FAMOUS VIOLIN.

Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the Symphony orchestra, who will make his debut on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week as soloist, playing the Beethoven concerto, is the possessor of one of the finest violins in this country. It is a genuine Stradivarius of the best period and is valued at several thousand dollars. Those who have heard it say that it is one of the most remarkable instruments that has ever been brought over to Boston.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 26, 1910

When the Symphony Orchestra departs on Nov. 6 for its first journey of the season to New York and the other cities to the southward that it visits monthly, Mr. Fiedler will make Mr. Rachmaninoff's new symphony the chief item of his programmes. New York has already heard it, but in the very imperfect performance of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, while Mr. Rachmaninoff himself led it a year ago at two concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Even under his leading the band gave the music no such puissant and golden eloquence as does ours.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 27, 1910

In Germany and in New York, if not in Boston, Mr. Fiedler has attained to the glory of the picture post-card. A German publisher of such trifles has added one of the conductor to a series of musicians, and it may be seen and bought in the music shops in New York that import them. It bears the head and shoulders of the conductor and represents him as he was two years ago rather than as he is now. The hair is more bristling; the eyes behind the spectacles more fiery; the whole expression more suggestive of energy barely held in leash. The Fiedler of 1910 is surer of his power and his place as a conductor and his face has turned calmer.

Henry Hadley seems about to play the part of the wandering composer-conductor on the limited American stage. For a few weeks next month, he will forsake his own orchestra in Seattle, proceed first to Chicago to conduct in his new symphony with the Thomas Orchestra, and then to New York to do likewise at the Damrosch concerts. The symphony is likely to be played in Boston, but hardly with Mr. Hadley conducting.

BOSTON JOURNAL OCTOBER 29, 1910.

OVATION FOR WITEK ON AMERICAN DEBUT

Playing of Beethoven Concerto in D Major Arouses Enthusiasm.

Concert Master Witek of the Symphony Orchestra made his American debut at yesterday's concert and aroused the biggest enthusiasm seen so far this season. He chose the Beethoven concerto in D major, which the Bonn genius wrote for Franz Clement, who played it first in Vienna in 1806; and what was said of Clement at the time applies particularly well to Witek. The same sterling art, elegance of style and brilliancy of technic which distinguished Clement likewise distinguish Witek. Such highly polished violin playing—such a graceful manner and such an exquisite tone—has not been heard here since Sarasate's day. The enthusiasm started promptly with the first movement, after a cadenza performed with sparkling skill, and at the end of the concerto the new concert master was recalled several times. No premier plyer of the orchestra has ever made a more successful debut.

With this performance Mr. Witek confirmed the excellent reputation which he has enjoyed abroad for the last fifteen years. He has not the "grand style," but nevertheless his playing has power as well as beauty. So far as technical qualities are concerned, he is evidently an absolute master of his instrument. His precision is well-nigh perfect. His tone, though not very large, is substantial. There is a delicacy about Mr. Witek's art which reveals the virtuouso who is never robustious and who will never rear and rage at the expense of the composer. Without doubt the Beethoven concerto is a particularly happy medium for the display of the concert master's talent. It demands good taste, shining skill, a sentiment tender yet virile. These demands Mr. Witek met admirably. He richly deserved the enthusiasm that followed his performance.

Brahms' third symphony showed the orchestra at its best and Mr. Fiedler then came in for his share of the day's honors. Mr. Strube's comedy overture, which was first heard last March, closed the program. The andante from Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" was played at the beginning in memory of Julia Ward Howe.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY GAZETTE

CALENDAR NOTES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts

Thursday evenings, November 17, December 15, 1910, January 19, February 9, March 2, March 30, and April 27, 1911.

BOSTON GLOBE OCTOBER 29, 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Anton Witek Makes Debut in America as Soloist.

Gives Memorable Performance of Beethoven Concerto.

Anton Witek, the new concert master of the Boston symphony orchestra, made his first appearance in America as soloist at the fourth public rehearsal yesterday afternoon. He played the Beethoven concerto.

The orchestra played the third symphony of Brahms, Strube's comedy overture "Puck," and for a preface to the program the slow movement from Shubert's "Unfinished" symphony, as a memorial to Julia Ward Howe. It was a fitting tribute, sympathetically tendered.

It is not common that a good ensemble player is a good soloist, that a violinist who excels in the measured routine of the concert master's chair can also retain and combine individuality, mastery and plasticity of style as a solo performer. Mr Witek disclosed himself yesterday as such an artist. He came before his audience with quiet command. He stood at ease and awaited his entrance, not with the air of the virtuoso, impatient to display his prowess, but with the calmness and poise of true authority.

His playing will be memorable to all who heard him. There are those who approach Beethoven inspired with a vision of a just and austere master. Seldom does an interpreter of him remember that tenderness, as well as virility and true majesty, are his attributes.

Subtle Yet Potent Spell.

Such was the heart of Mr Witek's playing. As he progressed, external things of the moment, the seated throng, the lights, the men of the orchestra, the obvious in any and all its guises, ebbed away and the hearer was conscious of a great presence, not of performer or of instrument, but of the master for whom both were but a mouthpiece.

The player yesterday was carried far up into realms with Beethoven alone. Whether his hearers realized it or no, they too communed. There was throughout the hall an intangible, subtle yet potent spell.

It was not merely the sign of the artist's ability to dominate his hearers—and he has personality—or to thrill them with the sensuous beauty of the music. It was the token of his power to recreate the individuality, the soul which spoke in and through it.

To convey to those not present something of the potency, the beauty and the repose of this man's playing is not easy. To say his audience worshipped Beethoven reverently is not blasphemous; neither is it exaggeration. This was the end accomplished.

What matter then how it was achieved, whether Mr Witek was skilful in the manipulation of his bow, the dexterity of his fingers or the production of a large tone. As a matter of fact his tone is small, surprisingly small, but of wondrous sweetness, and with great power of penetration.

Technic begged no favors of interpretation yesterday. Embellishment in all its violinistic guises was but the sign for volubility, for the nicest precision and for a rare elegance of style.

His songful phrases—and how they sang— were the essence of purity, balance and exquisite architecture. Memorable will be the ethereal soft measures following the cadenza of the first movement. Mr Witek's debut is an event in the history of the orchestra. He was eagerly applauded and many times recalled.

Eroica Symphony.

Brahms began his "Eroica" symphony heroically in the opening figure of the violins, which leap down from aloft with a shaft of light, yesterday too deliberate in tempo. Then the poet gives way to the pedant. The slow movement is as a wise man speaking in platitudes.

The mildly elegiac plaint of the third breathes but little of the romanticism which gave birth to the elegy in literature. The finale strikes fire.

Mr Strube was deservedly called to acknowledge applause for his fantastic medley of capers, the "Puck" overture.

Next week the second symphony of Rachmaninoff will be repeated by request. Geraldine Farrar, the soloist, will sing an unfamiliar air by Mozart and an air from the equally unfamiliar "Jeannot et Colin," an opera by Nicolo of Malta. The other orchestral numbers will be the Chaconne and Rigadon by Monsigny and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

CONSERVATIVE PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ANTON WITEK'S DEBUT HERE AS A SOLOIST

Much to Commend Is His Intonation and Phrasing in Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms. Third Symphony.
Beethoven. Violin concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Anton Witek.
Strube. Comedy overture, "Puck."

To this was added the andante from Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," played in honor of the memory of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, at the beginning of the concert. Naturally this commemorative piece was "hors concours," and not intended for critical review. Anyone familiar with our orchestra can imagine how nobly the old themes were poured forth. It was at first intended to give Handel's "Largo" which is not funereal music in any sense, for its words are simply—"How lovely is the shade of this plane tree!" with a few horticultural additions. The Schubert movement is not funereal either, but as every auditor thought of the noble wife of a still nobler husband while it was being played, it served its proper purpose. Since Julia Ward Howe and music are mentioned, a historical fact may here be added. Not one soldier in a thousand ever sang the words of her great Battle-hymn of the Republic; they all used to sing the words of "John Brown's Body," to "Glory Hallelujah" and declined the greater poem.

We have always maintained that one school of music does not push aside another, but we wonder if anyone mentally compared the fortissimo "ecstacy" of the preceding concert, with the pure symmetry, melody, and intelligibility of this one! Brahms's third symphony is the clearest and most unified work of his four works in this form. Yet in orchestration he is a mere child compared with Scriabine, to say nothing of Strauss. Nowadays we are coming to mistake the outer dress of an orchestral work for its body and soul and look no deeper than the splendors of scoring. There were no such splendors here. A few beautiful violin or violoncello melodies, some exquisite horn passages, some sweet clarinette and oboe themes,—that was about all that one would remember of the orchestration. But the content of the work, that was another story! Calm, serene, well-contrasted, logical, with development of figures that did not become pedantic or vague in a single measure,—one could exclaim as Beethoven did about Handel—"Das ist das Wahre!"

The symphony has the merit of growing better constantly as it progresses. Possibly its second movement is a trifle too naive and simple, but its two last movements are gems forever, and they were read and played in a manner that evidenced that the conductor and the orchestra loved them.

If Messrs.—(let us leave the names to the reader's imagination) would only learn from such a work that a symphony may be noble without being an hour and a quarter in length, that it can be lofty without using gongs, triangles, wind machines, thunder machines, heckelphones, oboe d'amore or bass drums!

Yet the way in which the chief theme was given in the third movement. first by violoncellos, then by violins, then by woodwind, and later by horns, left nothing to be desired. Orchestral inflation would have ruined its Parthenon-like simplicity.

In the finale too, the trombones with their chorale-like theme made as impressive an effect as any of the twenty-five-lined scores of the later orchestral manipulators. Only trombones and contrabassoon are added in this work to the regular classical orchestra. Very effective also were the horns and violoncellos united in the subordinate theme of the finale, a good contrast to the broader work of the trombones. The horns played perfectly in their important themes.

Mr. Fiedler gave the repeat of the exposition, in the first movement which we think is a wise proceeding, for one gets the scheme of a well developed movement much better if one hears the themes twice.

Mr. Anton Witek is the second great concertmeister of our orchestra to make his debut as a soloist with Beethoven's Violin Concerto. When, away back in the paleozoic age, Mr. Kneisel appeared as an audacious youth who had ventured to replace the older Bernhard Listemann, he threw down the gauntlet with this concerto, and in that trial by combat, he routed all his adversaries. Mr. Witek is another young man who replaces a veteran,—Prof. Willy Hess,—and he gave the same gage of battle, with the same result. Possibly we may use the motto of the prize ring in our symphonic circle also—"Youth will be served!"

There is something so thoroughly combative in the first movement of this concerto that it suits well for such a crucial purpose, almost defiant. Mr. Witek soon proved that he was able to fill the position of his fiery predecessor without rattling round in it. But he showed a tendency to over-refinement. One did not get the robust Beethoven of Ysaye or Kreisler. Nervousness was not apparent in any part of the work, although a debutant has a good right to become fidgetty during the long Tutti of the beginning, while waiting for his time to enter with solo work. In the Larghetto there were pianissimo effects given that must have been inaudible in the distant parts of the large hall. The cadenzas were founded upon the Joachim set, although digressing from these once or twice. In intonation and phrasing there was much to commend, although, as above intimated, we would have preferred a more masculine reading of some parts of the work. That the audience was delighted was abundantly proved by four recalls, which at a matinee is an unusual degree of enthusiasm.

We consider Mr. Strube's "Puck" overture one of the best of his works. He does not here soar after the infinite, does not use an overwhelming orchestra, does not strive after original complexities, does not discard melody. Add to this that he gives clear figures and develops them logically, and that he keeps to the good old road of sonata-allegro form and it will be seen that he has done those things that he ought to have done and has left undone those things that he ought not to have done and there is considerable health in him.

There is humor and piquancy in the composition and it formed a good foil to the fire of Beethoven and the serenity of Brahms, nor was it at all shrivelled up by the great company in which it found itself. Its vivid contrasts made an excellent effect, and the jollity of some of its themes, and their striking rhythms, were bound to win favor with the connoisseur. Somehow the work sounds American; it might readily fraternize with Chadwick's "Vagrom Ballad." It is a thoroughly enjoyable composition. In spite of the fact that it came last in a moderately long concert, the composer was given a tribute by the public that was richly deserved.

The first piano recital of importance of the season will be that to be given by Josef Hofmann in Symphony hall on the afternoon of Nov. 14. It is several years since Hofmann was last heard here in recital and in that time he has secured a place in the favor of the musical public of this country, which reminds one of the popularity enjoyed when he was here as a child.

The line of the faithful which gathers weekly in front of Symphony hall to get the 25 cent "rush" seats will form early enough next Friday morning, for that afternoon Geraldine Farrar is to be the soloist.

Miss Farrar, with her usual enterprise and ingenuity, will sing two pieces, neither of which in all human probability has been heard in Boston, and the chances are that neither of them has ever appeared on a programme in this country.

In response to a very general desire, Mr. Fiedler will, at this concert, repeat the Rachmaninoff Symphony.

In many respects the most interesting musical events of the season which have just opened will be the three concerts to be given by the Cecilia society and the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Max Fiedler as the conductor. The alliance brought about last spring between these two societies is one of the most important moves that has been made in this city for many years.

Plans for the three concerts this winter have been quite completed. The dates for these are Dec. 1, Feb. 16 and April 14.

TIMES, PAWTUCKET, R. I
OCTOBER 26, 1910.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Gives Delightful Entertainment With Mme. Fremstad As Soloist.

The first appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall this season was greeted by an immense outpouring of music lovers from throughout the state. The hall was practically filled when Conductor Max Fiedler appeared and enthusiasm was evident throughout the evening. A feature of the programme was the appearance of Madame Olive Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York.

It was a Schumann evening, although there were selections also from Gluck, Strauss and Wagner. On the programme it was announced that the event was in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann, and the symphony was his E-Flat Major, No. 3, Rheinish, op. 97.

The programme follows:

Overture to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115 .....Schumann
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rheinish," op. 97.....Schumann
Aria, "Enfin, il est dans ma puissance," from "Armide".....Gluck
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Nenau), op. 20.....Richard Strauss
Prelude and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

The symphony orchestra will give five concerts in Providence during this season. The next will be on Nov. 22.

ANTON WITEK AS SOLOIST

Concert Master's Debut in New Role at Symphony Orchestra's Rehearsal.

JULIA WARD HOWE TRIBUTE

Beethoven's Violin Concerto Finely Played; Performance Full of Artistic Spirit.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fourth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, played as a solo violinist for the first time in this country. The program was as follows:

Andante con moto from the "Unfinished" Symphony.....Schubert
Symphony No. 3, F major.....Brahms
Concerto in D major for violin.....Beethoven
Comedy overture. "Puck".....Strube

The movement from Schubert's symphony was prefixed, in memory of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, to the program originally announced. The choice was perhaps an unusual one, but the music of Schubert by reason of its gentle melancholy, tender beauty and ineffable grace seemed to many singularly appropriate. A heroic funeral march is a fitting tribute to a distinguished warrior or statesman. Mrs. Howe wrote her own heroic hymn. Yesterday there was no occasion for wild, tempestuous lamentation, for the expression of hopeless grief. The music of Schubert inspired a meditative mood and the thought of the sweetness and light of the well-rounded life. And this music, while it is not effeminate, has what might be called a womanly quality. It is to be regretted that some at the end of the movement broke out with incongruous applause.

In his third symphony Brahms wrote with a freedom that is missed in his first, although some insist that the first is the greatest of the four. Admirable as is the structure of the one in C minor, the composer was too conscious of Beethoven's mighty shade. Possibly Brahms could not escape from the prophecy of Schumann. Always ready to take himself seriously—and he was constitutionally serious—he felt that he must show himself to be the Messiah announced by Schumann. As Beethoven was the last of the great symphonic writers, Brahms could not fall below the level of the Ninth, and so in the music of the first we see Brahms laboring to maintain a lofty and commanding position.

Now in the third symphony Brahms wrote with greater spontaneity. His workmanship was as excellent as before—witness the use of the first three notes, the upper voice of the introductory chords in later passages; but the workmanship is not so obvious; it never stands between the musical thought and the hearer; it does not take the place of musical thought. And in this symphony there is a wealth of musical ideas which are musically employed.

From the superb arrogance of the opening, the arrogance of a master conscious of his strength and exulting in it, to the last pages of the finale, in which, as Mr. Apthorp said felicitously, "the ghost" of the first theme steals away in the strings, the symphony is for the most part a blend of strength and beauty. The old reproach of crabbedness cannot here justly be brought against the composer. Here are no cryptic measures.

It was said of the second symphony that in it Brahms showed too plainly his acquaintance with Mendelssohn, for there are always hunters after reminiscences who shut their ears to everything except a fancied resemblance. It seems hardly possible that Brahms was accused of taking an idea for his second movement from the "Prayer" in Herold's "Zampa." The resemblance is slight and momentary. It might with more justice be said that in the first movement there is a fleeting recollection of the song of the sirens in Wagner's Venusberg.

Mr. Witek gave an uncommonly fine performance of Beethoven's concerto That he should show rare technical proficiency was expected, for his reputation had preceded him; but the performance was remarkable for higher qualities. Mr. Witek played Beethoven's music so that it seemed to flow directly from the soul of the composer. There was no obsequious self-effacement. It was impossible not to recognize the ability of the violinist, but the first thought was of the music itself, and not of the music as played by Mr. Witek or by this one or that one of his predecessors. He played with serene, not indifferent, composure, with respect for Beethoven and the audience. The virtuoso was forgotten in the artist.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Rachmainoff Symphony No. 2 (repeated by request); Isouard, air from "Jeannot and Colin" (Miss Geraldine Farrar); Monsigny, Chaconne and Rigadon from "Aline, Queen of Golconda" (Miss Farrar); Beethoven, overture to "Egmont."

Senator Lodge's Speech.

Senator Lodge said:

The second movement is in itself the least interesting of the four. It loses when the sentiment is long drawn out by reason of too slow a pace. Yesterday there were moments when the pace seemed slow. With this exception the reading and the orchestral performance gave great pleasure. The tone was sonorous in fortissimo passages, and the brass was not forced as is sometimes the case. There was a nice sense of tonal proportion and tonal contrasts, and there was the elasticity that allowed full play of moods. Brahms in this symphony is often a Hungarian. The Sar in Paris who wrote curiously about music and could not be patient at the name of Brahms likened his muse to a gypsy dancing in corsets. Yesterday this gypsy was free and unconfined.

Mr. Strube's overture was performed here for the first time last spring. It is a genial fanciful composition, delightfully scored. In many respects it is the most human of his works. Mr. Strube's talent is indisputable and it has long been recognized. In some of his compositions this talent is purely a cerebral effort. In the overture the fancy is something more than harmonic and orchestral cleverness. Here the themes have defined charm and musical interest lies beneath the handsome orchestral dress. Nor is there ever the suspicion of deliberate experiments with instruments.

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 29, 1910

4th Symphony Rehearsal

By Olin Downes

Anton Witek, the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist in America yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, on the occasion of the fourth public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra.

In memory of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, the concert was prefaced by the second movement of Schubert's unfinished symphony, and a finer epitaph could not be imagined. There was, of course, no applause.

Mr. Witek played the Beethoven concerto, and played all around it. He has more virtuosity, by far, than the concerto requires. His instrument was a Stradivarius, a very sensitive instrument, which the violinist played with appreciation of its rare qualities, and, in contrast to some other virtuosity, without attacking the more formidable passages as though it were a wood-chopping.

Mr. Witek is, then, a past master of his instrument, and he quickly showed his perfect mental grasp and mastery of the concerto. There was no such thing as a moment of risk or uncertainty. Authority personified stood before us on the stage, and the general effect was maddening. The man knew exactly what he was going to do, and there was, unfortunately, nothing which prevented his doing it. We have never heard a concerto so easily played; we have rarely listened with less excitement to a performance.

As a virtuoso and a musician Mr. Witek triumphed—and we would have enjoyed, for a change, a few bars by the painfully immature Francis Macmillen. Mr. Witek's tempi were admirably chosen, his tone was almost invariably clear, singing, rich or brilliant as the case might be, refined and rather small than large. He showed a fine sense of values. He played with elasticity, but without obtruding himself unduly, or in any case materially altering the rhythmic pace. He is certainly an efficient concertmeister and a musician of parts. He played, above all, not as if the orchestra, a large, formidable, inexorable body of instruments, were forcing him on but as if, rather, he held this orchestra in the palm of his hand. Mr. Witek was well received when he came on the stage, and cordially recalled when he had finished playing. But oh! to have sensed, in his playing, the nervous thrill and quiver that the artist with a message to give experiences as he steps before his audience.

In a performance of much interest Mr. Fiedler was most fortunate in the first and last movements. The middle portions could have had, perhaps, more of the poetic and meditative quality of the Brahms of the intermezz. for piano—assuredly the same Brahms who penned the symphony. Mr. Strube's overture grows better with repeated hearings. Few musicians of this city, indeed, have such a technic of composition, such a thorough knowledge and instinct for the effects of instruments, and such artistic sensibility when it comes to expressing themselves. There is genuine humor in this overture, humor which seems as characteristic of the instruments themselves as of the music. It is a pleasure, indeed, to feel the practised hand in each measure of such a piece.

TIMES, PAWTUCKET, R. I
OCTOBER 25, 1910.

Symphony Orchestra Tonight.

Tonight brings to Infantry Hall the first of the five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which will be given in Providence during the coming season. The management reports that the subscription far exceeds anything of the kind the orchestra has ever had in Providence and tonight it is fairly certain that every seat in the house will be sold, not only because of the great favor that has been won here in the past by the orchestra, but Providence is not willing to let go by the opportunity to hear an artist like Madame Olive Fremstad, who is the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York.

The programme is as follows:

Overture to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115, Schumann; Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97, Schumann; Aria, "Enfin Il est dans ma puissance" from "Armide," Gluck; Tone Poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, Richard Strauss; Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; soloist, Madame Olive Fremstad.

From ..... Providence Journal
Address .....
Date .....

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Opening Event of Providence Musical Season Tuesday Evening.

With the largest subscription the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had in this city and with a house that is practically sold out, the first concert of the season of 1910-1911, which will be given in Infantry Hall on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 25, promises to be a becomingly brilliant affair. The management of the orchestra this year has been exceedingly generous in its allotment of soloists to Providence and at the first concert will appear one of the greatest singers of the world, one, in fact, who may be considered the greatest of living dramatic sopranos—Mme. Olive Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York.

The programme is one in every respect of exceeding interest to all classes of music lovers. Among the centenaries celebrated in 1910 was that of Robert Schumann, a man who played a most important role in the history of music, besides leaving a large number of works for orchestra, piano and voice which made him safely to be classed among the immortals. The tragic end of his career while he was still in the prime of manhood only makes the centenary of his birth more interesting.

Before the cloud settled on his mind Schumann busied himself not only with writing his wonderful music, but with his pen fought for the cause of art and sought to make the path easy for men younger than himself. It was Schumann who first appreciated the genius of Chopin. It was Schumann who announced to the world with the unforgettable words, "Gentlemen, a genius;" that in Brahms a successor to Beethoven had come. The whole history of the man endears him to memory.

At his opening concert in Boston this season Conductor Max Fiedler devoted the entire programme to Schumann in commemoration of the centenary and he has decided to devote the first half of the programme here to the same purpose, playing the overture to "Manfred" and the beautiful "Rhenish" symphony. The other purely orchestral number will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

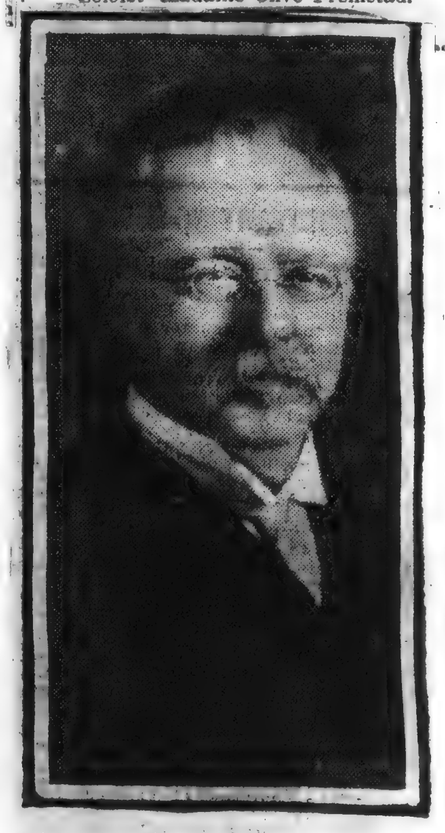
Mme. Olive Fremstad's first number will be the great aria from Gluck's "Armide," entitled "Enfin, il est dans ma puissance." "Armide," which is generally regarded as the masterpiece of Gluck, is to be one of the principal novelties of the Metropolitan season and is to open the season on Monday evening, Nov. 14. Strictly speaking it will be a revival, but as it is to be put on with all the decoration it demands and as few are old enough to have heard it in this country, to all intents and purposes it will be a novelty.

To Mme. Fremstad has been entrusted the name part, that of the wonderful enchantress of the famous fantastic episode in Tasso's great poem, "Jerusalem Delivered." The last number on the programme will be the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tritan und Isolde," and in this Mme. Fremstad will sing the closing song of the great tragedy. It is doubtful whether this has ever been heard with voice in Providence and to those who have never heard it it will be a revelation, the more so as Mme. Fremstad today is generally considered the greatest of Isoldes.

The programme in order is as follows:

I. Schumann—Overture to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115.
II. Schumann—Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3, "Rhenish," op. 97.
  I. Lebhaft.
  II. Sehr massig.
  III. Nicht schnell.
  IV. Feierlich.
  V. Lebhaft.
III. Gluck—Aria, "Enfin, il est dans ma puissance," from "Armide."
IV. Richard Strauss—Tone Poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), op. 20.
V. Wagner—Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tritan und Isolde."

Soloist—Madame Olive Fremstad.



MAX FIEDLER.
Conductor of Symphony Orchestra, Which Opens its Providence Season Tuesday Evening at Infantry Hall.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TUESDAY

With the largest subscription the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, has ever had in this city, and with a house that is practically sold out, the first concert of the season of 1910-1911, which will be given in Infantry hall on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 25, promises to be a becomingly brilliant affair. The management of the orchestra this year has been exceedingly generous in its allotment of soloists to Providence, and at the first concert will appear one of the greatest singers of the world, one, in fact, who may be considered the greatest of living dramatic sopranos, Madame Olive Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera company of New York.

The program is one in every respect of exceeding interest to all classes of music lovers. Among the centenaries celebrated in 1910 was that of Robert Schumann, a man who played a most important role in the history of music besides leaving a large number of works for orchestra, piano and voice which made him safely to be classed among the immortals. The tragic end o. his career while he was still in the prime of manhood only makes the centenary of his birth more interesting. Before the cloud settled on his mind Schumann busied himself not only with writing his wonderful music, but with his pen fought for the cause of art and sought to make the path easy for men younger than himself. It was Schumann who firt appreciated the genius of Chopin. It was Schumann who announced to the world with the unforgettable words, "Gentlemen, a genius!" that in Brahms a successor to Beethoven had come. The whole history of the man endears him to memory.

At his opening concert in Boston this season Mr. Fiedler devoted the entire program to Schumann in commemoration of the centenary, and he has decided to devote the first half of the program here to the same purpose, playing the overture to "Manfred", and the beautiful "Rhenish" symphony.

The other purely orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

Madame Olive Fremstad's first number will be the great aria from Gluck's "Armide," entitled, "Enfin, Il Est Dans Ma Puissance." "Armide," which is generally regarded as the masterpiece of Gluck, is to be one of the principal novelties of the Metropolitan season, and is to open the season on Monday evening, Nov. 14. Strictly speaking, it will be a revival, but as it is to be put on with all the decoration it demands, and as few are old enough to have heard it in this country, to all intents and purposes it will be a novelty. To Madame Fremstad has been entrusted the name part, that of the wonderful enchantress of the famous fantastic episode in Tasso's great poem, "Jerusalem Delivered." The last number on the program will be the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," and in this Madame Fremstad will sing the closing song of the great tragedy. It is doubtful whether this has ever been heard with voice in Providence, and to those who have never heard it, it will be a revelation. The more so as Madame Fremstad, today is generally considered the greatest of Isoldes.

The program in order is as follows:

I. Schumann. Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 113.
II. Schumann. Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
  I. Lebhaft.
  II. Sehr massig.
  III. Nicht schnell.
  IV. Feierlich.
  V. Lebhaft.
III. Gluck. Aria, "Enfin, Il Est Dans Ma Puissance," from "Armide."
IV. Richard Strauss. Tone poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.
V. Wagner. Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Soloist, Madame Olive Fremstad.

From SUN
Address New York City.
Date 8

In Boston.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: Yesterday morning I approached the bureau of information in the South Station here, desiring some details of the building. As I did so I steeled myself against the sirocco of words that we New Yorkers are accustomed to under such conditions. With a hardened heart I propounded my question and stood ready for the lyddite blast, until I heard a pleasant voice reply: "Yes, sir, it's very easy. Turn into the middle doorway on your left and the elevator will take you to your destination, sir."

Yesterday afternoon I went to a Boston Symphony concert. At the end of the Rachmaninoff symphony and just before the commencement of the Goldmark violin concerto a middle aged lady next to me, who was suffering from a slight cold, said to those within easy hearing: "If my cough annoys you, I will leave the hall." Yet forty minutes later I caught another glimpse of the same amiable person. She was on the periphery of a revolving, flying wedge composed of twoscore other middle aged ladies, prodding and trampling her way into a close packed trolley car, and rosy memories of the gladdest, maddest rush hours of old Manhattan came upon me.

In passing, be it noted that before the final number on the programme, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," was half finished, most of the women began to clap their hats on and to rustle and preen. This within the sanctity of Symphony Hall.

NEW YORKER.

BOSTON, October 13.

884

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From .....
Address ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date ..... OCT 16 1910

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Soloists of the Five Events to be Held Here This Season.

The general sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, to-morrow morning. It is expected that the subscription this year will be very large if only because of the really astonishing list of soloists that the management has announced. Never has the Boston Symphony given Providence anything like it and a comparison of these soloists with those which the orchestra is offering to cities like New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore shows that the average is higher, or as high for Providence as it is for any of those cities.

As already announced, there will be five concerts this year instead of four as last. These will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Jan. 3, Feb. 14 and April 4. At the first concert the soloist will be Mme. Olive Fremstad, principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York.

At the second concert the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist will be the soloist at the third concert while at the fourth the soloist will be Yolande Mero, the Hungarian pianist. To bring the series to a close as brilliant as the beginning, the management has engaged for the last concert Mme. Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

THE SOLOISTS.

Mme. Fremstad assumes all the great dramatic roles at the Metropolitan—"Isolde," the "Brunnhilde," "Sieglinde," "Kundry" and she created Richard Strauss's "Salome" in America. This year she is to open the Metropolitan Opera season with "Armide" in Gluck's famous opera of the same name, the revival of which will be one of the features of the operatic season in New York. A beautiful woman of enormous talent and a beautiful voice, Mme. Fremstad has no rival to-day in her chosen field of music, the world over.

Josef Hofmann, who will be heard in Providence for the first time in several years, has fulfilled the promise of his wonderful youth and put to shame all his detractors who prophesied in years past that he would grow into just a mediocrity. He and Paderewski to-day stand alone as the greatest pianists of our time.

Mischa Elman needs no introduction to the Providence public as he has already appeared here with the Symphony Orchestra and likewise in recital. So great has his success been with the orchestra in the past two seasons that he has been reengaged for the coming season for a series of concerts. This is the most eloquent acknowledgment that can be made for his favor with the public.

Yolande Mero, the Hungarian pianist, came to America for the first time last year and made a profound impression upon all those who heard her. Her appearance here in Providence will be her first with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Louise Homer is the greatest of operatic contraltos. This American woman, whose career has been almost entirely confined to the United States both as a student and an artist, reached the summit of her hopes and ambitions last spring when all Paris acclaimed her as the greatest artist of her kind at the performances the Metropolitan Opera Company gave at the Chatelet in Paris. Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, regards himself as most fortunate in being able to present two such great artists as Mme. Fremstad and Mme. Homer.

THE ORCHESTRA LEADERS.

Mr. Fiedler returns again as conductor and the only change of note in the personnel of the orchestra is the substitution of Anton Witek as concert master for Willy Hess. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian, 32 years old, who for the past 16 years has been concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and in that time has made an enviable reputation for himself throughout Europe as a soloist. It is believed that he is fully able to maintain the high traditions of his post.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced last week the names of the soloists for its five Providence concerts. They are as follows: Oct. 25, Olive Fremstad, the dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Nov. 22, Josef Hofmann, ranked as the chief pianist to be in America this season; Jan. 3, Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who is familiar here; Feb. 14, Yolande Mero, a Hungarian pianist, who will make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony at the local concert; April 4, Mme. Louise Homer, the principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

This list, music lovers will agree, is one calculated greatly to enhance interest in the series which, as already noted, is to include one more concert than usual this year. Three of the soloists, Fremstad, Mero and Homer, are new to the city. Mme. Fremstad, who will open the series, has risen rapidly in the musical world, being regarded as one of the greatest interpreters of "Isolde" in the world.

The sale of season tickets will open to-morrow morning at Steinert's music store.

* * *

The assertion is made that Dr. Karl Muck, formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to return two years hence to resume that position. He left in 1908, his contract with the Royal Opera compelling his return to Berlin. That his departure was regretted both by himself and by the management of the orchestra was well known, and the Boston Transcript, commenting on recent developments, says:

"The management was prepared to reengage him as soon as he was free from prior obligations in Germany. It has since been stated that Dr. Muck's contract with the Royal Opera would end in the spring of 1912, and circumstances have lately conspired to disclose the use that he will make of his new freedom. In a word, he will return to Boston and become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, for what dispatches from Berlin call 'a prolonged period.'

"Last June, it will be recalled, Mr. Weingartner offered his resignation as the director of the Imperial Opera at Vienna, the most distinguished post of its kind in the German-speaking world. It was offered promptly to Dr. Muck. Almost as speedily he declined it, saying that he had made engagements which required his return to America for some years.

"The terms of his reply were printed in the German and the French newspapers and repeated freely last summer in Germany by his friends. Bostonians who encountered him in their travels received a like, though more vague, assurance from his own lips, while it was common knowledge, so to say, in the musical circles that the festivals at Munich and Salzburg gathered that Dr. Muck, in the autumn of 1912, would become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again."

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York City.

Date

Konzert-Notizen.

Die Hauptnummer des ersten hiesigen Konzertes des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler am Abend des 10. November in Carnegie Hall ist Rachmaninoff's Zweite Symphonie in E-Moll, welches Werk anläßlich seiner in der verflossenen Woche stattgehabten Erstaufführung in Boston einen ausgesprochenen Erfolg davongetragen hat. Herr Fiedler hat sich für Schumann's „Rheinische" Symphonie als Hauptnummer des ersten Nachmittags-Konzerts der Bostoner am 12. November in Carnegie Hall entschieden.

Als erstes unserer Symphonie-Oechester tritt am Freitag Nachmittag im New Als erstes unserer Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Walter Damsch auf den Plan. Das Programm umfaßt Beethoven's „Eroica", als Novität die englische Rhapsodie „Brigg Fair" von Delius und das von Prof. Felix Berber gespielte Brahms'sche Violin-Konzert.

Herr Alexander Heinemann, der bedeutende deutsche Liedersänger, hat am 9. Oktober in Berlin ein vollständig ausverkauftes und von schmeichelhaftestem Erfolg begleitetes Recital gegeben. Der Sänger trifft am 1. November hier ein und wird sich dem New Yorker Publikum am Abend des 3. November in Mendelssohn Hall vorstellen.

Das hiesige Erstauftreten des böhmischen Violin-Virtuosen Herrn Emanuel Ondricek ist für den Abend des 2. November in Mendelssohn Hall angekündigt.

Herr Loudon Charlton kündigt für den 9. November, 4. Januar und 8. Februar drei Sonaten-Abende der Pianistin Frl. Beebe und des Violinisten Herrn Dethier an.

Am 10. November, Nachmittags, veranstaltet Herr Frances Rogers ein Gesangs-Recital in Mendelssohn Hall.

Ebendaselbst wird sich am Nachmittag des 14. November Herr Ernest Hutcheson in einem Pianoforte-Recital hören lassen.

Kommenden Samstag Nachmittag findet das erste New Yorker Recital des berühmten Pianisten Herr Josef Hofmann statt.

Estab ...rk, 1884

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has practically decided to place on the programme of the first evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, November 10, as his principal number Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E minor. It was played in Boston for the first time a week ago, and it is only fair to say that no novelty that has been played in the last two or three years has aroused so much genuine enthusiasm at both the afternoon and evening concerts in Boston. While he has not yet fully made up his mind, it is probable that the symphony in the afternoon will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

Estab

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony men produced Scriabine's "Le Poème de l'Extase" in Boston yesterday. They come to New York with Rachmaninoff's symphony on Nov. 10.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From PRESS

Address New York City.

Date

NOTES OF MUSIC.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, probably will place on the programme of the first evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, November 10, as his chief number Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E Minor. It was played in Boston for the first time a week ago, and aroused much enthusiasm. While Fiedler has not yet made up his mind, he probably will select for the symphony in the afternoon Schumann's "Rhenish."

Estab ...4

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Flonzaley Quartet were the only two organizations giving concerts in Boston last year whose seasons were financially successful. The Flonzaleys give a concert in Witherspoon Hall on Monday evening, November 14, under the auspices of the Department of Music, University Extension Society.

From ...izen,

Address ...n, N Y

Date

The opening general sale of season tickets for the five Boston Symphony concerts to be given during the coming winter in the Academy of Music, will be on next Friday, Oct. 28, at 4 p. m., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue thereafter at the hours when the ticket offices of the Institute are open. The dates of the concerts, as already announced, are Friday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24.

At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, the distinguished dramatic soprano, who will sing as her first number Saint-Saens' hymn to Pallas Athene, which will be heard in this country for the first time, and for her second number Mendelssohn's now seldom-heard but beautiful aria, "Infelice."

The soloist at the second concert, in December, will be Josef Hofman, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. This will be an unusual treat for lovers of the piano. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the third concert, in January. As he has not yet reached this country he has not signified what he will play. Ferruccio Busoni, who, with Hofmann, will divide this season the pianistic honors in the United States, will be the soloist at the fourth concert, and for the last concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist.

Those who have heard the orchestra this year at its Boston concerts are unanimous in the opinion that never has it sounded more beautiful than it does now. The slight changes that have been made in it seem to have been entirely for the better and the one or two weak spots which the critical ear could have heard last year have been eliminated. Mr. Fiedler has not yet decided on the orchestral numbers he will present at the November concert.

Establ ...84

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has practically decided to place on the programme of the first evening concert in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday, November 10, as his principal number Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2, in E minor. It was played in Boston for the first time a week ago, and it is only fair to say that no novelty that has been played in the last two or three years has aroused so much genuine enthusiasm at both the afternoon and evening concerts in Boston. While he has not yet fully made up his mind, it is probable that the symphony in the afternoon will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn on Friday evening, Nov. 11, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, the soloist, expects to sing a work which will be heard for the first time in this country. It is a hymn to Pallas Athena by Saint-Saens and was written for the musical festival given in the old Roman Theatre in Orange, France, in 1894. Saint-Saens has always been most interested in these outdoor festivals, which have been given from time to time in the ancient Roman Amphitheatre in Provence, and has written several works for performance in them.

Estab ...884

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York City.

Da

MAX FIEDLER, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has practically decided to place on the programme of the first evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, Nov. 10, as his principal number Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E minor. This work was played in Boston for the first time a week ago, and it is said that no novelty that has been played there in the last two or three years has aroused so much genuine enthusiasm with both the afternoon and evening audiences. Though Mr. Fiedler has not yet fully made up his mind, it is probable that the symphony for the Saturday afternoon concert here will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

Es ...1884

From STANDARD UNION,

Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date

The opening general sale of season tickets for the five Boston Symphony concerts to be given during the coming winter in the Academy of Music will be on next Friday, Oct. 28, at 4 P. M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue thereafter at the hours when the ticket offices of the Institute are open. The dates of the concerts, as already announced, are Friday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, tht distinguished dramatic soprano, who will sing as her first number Saint-Saens' Hymn to the Pallas Athene, which will be heard in this country for the first time, and for her second number Mendelssohn's new seldom-heard but beautiful aria, "Infelice." The soloist at the second concert, in December, will be Josef Hofmann, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. This will be an unusual treat for lovers of the piano. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the third concert, in January. As he has not yet reached this country he has not signified that he will play. Ferruccio Busoni, wro, with Hofmann, will divide, this season, the pianistic honors in the United States, will be soloist at the fourth concert, and for the last concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the favorite cellist. Those who have heard the orchestra this year at its Boston concerts are unanimous in the opinion that never has it sounded more gloriously beautiful than it does now. The slight changes that have been made in it seem to have been entirely for the better, and the one or two weak spots which the critical ear could have heard last year have been eliminated. Mr. Fiedler has not yet decided on the orchestral numbers he will present at the November concert.

Estab ...1884

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has practically decided to place on the programme of the first evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, Nov. 10, as his principal number, Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E Minor. It was played in Boston for the first time a week ago, and it is only fair to say that no novelty that has been played in the last two or three years has aroused so much genuine enthusiasm at both the afternoon and evening concerts in Boston. While he has not yet fully made up his mind, it is probable that the Symphony in the afternoon will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

Es ...k, 1884

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has practically decided to place on the programme of the first evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, November 10, as his principal number, Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E Minor. It was played in Boston for the first time a week ago and few, if any, novelties presented in the last two years or so have aroused so much genuine enthusiasm with both the afternoon and evening audiences in Boston.

The Symphony for the first afternoon concert will probably be Schumann's "Rhenish."

Establisl ...

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiedler has it in mind to produce at the first Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, on Nov. 10, Rachmaninoff's symphony No. 2, in E minor, played at the Hub for the first time a week ago.

It is only fair to say that no novelty in two or three years, according to Secretary W. E. Walter, has aroused so much enthusiasm with audiences in Boston.

It is probable that the matinée symphony here will be Schumann's "Rhenish," inspired by the Cathedral of Cologne.

Es ...1884

From EVE. TELEGRAM

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has practically decided to place on the programme of the first evening concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, November 10, as his principal number, Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E-Minor. It was played in Boston for the first time a week ago, and it is only fair to say that no novelty that has been played in the last two or three years has aroused so much genuine enthusiasm with both the afternoon and evening audiences in Boston. It is probable that the symphony for the afternoon concert will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 22 1910

The opening general sale of season tickets for the five Boston Symphony concerts to be given during the coming winter in the Academy of Music will be on next Friday, October 28, at 4 P.M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue thereafter at the hours when the ticket offices of the Institute are open.

The dates of the concerts, as already announced, are Friday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24.

At the first concert the soloist will be Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, the distinguished dramatic soprano, who will sing as her first number Saint-Saens' "Hymn to Pallas Athens," which will be heard in this country for the first time, and for her second number Mendelssohn's now seldom-heard but beautiful aria, "Infelice."

The soloist at the second concert, in December, will be Josef Hofmann, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the third concert, in January. As he has not yet reached this country, he has not signified what he will play. Ferruccio Busoni, who with Hofmann will divide, this season, the pianistic honors in the United States, will be the soloist at the fourth concert, and for the last concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the favorite 'cellist.

From Daily Times, Brooklyn N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 22 1910

The opening general sale of season tickets for the five Boston Symphony concerts to be given during the coming winter in the Academy of Music, will be on next Friday, October 28, at the Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue thereafter at the hours when the ticket offices of the Institute are open. The dates of the concerts, as already announced, are Friday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24. At the first concert the soloist will be Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, the dramatic soprano. The soloist at the second concert, in December, will be Josef Hofmann. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the third concert in January. Ferruccio Busoni will be the soloist at the fourth concert and for the last concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist. Mr. Fiedler has not yet decided on the orchestral numbers he will present at the November concert.

From POST
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Washington during the coming season, which have not been claimed by last year's subscribers, will open at Droop's Music Store, Thirteenth and G streets, Tuesday morning, October 18. As there is a considerable waiting list the prospects are now that the orchestra will have the largest patronage it has had in the five years that it has been coming to Washington under the local management of Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene.

It is a most attractive prospectus that the orchestra issues for this city. The five concerts will be given as usual on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock in the New National Theater. The dates are November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 21. Five soloists are announced. They comprise a soprano, a contralto, a pianist, a violinist, and a cellist, so that these concerts will have the added quality of diversity in their solosits.

The soloist at the first concert will be Miss Margaret Keyes, who in the last few years has come to the front among the American contraltos.

From EVE. STAR
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Washington during the coming season, which have not been claimed by last year's subscribers, will open next Tuesday morning, October 18. The five concerts will be given as usual Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock in the New National Theater. The dates are November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 21. Five soloists are announced. They comprise a soprano, a contralto, a pianist, a violinist and a cellist.

The soloist at the first concert will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto.

From TIMES
Address Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 17 1910

DATES ARE ANNOUNCED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Margaret Keyes and Josef Hofmann Soloists at Early Concerts.

SERIES TO OPEN ON NOVEMBER 8

Fiedler Still Leads Organization and Personnel Is Practically Unchanged.

Dates have been announced for the five Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given on Tuesday afternoons at the National Theater.

The series will open on November 8, and the other concerts will be given on December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 21.

The soloist at the first concert will be Miss Margaret Keyes, who in the last few years has come to the front among American contraltos. She made her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra two seasons ago in Philadelphia, when at the eleventh hour she was called on to replace Madame Schumann-Heink.

In December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, one of the most popular living pianists. Hofmann today has a following in the United States second only to Paderewski.

Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist at the January concert. For the past two years he has appeared here at concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In February the patrons of the orchestra will hear as solist Alwin Schroeder, who is once more a member of the orchestra at the head of the 'cellists, where he divides the solo work with Heinrich Warnke.

The soloists at the final concert will be Madame Jeanne Jonelli, who has given up the opera stage for concert work, and is in continual demand during the season here.

Max Fiedler is the conductor of the orchestra this year, and the orchestra itself returns substantially unchanged as to its rank and file.

JOSEF HOFMANN,
Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From HERALD
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Far and away the largest subscription the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had in Washington is that which is now in progress for the series of five concerts which will be given in the New National Theater during the coming winter. Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, who has charge of the season sale here, reports that if the New National Theater had twenty boxes she could not have filled all the orders that she has for them. Practically all the cheaper seats are gone, and very few of the high priced seats remain unsold. The first concert, on Tuesday afternoon, November 8, brings as soloist Miss Margaret Keyes, the distinguished contralto, who will sing as her numbers Penelope's "Lament," from Max Bruch's oratorio "Odysseus," and for her second number the aria, "Che faro," from Gluck's opera, "Orfeo."

At the second concert, in December, Josef Hofmann will be the soloist, and will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

From HERALD
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Washington during the coming season which have not been claimed by last year's subscribers will open at Droop's music store Thirteenth and G streets, next Tuesday morning, October 18. It is a most attractive prospectus that the orchestra issues for this city. The five concerts will be given as usual on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock, in the New National Theater. The dates are November 8, when Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto, will be the soloist; December 6, with Josef Hofmann, the great pianist; January 10, with Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist; February 21, with Alwin Schroeder, the 'ceilist, and March 21, when Mme. Jeanne Jomelli will appear. Mr. Fiedler will conduct the orchestra, and the new concert master is Anton Witek, who for sixteen years has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

From POST
Address Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 23 10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The largest subscription the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had in Washington is that which is now in progress for the series of five concerts which will be given in the National this winter. Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, who has charge of the season sale, reports that if the National had twenty boxes she could not have filled all the orders that she has for them, and practically all the cheaper seats are gone. The first concert on Tuesday afternoon, November 8, brings as soloist Miss Margaret Keyes, the distinguished contralto, who will sing as her numbers "Penelope's Lament," from Max Bruch's oratorio "Odysseus," and for her second number the aria "Che faro," from Glucks opera "Orfeo."

From TIMES
Address Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 23 1910

BOSTON CONCERT TO OPEN SERIES

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Tuesday afternoon, November 8, brings as soloist Miss Margaret Keyes, a contralto, who will sing as her numbers Penelope's Lament from Max Bruch's oratorio "Odysseus," and for her second number the aria "Che faro," from Gluck's opera, "Orfeo."

At the second concert, in December, Josef will be the soloist and will play Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

From EVE. STAR
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

The largest advance seat sale ever enjoyed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is reported by the management.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PLANS

Are Announced, Together With Program For Lyric.

The twenty-sixth consecutive season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore will open with the concert it will give in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, November 9, which will be the first of the usual series of five concerts, the other dates being December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

The plans for the coming season are as attractive as any the orchestra has ever offered. At the first, second, third and fifth concerts will be distinguished soloists, and at the fourth concert in February, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the performance of which was given a year ago, will be repeated with the aid of the Baltimore Oratoria Society and a quartet of distinguished singers headed by Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano.

Melba will be the first soloist. This will be her only appearances in the East this year with the exception of a concert which she gives in Worcester, Mass., under the management of C. A. Ellis, near the end of November.

Josef Hofman will be the soloist at the second concert, and Mischa Elman, who has appeared here with the orchestra last year and the year before, will again be soloist at the January concert. The February concert, as already announced, will be devoted chiefly to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with choral movement, and in March, Baltimore will hear for the first time Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian by birth and a graduate of the celebrated Prague Conservatory. For the past 16 years he has been concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He is said to be a violinist of very high attainments.

[44]

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

NELLIE MELBA, SOPRANO

ANTON WITEK, VIOLINIST

The Boston Symphony's first concert of the season here will be given in the Academy of Music on the evening of November 7. The other dates will be December 5, January 11, February 20 and March 20. This celebrated musical organization is now in the thirtieth year of its existence. For the first time in its history it numbers an even 100 men.

There is a new concertmaster, Anton Witek, of Berlin, who was engaged last spring to succeed Willy Hess, who has gone to Berlin to be professor of the violin in the Royal Academy of Music. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian, a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz, and for the last sixteen years he has been concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He has brought to the United States the reputation of being not only one of the most efficient concertmasters in Europe, but of being a soloist of first rank.

It is a notable list of soloists that the orchestra announces for its Philadelphia series. Madame Melba and Madame Kirkby-Lunn represent the singers. Josef Hofmann, the pianist; Micha Elman, the violinist, and Heinrich Warnke, the violoncellist.

Melba Will Sing Here

Madame Melba, who is at present touring Canada, has arranged to give a few concert and operatic performances in November and December before she returns to London, where she must be by the first of the year. In opera she is to sing four times with the Chicago Opera Company, in Chicago, and four time with the Metropolitan Opera Company, in New York, for what is said to be the largest fee that has been given to an opera singer since Patti was in the prime of her popularity. She is also to make four appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, here, in New York, in Baltimore and in Boston, and she will give one other concert in New England.

These are absolutely all her appearances in the east, and she announces that she will not be back in America for at least two years, inasmuch as she is greatly interested in her plans to take a grand opera company to Australia.

Madame Melba's selections at her Philadelphia concert will be the "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the florid "Mad Scene" from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet."

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

It is announced that Madame Melba, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy on Monday evening, November 7, will sing as her first number the aria, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and as her second number the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet." At the December concert Josef Hofmann, as announced, will be the soloist and will play the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto.

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music this winter will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, No. 1119 Chestnut street, to-morrow morning. This be the thirtieth season of the orchestra and will be the twenty-sixth in which it has come regularly to Philadelphia its first visit having been in April, 1886 when Gericke was in the second year of his first term of service as conductor The concerts will be given on Monday evenings, November 7, December 5 January 9, February 20 and March 20 At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this will be. Madame Melba has been on this side of the Atlantic since last August. During September and October she has been making a concert tour through Canada Next year she proposes taking a complete grand opera company to Australia At the end of her concert tour this month she comes back under the management of Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, and with the orchestra will sing in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. She is to sing four times with the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago and four times with the Metropolitan Opera in New York, and these appearances with one other concert in New England will finish her work in America, for she sails for England on her way to Australia the end of December. She will sing here the aria "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

NELLIE MELBA.

At the second concert in December the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He is under contract for 14 performances with the orchestra during December and January. In February Heinrich Warnks, who divides with Alwin Schroeder the position of leader of the 'cellos of the orchestra, will be the soloist, and in March, Madame Kirby-Lunn, the eminent contralto, will apear.

Fiedler has worked out an interesting scheme of concerts. He has on his list for Boston a large number of important novelties and some of the best of these will surely be heard in Philadelphia. Anton Witek, the new concert-master, is a Bohemian, 38 years of age. For the past 16 years he has been concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

From PRESS

Address

Date

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's five concerts which has been proceeding for the past week has been quite up to expectations and practically all the more desirable seats in the Academy of Music have been disposed of. As already announced, the soloist at the first concert on Monday evening, November 7, will be Madame Melba, who will then make her only appearance here. Madame Melba will sing, as her first number, the aria, "Dove Song," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and as her second number the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." At the December concert Josef Hofmann, as announced, will be the soloist and will play the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto.

Esta 1884

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

With Mme. Melba as soloist, the Boston Symphony will give the first of its regular series of five concerts at the Academy of Music, Monday evening, November 7. This concert will mark the first appearance in Philadelphia of Anton Witek, of Berlin, who succeeds Willy Hess as concertmeister of the orchestra. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian and a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Bennewitz and for the past sixteen years concertmeister of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Melba, who, it announced, will make her only appearance in Philadelphia this season, has chosen as her numbers the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the florid Mad Scene from Thomas's "Hamlet." The orchestra's succeeding concerts are scheduled for December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

Es 1884

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

MME. MELBA

TO SING WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music during the coming winter will open at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street, tomorrow morning. This will be the thirtieth season of the orchestra since it was organized and will be the twenty-sixth season in which it has come regularly to Philadelphia, its first visit having been in April, 1886, when Mr. Gericke was in the second year of his first term of service as conductor of the orchestra.

The five concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this will be. Madame Melba will sing the aria, "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet."

From

Address

Date

An American composer, Henry Hadley, will be represented at one of Walter Damrosch's concerts in the New Theatre, where his new symphony will be played. Other works in the list of the New York Symphony Orchestra are William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon"; "Fireworks," a fantasy by Strawinsky; Theme and Variations by Frederick Stock; a "Suite Francaise," by Ducasse; a "Chamber Symphony," op. 27, by Paul Juon; "Rondo" and "Joyous Wanderings," by Hugo Kaun, and excerpts from Tchaikovsky's opera, "Jeanne d'Arc."

Henry Hadley has been re-engaged as conductor of the symphony orchestra on which Seattle prides itself almost as much as on its rapid growth. Mr. Hadley is undoubtedly one of the best and most ambitious of American musicians, and there is no reason why, under his capable direction, the Seattle Symphony Orchestra should not do for the cities of the Pacific Coast what the Boston Orchestra has done for those of the Atlantic Coast. Among the soloists engaged for the Seattle season are Gadski, Josef Hofmann, Gorgorza Kocian.

Es ork, 1884

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's five concerts which has been preceding for the past week has been quite up to expectations, and practically all the more desirable seats in the Academy of Music have been disposed of. As already announced, the soloist at the first concert on Monday evening, November 7, will be Madame Melba, who will then make her only appearance here. Madame Melba will sing as her first number the aria, "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and as her second number the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." At the December concert Josef Hofmann, as already announced, will be the soloist and will play the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto.

Operatic Artists on Their Way

Esta 84

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

MUSIC NOTES

—The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's five concerts has been quite up to expectations, and practically all the more desirable seats in the Academy of Music have been sold. As already announced, the soloist at the first concert on Monday evening, November 7, will be Madame Melba, who will then make her only appearance here. Madame Melba will sing as her first number the aria, "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and as her second number the Mad Scene from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." At the December concert Josef Hofmann, as announced, will be the soloist and will play the Beethoven "Emperor"

Establi 84

[45]

From EVE. TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Estabi ...84

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's five concerts, under the direction of Max Fiedler, which has been proceeding for the past week, has been quite up to expectations, and practically all the more desirable seats in the Academy of Music have been disposed of. As already announced, the soloist at the first concert, on Monday evening, November 7, will be Madame Melba, who will then make her only appearance here. Madame Melba will sing as her first number the aria, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and as her second number the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." At the December concert Josef Hofmann, as announced, will be the soloist, and will play the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World

From AMERICAN

Address

Date OCT

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-sixth consecutive season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore will open with the concert it will give in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 9, which will be the first of the usual series of five concerts, the other dates being December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22. The general sale of season tickets will open at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets, tomorrow (Monday) morning.

It is a rather interesting fact that Baltimore was one of the first cities visited by the orchestra when it began to give concerts outside of the cities immediately adjacent to Boston.

The plans for the coming season are as attractive as any the orchestra has ever offered. At the first, second, third and fifth concerts will be distinguished soloists, and at the fourth, in Feburary, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the performance which created such enthusiasm a year ago, will be repeated with the aid of the Baltimore Oratorio Society and a quartet of distinguished singers headed by Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano.

Melba will be the first soloist. This greatest of all sopranos has been giving a series of concerts during September and October in Canada, and when this tour is finished at the end of this month, she is to appear four times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, four times with the Chicago Opera in Chicago, and four times with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. This will be her only appearance in the East this year, with the exception of a concert which she gives in Worcester, Mass. From all accounts of those that heard her this year, the glory of her voice is in no wise diminished.

Josef Hofmann, who will be the greatest exponent of the piano in America during the coming winter, will be the soloist at the second concert and Mischa Elman, who appeared here with the orchestra last year and the year before, will again be soloist at the January concert. The February concert, as already announced, will be devoted chiefly to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with choral movement, and in March Baltimore will hear for the first time Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian by birth and a graduate of the celebrated Prague Conservatory, which has turned out so many violinists of fame. He is a violinist of very high attainments and is expected to perpetuate the noble traditions of the post which he holds.

There has been a large renewal of old subscribers and there is a long list of new subscribers, and altogether the outlook for the year is most gratifying to the orchestra and to its many friends.

COPYRIGHT BY GESSFORD N.Y.
JOSEPH HOFMANN AND MELBA SOLOISTS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From

Address

Date

Esta ...k, 1884

SYMPHONY CONCERT ON NOVEMBER 9

Melba, Greatest Soprano, to Sing Here During the Season.

The twenty-sixth consecutive season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore will open with the concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 9, which will be the first of the usual series of five concerts. The other dates will be December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22. The general sale of season tickets will open at Albaugh's ticket office, Charles and Fayette streets, Monday morning.

The plans for the coming season are as attractive as any the orchestra has ever offered. At the first, second, third and fifth concerts will be distinguished soloists, and at the fourth, in February, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the performance which created such enthusiasm a year ago, will be repeated with the aid of the Baltimore Oratorio Society and a quartet of distinguished singers headed by Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano.

Melba will be the first soloist. This greatest of all sopranos is to appear four times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, four times with the Chicago Opera in Chicago and four times with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. This will be her only appearance in the East this year, with the exception of a concert which she gives in Worcester, Mass. From all accounts of those that heard her this year, the glory of her voice is in nowise diminished.

Josef Hofmann, who will be the greatest exponent of the piano in America during the coming winter, will be the soloist at the second concert, and Mischa Elman, who appeared here with the orchestra last year and the year before, will again be soloist at the January concert. The February concert, as already announced, will be devoted chiefly to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with choral movement, and in March Baltimore will hear for the first time Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian by birth and a graduate of the celebrated Prague Conservatory, which has turned out so many violinists of fame. He is a violinist of very high attainments and is expected to perpetuate the noble traditions of the post which he holds.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS

Long Line Of Music Lovers At The Opening Of Box Office.

Esta ...1884

The advance sale of seats for this year's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the largest ever known in the 26 seasons in which it has given concerts in Baltimore. Early this morning a long line reached from Albaugh's down Fayette street, patiently waiting a chance to purchase season tickets for the entire five performances.

The season of 1910-1911 marks the thirtieth year in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been catering to the music-lovers of this country. These years have seen it grow from the struggling organization of its infancy to the highly developed perfectly disciplined orchestra it is at present. With a record of 2,900 symphony concerts behind it, its actual work accomplished is exceeded only by that of two or three of the oldest orchestras of Europe.

The soloist for its November concert will be Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Baltimore this will be. In February, at the request of a large number of subscribers, the impressive performance of Beethoven's Ninth Choral Symphony, given last season, will be repeated, with the assistance of the Baltimore Oratorio Society and a quartet of which Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey will be the soprano. The piano will be represented by Josef Hofmann and the violin by Micha Elman and Anton Witek.

The dates of the concerts are five Wednesday evenings—November 9, December 7, 1910; January 11, February 22 and March 22, 1911.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

MELBA AND ARRAY OF ARTISTS

Will Be Heard With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Es ...k, 1884

It is announced that Madame Melba, Josef Hofman, Mischa Elman and Anton Witek, with a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the February concert.

At the first concert in November, Madame Melba will show two sides of her art. Her first number will be the "Dove Song" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," which calls for the purest legato singing. Her second will be the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Esta ...1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PLANS

Orchestra Completes Arrangements For Baltimore Concerts.

The general subscription sale for the twenty-sixth season in Baltimore of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Albaugh's ticket office, Charles and Fayette streets, tomorrow morning.

Since the spring of 1886 not a year has passed that this organization has not come to Baltimore for at least one concert, and for many years it has visited this city each winter five times. When it first came to Baltimore it was but five years old. Mr. Gericke was in the second year of his first engagement, and the orchestra numbered 75 men, of which about 60 were brought to this city. The process of building the organization to make it the best in the world was well on the way, but compared with the orchestra of today it was rather primitive. But it had one glory—its strings—although it was weak both in the wood-wind and brass.

Baltimore is today one of the most loyal supporters of the orchestra, although for many years its existence in this city was a hard struggle. The turn came in the early 90s, when it was found it would be necessary to drop from the monthly itinerary either Washington or Baltimore, and as Washington was giving better support than Baltimore, this city was decided upon. Immediately there came a protest from Baltimore, and it is an interesting bit of history that Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, came here and told the committee which had been formed that the only reason for abandoning Baltimore, instead of Washington, was that Washington gave the better support, but if a guarantee of $1,500 a concert was made the concerts in Baltimore would be continued. The guarantee was raised, but the guarantors were never asked to pay a cent.

Concerts were given in the old Fifth Regiment Armory, and then for a number of years in Ford's Opera House. When the Lyric Theatre was built the Boston Symphony Orchestra had the honor of dedicating and opening it to the public. At this concert Mme. Melba was the soloist.

Baltimore has had the orchestra under all its conductors except Henschel—Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, again Gericke, then Muck and now Fiedler. It has been an important factor in creating musical interest in this city, and it is intimately concerned in the musical history of Baltimore. It has done in Baltimore something unique in its history, giving last year, with the help of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the only time it has given this stupendous work outside of Boston. This symphony, by the way, will be a feature of the coming season.

This winter the five concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings in the Lyric on November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22. In November, December, January and March there will be a soloist. In February Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be given with the help of the Baltimore Oratorio Society and a quartet of which Mme. Rider-Kelsey will be the soprano.

Melba will be the soloist at the first concert.

The soloist at the December concert will be Josef Hofmann. It is a number of years since he has appeared with the orchestra, and the opportunity to hear him will be welcomed by all students of the piano and lovers of that branch of the art.

Mischa Elman, who has been soloist with the orchestra here twice, will again appear in January. This violinist grows in his art each year. He is one of the truly great artists of the generation—is one of those gifted men who make musical history.

At the final concert the soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Witek comes to Boston from Berlin, where for sixteen years he was concert-master and principal soloist of the Philharmonic Orchestra. He is a Bohemian and a graduate of the Prague Conservatory. The short time he has been with the orchestra he has shown conclusively that he is quite worthy to occupy the chair of his distinguished predecessors.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the five Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Lyric Theater during the coming winter, has been proceeding now for a week, and Mr. Albaugh, who has charge of it, announces that it breaks all records for the orchestra, so far as Baltimore is concerned. This huge sale is due, no doubt, in part to the extraordinary list of soloists that Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, announces—Madame Melba, Josef Hofman, Mischa Elman and Anton Witek, with a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the February concert.

At the first concert in November Madame Melba will show two sides of her lovely art. Her first number will be the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," which calls for the purest legato singing. Her second number will be the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet," which is as great a piece of vocal pyrotechnics as is found in the literature of music.

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES NEXT MONTH

Esta 1884

Will Give First Concert Of Series Of Five At The Lyric Nov. 9.

The twenty-sixth consecutive season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore will open with the concert at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 9. This will be the first of the series of five concerts, the other dates being December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22.

It is a rather interesting fact that Baltimore was one of the first cities visited by the Orchestra when it began to give concerts outside of the cities immediately adjacent to Boston. Today the Orchestra is as firmly established here as it is in any city in the country.

The plans for the coming season are as attractive as any the Orchestra has ever offered. At the first, second, third and fifth concerts will be distinguished soloists, and at the fourth concert in February, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the performance of which created such enthusiasm a year ago, will be repeated with the aid of the Baltimore Oratorio Society and a quartet of distinguished singers headed by Madame Rider-Kelsey, soprano.

Melba will be the first soloist. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the second concert, and Mischa Elman, who appeared here with the Orchestra last year and year before, will again be soloist at the January concert.

The February concert will be devoted chiefly to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with choral movement, and in March Baltimore will hear for the first time Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the Orchestra. There has been a large renewal of old subscribers and there is a long list of new subscribers, and altogether the outlook for the year is most gratifying to the Orchestra and its many friends.

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY TICKETS SELL FAST

rk, 1884

Season Purchasers Have Broken All Records Heretofore In Baltimore.

The general sale of season tickets for the five Boston Symphony concerts which will be given at the Lyric Theater next winter has been proceeding now for a week, and Mr. Albaugh, who has charge of it, announces that it breaks all records for the Orchestra so far as Baltimore is concerned. This sale is due no doubt, in part, to the extraordinary list of soloists that Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Orchestra, announces — Mme. Melba, Josef Hofmann, Mischal Elman and Anton Witek, with a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the February concert.

At the first concert, in November, Mme. Melba will show two sides of her lovely art. Her first number will be the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," which calls for the purest legato singing. Her second number will be the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet," which is as great a piece of vocal pyrotechnics as is found in the literature of music.

The season sale runs another week, after which time the single sale for the first concert will begin, but there will be few seats left for single sale, and non-subscribers in Baltimore will this year have the same difficulty in securing seats for the single concerts as non-subscribers in New York, Boston and Washington have.

BOSTON TRAVELER, OCTOBER 29, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Next week Friday will see the so-called "rush" line in front of Symphony Hall formed in the wee small hours of the morning, for it is the appearance of Geraldine Farrar as soloist. Miss Farrar, with her usual enterprise and ingenuity, is to sing two pieces, which in all probability have never been heard in Boston, or even in this country. The first will be a tune from the opera comique "Jeannet et Colin" by Nicolus Isouard, produced at the Opera Comique in Paris in 1814; the second will be a concert aria by Mozart. All that is known of it is that it is supposed to have been sung for the first time at a concert in Vienna in December, 1783. Miss Farrar found this last summer and Dr. Muck has condensed and arranged it for her and written the orchestration.

In response to a general desire, the Rachmaninoff Symphony is to be repeated at this concert. Betwen the two vocal numbers Mr. Fiedler will play an Adagio and Fugue by Mozart. The final number will be the "Egmont" overture.

From STAR.

Address BALTIMORE,

Date OCT

Tickets for Boston Symphony

The general sale of season tickets for the five Boston symphony concerts which will be given in the Lyric Theater during the coming winter has broken all records for the orchestra, so far as Baltimore is concerned. This sale is due, no doubt, in part, to the extraordinary list of soloists that Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, announces—Madame Melba, Josef Hofman, Mischa Elman and Anton Witek, with a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the February concert.

At the first concert in November Mme. Melba will show two sides of her lovely art. Her first number will be the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" which calls for the purest legato singing. Her second number will be the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet," which is as great a piece of vocal pyrotechnics as is found in the literature of music.

E k, 1884

BOSTON JOURNAL, OCTOBER 29, 1910.

MEN PROMINENT IN FRIDAY AUDIENCE AT SYMPHONY HALL

Many Well Known Women Are Also Seen Among Throng at Rehearsal.

For the Symphony rehearsal yesterday there were not so many of the distinctly fashionable set present, but more of the middle-aged, and men, too, were prominent. Seen in the throng were Mrs. Francis Sedgwick Watson, wearing a pale violet cloth and looking much thinner than when last seen; Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. J. B. Forsyth, Mrs. Francis G. Peabody in black silk, the coat having white lace revers, her daughter Amy, Mrs. Eben S. Draper, Mrs. C. H. Bond and daughter Mildred, Mrs. Arthur Blake, Eben D. Jordan, former Governor and Mrs. John D. Long, Mrs. William Vaughan, Miss Katherine Ricker, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mrs. Charles J. Rich, Mrs. Anna D. West, Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, Mrs. Frederick L. W. Richardson, her relative Mrs. Kenneth Horton, Miss Edith Linwood Winn, Miss Elinor Quincy, Mrs. William H. Ames, Mrs. Horace P. Jealous, Mrs. Francis Stanley, Mrs. Elmer Jared Bliss, Mrs. George Shattuck, her step-daughter Mrs. Francis L. Higginson, Juliet Higginson, Mrs. Charles Dowse, Mrs. Leon White, and many more.

RECORD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29. 1910

MRS. HOWE'S MEMORY HONORED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms. Third Symphony.
Beethoven. Violin concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Anton Witek.
Strube. Comedy overture, "Puck."

To this was added the andante from Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," played in honor of the memory of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, at the beginning of the concert. Naturally this commemorative piece was "hors concours," and not intended for critical review

Mr. Anton Witek is the second great concertmeister of our orchestra to make his debut as a soloist with Beethoven's Violin Concerto. When, away back in the paleozoic age, Mr. Kneisel appeared as an audacious youth who had ventured to replace the older Bernhard Listemann, he threw down the gauntlet with this concerto, and in that trial by combat, he routed all his adversaries. Mr. Witek is another young man who replaces a veteran,—Prof. Willy Hess,—and he gave the same gage of battle, with the same result. Possibly we may use the motto of the prize ring in our symphonic circle also—"Youth will be served!"

There is something so thoroughly combative in the first movement of this concerto that it suits well for such a crucial purpose, almost defiant. Mr. Witek soon proved that he was able to fill the position of his fiery predecessor without rattling round in it. But he showed a tendency to over-refinement. One did not get the robust Beethoven of Ysaye or Kreisler. Nervousness was not apparent in any part of the work, although a debutant has a good right to become fidgetty during the long Tutti of the beginning, while waiting for his time to enter with solo work. In the Larghetto there were pianissimo effects given that must have been inaudible in the distant parts of the large hall. The cadenzas were founded upon the Joachim set, although digressing from these once or twice. In intonation and phrasing there was much to commend, although, as above intimated, we would have preferred a more masculine reading of some parts of the work. That the audience was delighted was abundantly proved by four recalls, which at a matinee is an unusual degree of enthusiasm.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Afternoon of Distinctions for the Orchestra and Its Concert-Master—Mr. Witek's Unique Playing of Beethoven's Concerto—Brahms and the Orchestra—An Andante from Schubert for Mrs. Howe

THE quality of the playing of the orchestra in Brahms's symphony in F major and the quality of the playing of its new concert-master, Mr. Witek, in Beethoven's concerto for violin were the distinctions of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. The programme began with the Andante from Schubert's "unfinished" symphony played to the memory of Julia Ward Howe. Thereby the Symphony Orchestra fulfilled its duty as an institution of Boston; and made a happy departure from the conventions of memorial music. The whole or a part of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the apotheosis of Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung," and Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music have served the purpose appropriately and inappropriately. With Beethoven and with Wagner, the music is of heroic lament and heroic striving. It wants appropriateness except to a very few mortals. With Mozart the music is of the ceremony with which grief, that should be intimate, publicly cloaks itself. That the elegiac mood in music may recall a cherished memory and honor it has escaped the conductors until Mr. Fiedler chose Schubert's song for the commemoration of Mrs. Howe. It was in accord with the memory of a woman who loved the arts and discriminated among them and who cherished them when they sought beauty, be it of word or sound or line, for its own sake. It was in accord also, with the mood of a community that less laments the departure of a venerable woman at the end of full and rounded years than recalls the gentleness and the goodness of her life. And the beauty of the playing of the orchestra made the Andante only the more fulfil its purpose. In the voices of the wood winds, above all, was the beauty that Mrs Howe loved, that was of the expressive arts that she cherished.

It is familiar reproach to Brahms that he had little imagination, as the quality now goes, in instrumental coloring and little feeling for it. The limitation may hold as to the string choir, of whose manifold varieties of tonal tint he was chary; but he knew and searched the voices of the wood-winds and above all the other instruments, the voices of the horns. To them, as in the Andante and the Allegretto of the symphony of yesterday, the music owes much of its beauty as so much ordered sound and much of its romantic quality as sound touched with an emotion unusually wan and dreamy for Brahms. He knew the mystery that may dwell in these voices when he turns them dusky, the opalescent tints that they may give to changeful song; and the subdued and serene warmth with which they may clothe musing or melancholy mood. The strings do not lack opportunity in this symphony in F major. To them falls the sonorous and the tumultuous beginning, as for once, of an ardent Brahms. To them falls much of the energy of all the music; and in their voices often lurk the suggestion of a "programme" or at the least an emotional, poetic scheme behind the symphony. Brahms was reticent of these things in his words and in his music; yet his was not a wilful mystery. He speaks out indeed more freely in the third symphony than all the rest. The stride is larger; there is less suggestion of the meditation that sometimes falls away into mere calculation; there is emotion animating and diversifying, contrasting and ranging musical sound beyond the mere formalities of the symphony. There is beauty of imagination and idea compressed—how short Brahms's symphony seems beside the ultra-modern lengths—condensed as a finality of concentrated expression. Surely there were visions behind.

Mr. Witek's playing of Beethoven's concerto was unique. For the first time within recollection a virtuoso made no attempt to make the music sound "big," as though it were of the heroic Beethoven of the fifth symphony, or even of the ninth. For the first time, again, within recollection a virtuoso made no attempt to make the cadenzas, the "passage work," the ornamentation of the Romance, the rushing rhythms of the Rondo sound brilliant. Mr. Witek chose another way. He played the concerto without a hint of personal display, with a "platform manner" that was quietness and preoccupation in his task themselves. His tone was light, as the large and heavy tones to which violinists force their instruments go nowadays; but it was exquisitely soft, luminous, edgeless. It was all of the finer, sweeter, more insinuating qualities of the violin. Technically, in all the insistent demands alike of the instrument and the music, Mr. Witek's performance was flawless. Often it attained to perfections that were as the result of the minute care, the patient study, the endless polishing of years. The listener might almost hold his breath at the felicity with which Mr. Witek phrased and accented the music, at the adroitness with which he "led" the melodies and accomplished the transitions, at the fashion in which he fused the voice of his violin with the orchestra or held it in contrast against it. The endless finesse of Mr. Witek's playing stirred mind and fancy, caressed and intoxicated the ear. The unvarying beauty of his tone brought like sensations. The violin, the music, the orchestra all seemed at one with it. The concerto resolved itself into patterns of sound adroitly and beautifully woven, touched with its own emotions and so touching the hearer. We moderns try to read deep things into the concerto, which, after all, was written frankly for a virtuoso. Perhaps Mr. Witek is the nearer right.

THE CECILIA CONCERTS

The Promising Results of the Alliance with the Symphony Orchestra—Bantock's "Omar," Pierne's "Children's Crusade" and Bach's "Passion Music" to Be Performed—The Array of Solo Singers

IN many respects the most interesting musical events of the season which has just opened will be the three concerts to be given by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler as the conductor. The alliance brought about last spring between these two societies is one of the most important moves that has been made in this city for many years. It is an end that has long been worked toward by friends of both the Cecilia Society and the Orchestra, for it has been realized that such a combination was the only way in which Boston could have a series of choral concerts on the same high plane as its Symphony concerts. Heretofore the Cecilia has been hampered by being compelled to use a small orchestra, financial considerations entering largely into this; but now it will be possible to give concerts with the entire Symphony Orchestra when modern works call for it. Mr. Fiedler is most enthusiastic over the prospects and has entered into the plans with greatest zeal. It has been arranged that the drilling of the Cecilia shall be done by Mr. Malcolm Lang, whose father was for so many years at the head of the Cecilia, and that the last rehearsals shall be under the direct personal charge of Mr. Fiedler.

Plans for the three concerts this winter have been completed. The dates for these are Thursday evening, Dec. 1, Thursday evening, Feb. 16, and Good Friday evening, April 14. At the first concert the first part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be given. This work had its first performance in America at the last Worcester Festival, where it was more than favorably received and it is scheduled for full performance by a number of choral societies throughout the country. As it has a most elaborate orchestral dress the ability to use the whole of the Symphony Orchestra should enable it to have an extraordinary performance. The soloists engaged for this are Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto, George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, basso.

Of all choral works recently performed in Boston, none has received greater favor than Pierné's "The Children's Crusade" which was sung by the Cecilia Society a few seasons ago. This has been selected for the second concert on Feb. 16, when the soloists will be Edmont Clement, the distinguished French tenor who was a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company last season, Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano, Edith Chapman Gould, soprano, and Claude Cunningham, basso. There will also be a chorus of one hundred children to be trained by Professor Hadley of Somerville.

At the last concert Bach's "The Passion According to Matthew" will be sung. It is many years since this gigantic work has found a place on a Boston programme, and its performance should attract widest attention among music lovers of all classes. The soloists engaged for this are Maria Zimmerman, soprano, generally regarded as the most accomplished Bach singer in this country; Janet Spencer, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor, and David Bispham, baritone. The sale of season tickets will open at Symphony Hall on Monday, Nov. 14.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Season in Flood Again—Miss Farrar and Mme. Sembrich for Eminent Singers—A New Series of Sonata Recitals—Mr. Gruppe for a New Violoncellist and Mr. Adkins for a New Singer

THE line of the faithful which gathers weekly in front of Symphony Hall to get the twenty-five-cent "Rush" seats will form early enough next Friday morning, for that afternoon Geraldine Farrar is to be the soloist. When Miss Farrar sang here last year, No. 1 in the line appeared shortly after eight o'clock and held her place until half-past one, when the doors opened and it is certain that the line will begin to form about that time next week. Miss Farrar with her usual enterprise and ingenuity will sing two pieces, neither of which in all human probability has been heard in Boston, and the chances are that neither of them has ever appeared on a programme in this country. The first will be a tune from the opé a comique, "Jannot et Colin," by Nicolus Isouard. This opéra-comique was produced in Paris in 1814, when Isouard was at the height of his popularity. Her second number will be a concert aria by Mozart, the first words of which are "Misero! O segno, O son desto?" All that Koechel can give on this aria is that it is supposed to have been sung for the first time at a concert in Vienna for the benefit of the Pensionsgesellschitfft, in December, 1783. Miss Farrar found it this last summer and Dr. Muck has condensed and arranged it for her and written the orchestration. In response to a general desire, Mr. Fiedler will, at this concert, repeat the Rachmaninoff Symphony. Between the two vocal numbers he will play two dances from Monsigny's old opera, "Aline." The final number will be the "Egmont" overture.

Nov. 1. Their programme comprises Veracini's Sonata in E minor for old music; Brahms's in D minor for a classic piece; and Berger's in G minor for a new and contemporary composition. Both Mr. Dethier and Miss Beebe have made their reputations in New York.

Next Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 2, in Steinert Hall, at three, Mr. Paulo Gruppe will make his first appearance before a Boston public in a 'cello recital. Mr. Gruppe is a virtuoso of European experience and the programme announced by him gives him opportunity to display his talents. It comprises a Sonata by Locatelli; Concerto by Lalo; "Variations Symphoniques" by Boellman; a "Rondo" by Dvoràk; the andante from Schumann's concerto, and Popper's "Vito." Mr. Karl Bondam, the Dutch pianist, will, by special courtesy to Mr. Gruppe, come from New York to play the accompaniments.

Morton Adkins, the young baritone who is favorably known in New York both in oratorio and in recital, will give a concert in Jordan Hall on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 8, at three o'clock. His programme comprises old operatic airs, and classic, modern and contemporary songs. It is:

Bois Epais (from "Amadis").....	Lully
Die helle Sonne leuchtet.....	Franz
Im Herbst.....	Franz
Des Hauptmanns Weib.....	Schumann
Aus den Hebräischen Gesangen.....	Schumann
La Procession.....	Franck
Le Plongeur.....	Widor
Nachtgang.....	Strauss
Meerfahrt.....	Kaun
Mondeszauber.....	Novacek
Out of the Rolling Ocean.....	Kernochan
The Hermit Thrush.....	Mack
Two "Markham" Songs.....	Ware
Hark! Hark! the Lark.....	Loomis
Drake's Drum.....	Farwell
The Night Rider.....	Bergh
Sunset.....	Russell
Fern Song.....	Brockway
The Wind Speaks.....	Grant-Schaefer
Rolling Down to Rio.....	German

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Yesterday afternoon's programme of the Symphony rehearsal traversed almost as wide an area as did the one of last week, leaping from the stately, almost sublime, Brahms Symphony to the whimsical, almost farcical "Puck" overture, with an interim of the exquisite loveliness of a Beethoven Concerto. Emotions evoked by such a programme carry almost a life's experience with them, and one feels as if one had been very much "played upon" at the close. They do, however, have a satisfying fullness of expression.

The opening number, the Andante movement from Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, was played in memoriam of Julia Ward Howe. It would be difficult to find anything more fitting the commemoration of such a life than this exquisite fragment which all the world loves, as it did Mrs. Howe. The only unfitness would seem that it is a "fragment," and her life came as near to being a "perfect whole" as could any life lived in this world of "broken arcs," as Browning styles it. This movement of the symphony, so full of exceeding tenderness and such rarely sweet commingling of themes, certainly typifies the life of Mrs. Howe, so full of tenderness itself and so richly mingling every humanitarian theme of life.

The Brahms Symphony No. 3, in F major, most fittingly followed the first number, with its opening allegro con brio movement, which has been styled the "Eroica." Across a woven tapestry of heroism move figures of sentiment, religion and triumph, and low, delicate modulations lead to bursts of grandeur, which sink away in soft liquid notes. The entire symphony, though all of masculine energy of thought and emotion, yet is softened at times by moments of ineffable tenderness; though spiritually lofty, it has something of human sympathy. It seems to come directly from the inner consciousness of a great intellect, which, albeit, sometimes works without an understanding of the common knowledge or common heart. It is written in strictly musical terms, not in allegory, or figure, and has great dignity of conception. In the intricate variations of the second movement is a kind of transcendental rhythm. The third movement breaks away from the constraint and influence of the two preceding ones and dreams its own dream, sometimes in long, deep breaths of harmony, and then in the short, ecstatic (not used in the Scriabine sense of the word) breaths of joy.

The closing, or allegro, movement is one of contrasts, the composer who thought only in musical syllogisms in the earlier movements is now a complex dreamer, mysterious and almost symbolic. What was a mere tone-structure is now almost a poet's dream, full of sublime ideality. The stateliness and ideality of the symphony were all brought out in yesterday's rendering, its intricacies of musical thought and its subtleties of the imagination.

Debut of Anton Witek.

The feature of the afternoon was the debut of Anton Witek, the new concert-master, and he placed himself in Boston's "hall of fame" immediately. Mr. Witek chose for his first appearance the Beethoven Concerto in D major. At first thought it does not seem a happy choice, for the over-elaborateness of the orchestration makes the violin work a mere secondary factor throughout the first movement, but generous opportunity is accorded to it in the larghetto and rondo movements and even in the first one Mr. Witek's instrument merged now and again from the sea of melody a clear, dominant note, then again in delicate tracery it outlined the structural part of the composition.

But in the other two movements it held sway, and swept everything else along with it, sometimes albeit only by so much as a whisper did it command, but it was in these moments of extreme delicacy of thought and emotion that Mr. Witek's command for attention was most imperious. One listened for the faintest breath from his instrument because he made each slightest breath tell something that one longed to hear. These tiny filaments of tone he held like threads of spun gold in the sunlight and one saw all the colors of the spectrum play through them till they were warm with color.

And, though the ear only faintly discerned them, they vibrated with thought and emotion till they filled every inch of space in the large hall. While in the early bravura passage work his bowing was a trifle laborious, in the cadenzas he showed marvelous freedom, and what is far more extraordinary he made them alive in every note. Cadenzas for the violin too often are merely technical exposition, but not so with Mr. Witek; they were free, gloriously free, full of color and abounding in rich figures. The composer who dreamed them could not have dreamed into them more of his own soul than did Mr. Witek in playing them. They will stand out in the imagination of his hearers for days, for they had a lingering, thinking, speaking voice which echoes and re-echoes in the mind. He was recalled many times to acknowledge the prolonged applause, which was not the merely "noisy" kind, but which was full of warmth like his own playing.

The closing comedy overture entitled "Puck," by Strube, is whimsical, capricious, laughing now and again at its own fun. It has moments of seriousness when it becomes almost reflective, but just at the instant when it might be sad, it seems to laugh and say, "Oh, don't let us think of that. This is a world of fun," and so it keeps on to the end. Seldom does the kettle-drum artist have a chance to play such a funny trick with his instrument—he was alive to the situation yesterday and made the trick a success.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Miss Geraldine Farrar will make her only appearances in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. There is naturally a great demand for seats. Miss Farrar, will sing two unfamiliar songs: the first, an air from the opera comique "Jeannot et Colin," by Isouard, which was produced in Paris in 1814; the second, a concert aria for tenor by Mozart which was probably sung at a concert in Vienna for the benefit of the Pensionsgeseilschafft in 1783. The aria was condensed and the orchestration revised for Miss Farrar by Dr. Muck.

The Symphony will be Rachmaninoff's Second which will be repeated in response to a very general request. The other orchestra pieces will be Gevaert's transcription of a chaconne and rigadon from Monsigny's "Aline" and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

CECILIA CONCERTS.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the following announcement regarding the three concerts which will be given by the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra during the coming winter under the direction of Mr. Fiedler. The concerts will be on Thursday evening, Dec. 1; Thursday evening, Feb. 16, and Good Friday evening, April 14.

At the first concert the first part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be heard for the first time in Boston. This work had its first performance in America at Brooklyn, N. Y., and was performed at the recent Worcester Festival, when it made a more than favorable impression on the audience. It will require the services of the entire orchestra of 100 men. The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, bass. At the second concert Thursday, Feb. 16, Pierne's "The Children's Crusade," which has already been performed successfully by the Cecilia Society, will be sung. The soloists engaged are Edmond Clement, the distinguished French tenor, who last year was a member of the Metropolitan Opera company; Mmes. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano, and Edith Chapman Goold, soprano, and Claude Cunningham, bass. There will also be a chorus of 100 children, trained by Prof. Hadley of Somerville. The final concert on Good Friday evening will bring the performance of "The Passion," according to Matthew, by Johann Sebastian Bach. The soloists will be Marie Zimmerman, soprano; Janet Spencer, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor, and David Bispham, baritone.

The alliance between the Symphony Orchestra and the Cecilia Society is an important musical event. It guarantees at once the setting of choral music in Boston on the high plane of orchestral music. The Cecilia Society will consist of 175 trained voices, and unquestionably it will show itself as the best choir in this country. Whenever necessary, as in the Bantock work, the entire membership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can be called on. The preliminary training of the Cecilia will be done by Malcolm Lang, but the final rehearsal will be under the direct charge of Mr. Fiedler, who will conduct the concerts.

The subscription sale for the three concerts will open at Symphony Hall, Monday, Nov. 14.

SYMPHONY-CECILIA PLANS

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, announces three concerts, to be given by the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra during the coming winter, under the direction of Max Fiedler. The concerts will be given Dec. 1, Feb. 16 and Good Friday evening, April 14.

MISS FARRAR AS SOLOIST

Geraldine Farrar will make her only appearances in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will bring two unknown works as her solo numbers. Her first number will be an air from the opera comique, "Jeannot et Colin," by Nicolus Isouard, which was produced in Paris in 1814. Her second number will be a concert aria by Mozart which she ran across last spring. The aria was condensed and orchestrated for Miss Farrar by Dr. Muck. The symphony will be Rachmaninoff's second, which is to be repeated in response to a very general request. There will, however, be an orchestral novelty on the program in an adagio and fugue by Mozart. The final number will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND CECILIA SOCIETY

Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the following announcement regarding the three concerts which will be given by the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra during the coming winter under the direction of Max Fiedler. The concerts will be given on Thursday evening, Dec. 1, Thursday evening, Feb. 16, and Good Friday evening, April 14.

At the first concert the first part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be heard for the first time in Boston. This work had its first performance in America at the last Worcester Festival, where it made a more than favorable impression on the audience. As the work has a very elaborate orchestral dress it will require the services of the entire orchestra of 100 men. The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, basso.

At the second concert on Thursday, Feb. 16, Pierne's "The Children's Crusade," which has already been given here with such success by the Cecilia Society, will be sung. For this the soloists engaged are Edmond Clemont, the distinguished French tenor, who last year was a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Edith Chapman Gould, soprano, and Claude Cunningham, bass. There will also be a chorus of 100 children trained by Professor Hadley of Somerville.

The final concert on Good Friday evening will bring the performance of "The Passion," according to Matthew, by Johann Sebastian Bach. For this performance the soloists will be Marie Zimmerman, soprano, generally regarded as the most skilled Bach singer in this country; Janet Spender, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor, and David Bispham, baritone.

The alliance between the Symphony Orchestra and the Cecilia Society is one of the most important musical events which have taken place here in many years. It guarantees at once the setting of choral music in Boston on the same high plane as has distinguished orchestral music. The Cecilia Society will under the new plans consist of 175 trained voices. Whenever necessary, as in the Bantock work, the entire membership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can be called on.

The preliminary training of the Cecilia will be done by Mr. Malcolm Lang, but the final rehearsal will be under the direct charge of Mr. Fiedler, who will conduct the concerts. It is expected that these concerts will be the most successful of their kind ever given in Boston.

The subscription sale for the three concerts will open at Symphony Hall on Monday, Nov. 14.

CONCERTS

The programme of Mme. Sembrich's only recital, to be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon, the 31st, at 2:30 o'clock, is an especially interesting one. It is made up entirely of songs from Schubert, Schumann and Brahms. Some of these songs are very seldom heard. Among the more familiar ones are "Der Fischer" and "Du bist die Ruh" by Schubert, "Fruhlingsnacht" by Schumann, and "Botschaft," Brahms.

Next Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 2, in Steinert Hall, Mr. Paulo Gruppe, a young 'cellist from Holland, will make his first appearance before a Boston public in a 'cello recital. Mr. Gruppe will play a sonata by Locatelli; concerto, Lalo; variations symphoniques, Boellmann; rondo, Dvorak; Schumann's "Andante," and the great 'cello composer Popper's "Vito." Mr. Karl Bondam, the eminent Dutch pianist, by special courtesy to Mr. Gruppe, will come over from New York to play the accompaniments.

Farrar Coming

Geraldine Farrar will make her only appearance in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Miss Farrar will bring two unknown works as her solo numbers, both of them belonging to the 18th century. Her first number will be an air from the opera comique "Jeannot et Colin," by Nicolus Isouard, which was produced in Paris in 1814; her second, an unknown concert aria by Mozart, which she ran across last spring. The aria was condensed and orchestrated for Miss Farrar by Dr. Muck.

Rachmaninoff's second symphony will be repeated in response to a very general request. There will, however, be an orchestral novelty on the programme in an Adagio and Fugue by Mozart. The Fugue was originally written for piano and when Mozart rewrote it for orchestra he preceded it by this adagio. The final piece will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

[48]

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1910.

Anton Witek Appears as Symphony Soloist

His technique has just the traits we should hope for in a concertmaster.

FOR violin oratory go elsewhere than to Anton Witek.

If you want to hear Beethoven's periods declaimed with long range eloquence, you must wait until one of the traveling virtuosos comes along.

If you want a soloist who makes you feel that the moment of his arrival on the platform is the real beginning of things, if you want a soloist who preludes his performances with a defiant look at every corner of the hall, if you want a soloist who in delivering the themes of his concerto acts as though he were whipping his violin into a rage against the impertinent instruments behind it, you thereby count yourself among those humanly interested in the fine art of music and you are sure some day to have your wish gratified.

The soloist you want is just the kind that violin concertos are written for.

He is a man with a gift for display; he demands an art form in which he can assert his power, and composers provide him with just the thing he needs, a sort of symphony, abridged here and amplified there, according to the peculiar exigencies of the solo idea.

And this art form, once created, stimulates solo activity even in men who have no innate craving for it.

The oratorically endowed soloist is a laudable figure in the violin world.

He will remain while there is glue to hold together the timbers of a Stradivarius.

When he ceases to appear on the stage the decline of quartet, symphony and opera will begin.

The tone and technique of his instrument are the foundation on which the whole fabric of modern instrumental music is raised.

All of us, though, however we may like a violinist whose elocution is like that of Demosthenes or Webster, can find pleasure in one who forbears to harangue our emotions, but appeals to them mildly and graciously.

Our pleasure will be all the greater if the artist in question is the concertmaster of our orchestra, if he is the man who serves our best interests in 23 of the 24 programs that the Symphony year brings around by being a self-effacing virtuoso.

We shall not ask him at his one solo appearance to stand in a character not his own; we shall only ask him to acquaint us with the quality of his technique, to convince us that he holds the premiership in the group of men at Mr. Fiedler's left hand because of his superior violin mastery.

And what is the quality of Mr. Witek's technique?

That could be better determined, probably, in a chamber concert performance than in his reading of Beethoven's concerto in Symphony hall Friday afternoon.

Mr. Witek's tone was one to blend with the general body of orchestral tone rather than to stand out from it, and his phrasing consequently took sharp outline only in his unaccompanied cadenzas. His legato is one of his especial characteristics. Compare it with that of his associate at the first desk of the violins, Mr. Noack, who showed his solo gifts at a concert last season.

Mr. Witek's legato has not the dimpled morning calm of Sylvain Noack's, it has a sparkling afternoon ripple.

There is exhilaration in Mr. Witek's playing, but it never lashes the waves to fury.

You cannot, however, call the new concertmaster a passionless solo interpreter.

In one of his pianissimo moments of Friday afternoon he lifted his audience to an emotional height that is only possible for an artist who knows how men feel when they aspire.

Program of the concert: Schubert, andante from the "Unfinished" symphony, in memoriam Julia Ward Howe; Brahms, symphony in F major, No. 3, op. 90; Beethoven, concerto for violin in D major, op. 61; Strube, comedy overture, "Puck." Soloist, Anton Witek.

(Photo by Chickering.)
ANTON WITEK.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SUNDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1910.

Its Symphony Orchestra Foremost Organization of Its Kind in World. New Opera House One of Finest and Its Schools Lead the Country.

BOSTON is the musical centre of America to-day as it was the literary centre of the country a generation ago, and as it still is the home of a great cultured population.

In Europe Boston is considered as the only Amerian city whose appreciation of music can be compared with the European capitals. This view is the result of impressions by hundreds of foreign musicians who have toured the United States, and, on going home, told their friends what they thought of it. It is partly caused by the reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an organization which the greatest German and French conductors have declared to be incomparable.

It is justified by the existence here of the finest orchestra in the world, of an opera of the very first rank, of several great musical schools drawing pupils from all parts of the world and because it is the residence of a very large, very intelligent and very discerning musical population.

It is estimated that there are more than 20,000 music students in Boston and vicinity, including all who study with private teachers as well as those who attend the New England Consorvatory of Music, the Whitney School, the Faelten School and numerous other institutions where music is taught.

Many Noted Musicians Make Home in Boston.

In Boston lives a group of American composers, and a number of distinguished European musicians make their home here. It is a city where the chamber concert and the recital flourish as nowhere else in the United States. Considering its population it is amazing the number of musical institutions and teachers who are supported by Boston, while orchestral concerts are more largely attended here than elsewhere in America, and Boston possesses the only supporting opera in the world.

The Puritan founders of Boston affected to despise music and all other arts as vanities and useless in the sight of God. For many years they resisted the introduction of hymn tunes into their churches as smacking of popery and ritualism. They clung to their prejudice tightly and gave way slowly to the influx of modern thought. Yet it is a remarkable fact that the first great singing society in the United States was established in Boston, grand opera was performed here in the early years of the nineteenth century, and flourished, while New York refused to accept it, and the rest of the country didn't know anything about it.

Once Established, Music Made Rapid Strides Here.

Once established in Boston, music made rapid strides, assisted no doubt by the remarkable literary and artistic colony that dwelt here during the middle years of the nineteenth century.

Oratorio quickly became popular, and for nearly a hundred years the Handel and Hadyn Society, with its choir of 400 voices, has given several concerts each Winter. The Cecelia Society, with a chorus of 125, the Apollo Club, a male choir of sixty, and similar organizations has fostered oratorio and cantata here for several generations, and these organizations are reinforced to-day by the People's Choral Union, a chorus of 400 which gives the standard oratorios in excellent style.

Back in the sixties the Harvard Musical Society was established and an orchestra of some forty or fifty pieces came into being. This was the foundation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two names are pre-eminent as patrons of music in Boston—those of Major Henry L. Higginson, who established the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Eben D. Jordan, who built the Boston Opera House and founded the Boston Opera Company. Mr. Jordan's benefaction is recent. Major Higgonson's dates back thirty years.

Established Symphony Orchestra at Own Cost.

Major Higginson fought through the Civil War and at its close went into business. His early education had been along musical lines, and he found time to study music abroad before devoting himself to a banker's career. He inherited wealth and largely increased it. In 1880 every large city in Europe supported a good orchestra, but there wasn't an organization of the sort in the United States. To be sure, for important occasions, an orchestra of 100 musicians could be formed in New York or Boston, but they were many of them incompetent and none of them accustomed to perform great orchestral works.

Out of his private purse, Major Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. It consisted of sixty men, and George Henshel, a local baritone, was the first conductor. Major Higginson quickly saw that local musicians were not sufficient in numbers or skill to compose a grand orchestra, and he sent agents to Europe to hire the best performers on the various instruments. Gericke was imported to conduct the next year and he brought with him a number of splendid players.

Every year for a term of years Major Higginson imported players until his orchestra had grown to nearly a hundred and included the finest performers upon all instruments there were in the world.

Has Won Great Following All Over the Country.

In the meantime the orchestra was having a hard time getting public support. The American people didn't know much about symphonic compositions and didn't think it liked them. It took years to educate the people of Boston. The cost of the great orchestra to Major Higginson during this period must have been enormous, but he never complained and never divulged what he was spending upon it. He signed checks for the deficit, authorized Gericke to import new high priced players, and never faltered until he had secured an orchestra that critics declared to be unequalled anywhere.

The Symphony is now in its thirtieth year. It has won a great following all over the country and in spite of its tremendous cost is almost self-supporting. Its conductors have included the most famous of modern leaders. Nikisch, now the idol of Berlin, Pauer, Dr. Muck and Max Fielder have succeeded Mr. Gericke.

It gives twenty-four concerts and twenty-four rehearsals in Symphony Hall each season and plays in other cities

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1910

The Symphony Orchestra will depart next Sunday night on its first journey of the season to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and incidentally Hartford. Mr. Fiedler has made Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor—to be played in Baltimore and in New York—Brahms's symphony in F major— to be played in Philadelphia, New York and Brooklyn—and Mr. Strube's overture, "Puck"— to be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and New York—the chief items in his programmes, with Schumann's overtures to "Manfred" and to "Genoveva." Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and Sibelius's "Finlandia" for the incidental pieces to be oftenest repeated. In Baltimore and in Philadelphia Mme. Melba will assist the orchestra and at one concert in New York Miss Farrar will be the singer.

BOSTON JOURNAL NOVEMBER 5. 1910.

GERALDINE FARRAR SINGS AT SYMPHONY

Wins Genuine Enthusiasm by Dramatic Presentation of Mozart Work.

COSTUME SERVES TO ATTRACT MANY

Hat, With Its Snug Body and Trail of Feathers, Gives Aboriginal Effect.

Geraldine Farrar made her first appearance of the season here as soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The hall was filled, but though there were no dukes present, the enthusiasm over her singing was not intense. Miss Farrar appears to better advantage on the stage than on the platform, and when on the platform she does her varied gifts more justice when the atmosphere is more favorable than it is at a Symphony concert. Her most successful appearances in concert have been made when the audiences were free to ask more than what the program offered. Encores are not permitted at Symphony concerts. Paderewski is the only artist who makes this rule as dead lettered as the ordinance requiring women to take off their hats.

Miss Farrar sang the air, "Ah! pour moi quelle peine extreme," from Isouard's "Peannot et Colin," an opera produced in Paris in 1814 and not heard of for the last fifty years or more, and the recitative "Misero, o sogno" and air "Aura, che intorno," which Mozart wrote in 1783 for the tenor Adamberger. Dr. Karl Muck, the former leader of the Symphony Orchestra, rearranged the Mozart number for Miss Farrar's use. The Isouard number made only a moderate impression, for much of it lies in the high part of Miss Farrar's voice, which is the least effective part. It is a question whether the song was worth reviving. But in the Mozart piece Miss Farrar displayed some of the remarkable dramatic power that has made her one of the notable prima donnas of the day. She was altogether happy in her choice of such a number no less than in her performance of it, and this time the applause was genuinely enthusiastic.

As usual, Miss Farrar's dress and hat made something like a sensation. During the first number the women in the audience were perceptibly distracted. The general opinion was Melrose's favorite daughter suggested the Princess Pocahontas at the English court. The hat, with its snug body and trail of feathers, certainly looked aboriginal.

The orchestra gave a splendid repetition of the Rachmaninoff symphony, played here for the first time three weeks ago. The chaconne and rigadon from Monsigny's "Ballet Heroique," "Aline, Reine de Golconde," produced at the Opera in Paris during the days when Bostonians were becoming insurgent over the Stamp Act, proved to be a delightful diversion. The other orchestral number on the program was Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. At the concerts on Nov. 18 and 19 the soloist will be Carlo Buonamici, the distinguished Boston pianist. Henry Hadley's symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay," will be performed, with the composer conducting.

[49]

GERALDINE FARRAR IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Geraldine Farrar, the beautiful soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will be Miss Farrar's only appearance in concert this season in Boston, although she will be heard here later in opera.

The Farrar concerts with the Symphony always bring unusual demands for seats and the management asserts that it would be possible to sell Symphony Hall twice over on these occasions.

Miss Farrar will bring two new works as her solo numbers, both of them belonging to the school of the eighteenth century, although one was not composed until the early years of the nineteenth century. Her first number will be an air from the opera comique "Jeanot et Colin," by Nicholas Isouard which was produced in Paris in 1814. Her second number will be a concert aria by Mozart which she discovered last Spring. Its opening words are "Misero, O Segno, O son desto," and all that is known about it is that it was probably sung at a concert in Vienna for the benefit of the Pensions gesellschofft in 1783. The aria was condensed and orchestrated for Miss Farrar by Dr. Muck.

The Symphony will be Rachmaninoff's Second, which will be repeated in response to a very general request. The tremendous impression made by the first performance of this great work three weeks ago is the reason for its early repetition.

There will be a novelty in the programme in an adagio and fugue by Mozart. The fugue was originally written for the piano and when Mozart rewrote it for orchestra he preceded it by this adagio. The final number will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, makes the following announcement regarding the three concerts which will be given by the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra during the coming Winter under the direction of Max Fiedler. The concerts will be given on Thursday evening, Dec. 1, Thursday evening, Feb. 16, and Good Friday evening, April 14.

At the first concert the first part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be heard for the first time in Boston.

At the second concert on Thursday, Feb. 16, Pierne's "The Children's Crusade" which has already been given here with such success by the Cecilia Society, will be the work. The soloists engaged are Edmont Clemont, the distinguished French tenor, who last year was a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano, Edith Chapman Gould, soprano, and Claude Cunningham, bass. There will also be a chorus of one hundred children trained by Professor Hadley of Somerville..

The final concert on Good Friday evening will bring the performance of "The Passion According to Matthew" by Johann Sebastian Bach. The soloists will be Marie Zimmerman, soprano, Janet Spender, contralto, George Hamlin, tenor, and David Bispham, baritone.

GERALDINE FARRAR

MISS FARRAR THE SOLOIST

Sings Two Rare Songs at the Symphony.

Rachmaninoff's Symphony Is Repeated by Request.

Brilliant Rendition by Conductor Fiedler.

Miss Geraldine Farrar was soloist at the fifth symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon. She sang two unfamiliar airs, neither of which in all probability has been heard before in Boston. They were the air which Therese sings at the opening of act 3 in the light opera, "Jeannot et Colin," by Nicolo Isouard, or Nicolo of Malta, as he was usually known, and the recitation and aria "Misero! o sogno," by Mozart.

By request, Mr Fiedler repeated Rachmaninoff's 2d symphony, first heard here a fortnight ago. The other orchestral numbers were the Chaconne and Rigadon from Monsigny's opera, "Aline, Reine de Golconde," and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Miss Farrar does not seek to conceal her fondness for the exotic and the unexplored. She has not been content to follow old custom in the choice of songs.

Last year she sang a piece written for a man but the air of Azael in Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," is essentially lyric and was not unsuited to her. But the Mozart aria of yesterday is heroic and was written for dramatic tenor. In this instance her search for an antique novelty has led her to attempt something not easily to be associated with the qualities of a woman's voice and style. It would be as incongruous for a baritone to sing Saint-Saens' voluptuous aria for Dalilah.

Within Her Range.

In the aria from "Jeannot et Colin," on the other hand, Miss Farrar kept within the possibilities, but in giving the piece its just and characterizing color she used a quality of tone which is not beautiful.

The grief of Therese over her departed lover is not the grief of prostration, of the faltering and decline of the physical functions. She finds a sweet melancholy in nursing her sorrow, but it is not beyond assuagement. He will come again and, more than that, he will be faithful.

The air is plaintive and has prettiness and delicacy of outline. It is intimately feminine music and invites the grace and soft languor of femininity. To match its naive humor Miss Farrar evaded the quality of voice which denotes depth and sincerity of passion, and used the puerile color of tone which the voice-builder would call "white."

Miss Farrar is adept in drawing the clear, cool line of a phrase in quaint or archaic music. Her voice itself is essentially lyric. She can make tones surge softly up to a medium of loudness sound beautiful. Had she permitted Therese a richer and less unsophisticated tone yesterday she would have given her audience greater pleasure.

Mozart Recitative.

In the recitative of the Mozart and in the first or quieter portion of the aria Miss Farrar's tones were often beautiful. Here the singing actress was characterizing by voice the grief of a lover, who upon awakening finds prison walls intervening between him and his beloved.

Here is the tragic utterance of strong man. The more contemplative part of the aria was within Miss Farrar's grasp vocally. The latter part, which carries the hero to the very ecstasy of frenzied grief, was not. The pace here is rapid, the line of the melody high and unsparing.

The singer may not have been in good voice on a day of such unescapable weather, but her tones in the upper register became piteously strident when forced to loudness, and there was but meager suggestion of the furor which demands the robust qualities of the male singer.

After both appearances Miss Farrar was called repeatedly to acknowledge applause.

Mr. Fiedler conducted the symphony with unprecedented resilience and glow. Accent struck fire. There was undue rapidity at times, but there was the surge of passion in it.

The audience responded with long and general applause, recalling Mr. Fiedler, who bade his men stand and receive the tribute with him.

The bigness of this symphony grows more difficult to define. This is not music of today or tomorrow. It speaks of the eternal mystery of life. It will be heard by the unversed in music and will be understood, and therein lies the wonder of it.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Miss Farrar Will Be the Soloist.

Interesting Program Promised For Next Symphony Concert.

Recital by Mme Sembrich--Cecilia Announcements.

Geraldine Farrar will return for her annual engagement with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the rehearsal and concert on Friday and Saturday of this week.

The Rachmaninoff symphony No. 2, heard a fortnight ago, will be repeated by request. The other orchestral numbers announced are: A Chaconne and Rigadon from Monsigny's "Aline," and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Miss Farrar is tending toward the choice of quaint and even archaic music for her songs, even as Mr Kreisler chose in similar fashion his violin pieces. She also shows a predisposition for arias written for a tenor. Last year it was that of Azael in "L'Enfant Prodigue" of Debussy. This year it will be "Misero! O sogno, o son desto?" a concert aria written by Mozart in 1783.

It pictures a lover awakening in prison. In the agitated recitative which precedes the aria, he storms against his fate. In a slow movement which follows, his thoughts turn to his adored for whom he suffers. It is a romanza of warmth and feeling. The allegro, which concludes, expresses horror and anguish.

Mozart wrote the aria for the tenor Adamberger. It is virile and manly, as is all the music which he composed for this singer.

Valentin Adamberger (1743-1804) sang in Italy under the name Adamonti. He was recalled to Vienna by Emperor Joseph II, an amateur in music of no mean ability, who wished to found a German school of opera to supersede the inane and artificial Italian opera which flourished.

To that end he commissioned Mozart to write an opera on the "Elopement from the Seraglio," libretto by Bretzner.

The opera is sometimes called "Belmont and Constanze." Mozart wrote the role of Belmont especially for Adamberger, to whose abilities as singer and actor much of the success of the piece was attributable.

Mozart's letters contain frequent allusions to Adamberger, which invariably testify to the high esteem in which the composer held him both as friend and artist. The time had not long passed since male sopranos were in vogue. Otto Jahn, in his life of Mozart, adds that Adamberger was a "very respectable actor of lovers' parts."

The aria which Miss Farrar will do has been rescored by Dr Muck.

The second solo number will be from "Jeannot et Colin," by Nicolo Isouard, or Nicolo of Malta as he is usually known, the title denoting his birthplace. The opera was produced in 1814.

The announcements from Symphony hall give this number simply as "Aria from 'Jeannot et Colin.'" It is probably that by Therese which begins the third act. An adagio permits the heroine to lament the loss of Colin's love, to urge the emptiness of wealth and luxury alone, and to protest her desire for her lover's presence. In an agitated allegro she brightens with the belief that he will return faithful.

The aria is accompanied by two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons and string quintet. In his score Nicolo placed the violins and viola at the top of the page above the wood wind; other instruments are as usual.

Nicolo followed Gretry in the early French school, but was effaced by Auber and Boieldieu. He wrote best when under the whip of competition with the latter, who also wrote an opera with a title "Jeannot et Colin." When Boieldieu was elected by the institute to succeed Mehul, Nicolo felt the slight keenly and sought to forget his chagrin in dissipation.

He had been educated for the navy. In Paris his friends were Kreutzer and Charles William Etienne, who wrote librettos for many of his operas, "Jeannot and Colin" among them.

Mme Sembrich's Concert Tomorrow Afternoon.

Tomorrow afternoon in Symphony hall the great artist, Mme Sembrich, will give her annual song recital, which is announced as the only one to be given by her in Boston this season. Many of her selections are unfamiliar and but three composers will be represented in her program, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms.

The numbers are: From Schubert, "Fruhlingsglaube," "Der Fischer," "Fruhlingssehnsucht," "Das sie rier gewesen," "An eine Quelle," "Du bist die Ruh," "Ungeruld." From Schumann, "Im wunderschonen Monat Mai," "Aus meinen Thranen spriessen," "Die Rose, die Lilie," "Wenn ich in deine Augen sem'," "Ich will meine Seele tauchen," "Er ist's," "Die Lotusblume," "Er, der herrlichste von Allen," "Schneeglockchen," "Der Sandmann," "Fruhlingsnacht."

From Brahms, "Es liebt sich so lieblich im Lenze," "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," "Botschraft," "Schon war, das ich dir weihte," "Das Madchen spricht," "Vorschneller Schwur."

Cecilia Programs With the Symphony Orchestra.

Manager Ellis announced the dates upon which the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Cecilia society will give concerts this season in the new alliance effected between the two organizations last spring. The concerts will be given Thursday, Dec 1; Thursday, Feb 16, and Good Friday evening, April 14.

At the first concert part I of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be heard for the first time in Boston. This work was recently performed at the Worcester festival. It will require the services of the entire orchestra of 100 men and the soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris Jr, tenor, and Robert Maitland, basso.

At the second concert Thursday, Feb 16, Pierne's "The Children's Crusade," which was given here by the Cecilia society three years ago, will be repeated. The soloists are to be Edmont Clemont, the distinguished French tenor, who last year was a member of the Metropolitan opera company; Mme Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Edith Chapman Gould, soprano, and Claude Cunningham, bass. There will also be a chorus of 100 children, trained by Prof Hadley of Somerville.

The final concert on Good Friday evening will bring the performance of "The Passion According to Matthew," by Johann Sebastian Bach. For this the soloists will be Marie Zimmerman, soprano, generally regarded as the most skilled Bach singer in this country; Janet Spencer, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor, and David Bispham, baritone.

The Cecilia society under the new plans will consist of 175 trained voices. The preliminary training will be done by Malcolm Lang. The final rehearsal will be under the direct charge of Mr Fiedler, who will conduct the concerts. It is expected that these concerts will be the most successful of their kind ever given in Boston.

The subscription sale for the three concerts will open at Symphony hall Monday Nov 14.

MONITOR, BOSTON NOVEMBER 5, 1910.

The Boston Symphony orchestra makes its first southern trip of the season the week of Nov. 7. The soloists of the trip are Mme. Melba, Miss Margaret Keyes. Mme. Jomelli and Miss Geraldine Farrar. The symphonies are the Rachmaninoff No. 2 and the Brahms No. 2 and No. 3.

* * *

Rachmaninoff's second symphony stands at the head of the Cambridge symphony program of Thursday evening, Nov. 17. Bruch's violin concerto in G minor is the solo number. Miss Bessie Bell Collier is the soloist.

Josef Hofmann appears in piano recital at Symphony hall Monday afternoon, Nov. 14, at 2:30 o'clock.

* * *

RECORD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1910

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony orchestra will leave Sunday night on the first Southern trip of the season. It will rejoice the friends of the orchestra to know that all records for subscriptions have been broken in New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, and that in Philadelphia the orchestra is not far from the place it held a number of years ago, when there was not a seat to be had in the Academy of Music for single concerts.

The recital of piano music which Josef Hofmann is to give in Symphony hall on Nov. 14, should fill the hall with those who are interested directly or indirectly in piano playing. Hofmann has not been in Boston for a matter of seven years, and in that time he has developed so much that he may well be considered one of the few really great pianists in the world.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Public Interest and Favor That Mr. Witek Has Won at a Single Stroke—Henry Hadley to Conduct in His Own Music at the Symphony Concerts—The Delayed Constantino—Mr. Copeland's Programme—The Sayings of Miss Farrar

MR. WITEK, by his playing of Beethoven's concerto at the Symphony Concerts of last week, has at a stroke stirred public interest as none of his predecessors among the concertmasters of the orchestra were fortunate enough to do. Mr. Kneisel came to the post as a young and unknown violinist, discovered by Mr. Gericke, and as he developed, so public interest and approval for him waxed. Mr. Hess, with all his brilliance, had also slowly to make his way. The performance of a single concerto, on the other hand, has established Mr. Witek. Two circumstances aided him: Beethoven's concerto had not been played at the Symphony Concerts for four years, so that the music seemed fresh again; while the violinist himself made it seem the more unhackneyed by a performance that sought a relatively novel end. Oftenest, heretofore, the violinists have "interpreted" the concerto to the utmost. They have read their own passion for an eloquent performance into the music and given it an emotional stress that it hardly bears. They would have it of the mighty Beethoven, and not of the composer who could "also," in Whistler's phrase, write a concert piece for a virtuoso. He wrote it, of course, with distinction, with musical imagination, with sensitive feeling for the instrument; but he wrote it, believedly, with no thought of a passionate symphonic eloquence. With a just discernment, that praises Mr. Witek's understanding, the violinist so played the music. He sought its continence of design and expression; he cherished its beauty as musical sound with the violin for its voice. He sought and cherished equally the beauty of his instrument. The fineness, the sweetness, the edgeless quality of his tone caressed the ears of his hearers. The sensitiveness to abstract musical beauty with which he rounded his phrases, led and shaded melodies, answered or joined the orchestral voices, wove patterns of ornament—and all unclouded by any technical slip—seemed the counterpart of this tone, while a delicate warmth of feeling saved his playing from any suspicion of polished lifelessness. His two audiences departed content, not merely with the revelation of a remarkable [illegible], but of a violinist who could make a much "interpreted" classic speak with unforced voice. They have talked much of him and his performance since.

Henry Hadley's second symphony, which the Boston, the Chicago, and the Damrosch orchestras are all undertaking this month will be played here at the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 18 and 19. Mr. Fiedler, like Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch, has invited Mr. Hadley to conduct in his own music, and Mr. Hadley has accepted the invitation. At Mayence in Germany, where he was the chief conductor at the opera house, and more recently at Seattle, where he is the director of a symphony orchestra, Mr. Hadley has had his experience. Here in Boston, he has not conducted since his student years; but as a composer his tone-poem of "Salome and his first symphony have praised him.

Mr. Baermann, the esteemed pianist among an elder generation of Bostonians whom the younger knows too little because of his infrequent appearances in public, announces a recital for the evening of Wednesday, Nov. 9, in Jordan Hall, for the students of the New England Conservatory, where he teaches. His programme runs through a Prelude and Fugue by Bach, Beethoven's "Waldstein" sonata, a Rondo by Mozart, a Study by Scarlatti, a Study by Chopin, Liszt's transcription of Schumann's song of the linden tree, Liszt's own "Venice and Naples" and a "Pathetic Polonaise" by the pianist himself. The more the pity that the concert is not open to Mr. Baermann's wider public.

Mr. Constantino, in the venturesome spirit born of much public favor in Buenos Ayres and Santiago last summer and this autumn, risked the precarious fortunes of a journey from Valparaiso to Boston, up the west coast of South America, across the Isthmus and thence to New York. Almost inevitably he missed his connections at Panama and he will not reach Boston in time to appear as Faust in "Mefistofele" at the first performance next Monday of the second season at the opera house. Mr. Lasselle, the young French tenor, will undertake the part for the first time and after only a week of preparation. Mr. Constantino is confidently expected for the representation of "Rigoletto," announced for the following Wednesday.

Here follows in full the programme for Mr. Copeland's concert on the evening of Thursday, Nov. 10, at Chickering Hall. By reason of the new Preludes by Debussey and the unfamiliar dances by Albeñiz, it is unusually interesting. It goes:

Les Vieux Seigneurs.....Couperin
Sonata No. I.—Sonata No. V.—Capriccio.Scarlatti
Nocturne, Op. 37.—Valse, Op. 70.—Ballade, No. 1.....Chopin
La Soirée dans Grenade.....Debussy
Des pas sur la neige.—Minstrels.—Volles.—La sérenade interrompue.—Le Cathédrale engloutie.—La Danse de Puck.....Debussy
Danzas Espagnoles. Tango.—El Puerto.—.....Albeñiz

Miss Farrar returned to New York yesterday from Berlin, and she will proceed forthwith to Boston, where she will sing at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. To the waiting reporters, she commented with more impatience than good taste upon the marriagable qualities of dukes and less highly placed persons; repeated the announcement that she will have Ariane in Dukas's "Ariane et Barbe-Bleue" and the princess in Humperdinck's "Konigskinder" for her new parts next winter at the Metropolitan; professed eagerness to reappear as Elisabeth and Juliet, and confided the familiar impression of all those that come into personal contact with the German emperor—that "he is a remarkable personality."

Discovered at Last—Disputations aside, there is much splendid orchestral utterance in "Also sprach Zarathustra," and any music lover can enjoy hearing it. [W. J. Henderson in the New York Sun.

THE BOSTON HERALD NOVEMBER 5, 1910

GERALDINE FARRAR SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Crowded Hall and Much Enthusiasm at Fifth Rehearsal —Rachmaninoff Repeated.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fifth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Geraldine Farrar was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony, E minor, No. 2...Rachmaninoff
Air from "Jeannot and Colin"...Isouard
Chaconne and Rigadon...Monsigny-Gevaert
"Misero! o sogno" and.....
"Aura, che intorno".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphony, played here for the first time at the second concert of this season, was repeated yesterday at the request of many. Seldom has an unfamiliar composition of so great porportions gained immediately such popularity. When an opera singer of wide-spread reputation sings at a Symphony concert the audience is usually impatient until she sings for the first time, and restless during the orchestral piece that precedes her second solo. Composers have often suffered cruelly thus sandwiched. The concert is then turned into a prima donna's festival, and the composers of the orchestral pieces, the orchestra and the conductor are butchered to make a singer's holiday. No wonder that there are conductors who are bitterly opposed against the appearance of a prima donna at a Symphony concert.

Yesterday Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphony was first on the program. The composition is a long one; it lasts about an hour; but there was no sign of restlessness; the music was evidently enjoyed; there was hearty applause, applause that was more than an expression of courtesy; and at the end the applause was enthusiastic and long continued, so that Mr. Fiedler was recalled and the orchestra with him acknowledged the tribute to a superb performance. A prima donna, if envy ever dwells in the heart of one, might well have envied the composer, the conductor and the players.

The symphony was reviewed in The Herald at length when it was first played here and so short a time has elapsed that it is not now necessary to dwell upon the character of the work. As before the first two movements seemed by far the strongest, architecturally and emotionally. Again the third movement seemed insufferably long drawn out and sentimental. The fourth movement gained on a second hearing. It had a more decided profile and seemed less episodic.

Themes of Singular Beauty.

The reasons for the popularity of this symphony are not far to seek. The themes are eminently melodious, and some of them are of singular beauty; there is rich coloring; there are beautiful nuances in color; there is impressive sonority; there are frequent and sharp contrasts in sentiment, rhythm, expression; there is stirring vitality. Mr. Rachmaninoff in this symphony is romantic in the old and accustomed forms. He does not surprise or perplex by experiments in harmony; his form is essentially academic and traditional. Here is another case of new wine in old leather bottles, but first of all the bottles were put in thorough order, patched, strengthened, cleaned.

Instantaneous popularity often indicates some weakness in a composition. It will be interesting to watch the life of this symphony. There was a time when Raff's "Lenore" was as rapturously applauded. The most extravagant things were said about it. Raff, too, had uncommon contrapuntal skill; he, too, was a fecund melodist; he, too, had a pretty sense of color in his day. And what, pray, has become of Raff's Lenore?" It is in the great cemetery of orchestral compositions buried snugly with its heroine and her Wilhelm.

Let us enjoy, however, the gifts the gods give us and not indulge ourselves in gloomy thoughts. Mr. Rachmaninoff has written beautiful and eloquent music in this symphony. He has shown technical skill and revealed an emotional side that he has concealed in other compositions. Whether he would show inspiration outside of traditional forms; whether he has imagination in sufficient degree to shape wondrous thoughts in a freer form and be a law not only to himself, but to his hearers—these are questions that are not now necessary, nor would it be pertinnent to compare this symphony with Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which was played at the last concert; for, in the first place, the works are wholly disparate.

Old French Treasure House.

Miss Farrar again went to the old French treasure-house of Opera Comique for an air and again she chose for her second selection a recitative and an aria composed originally for a tenor. Last season she sang music by Gretry and Debussy. Yesterday she brought out the air of Therese, "Ah! pour moi quelle peine extreme" from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin" and music written by Mozart for the tenor Adamberger. She sang the first with the appropriate simplicity and earnestness, with [illegible] emotion that [illegible] has

The music by Mozart had been abridged for her by Dr. Muck, and it is said that he revised the instrumentation of the accompaniment. The original recitative is very long, and the air too may well be shortened. Miss Farrar at once made a fitting distinction between the lightness of Isouard's style, the sprightliness even in sorrow of the old Opera Comique and the grand style of the Italian recitative. She declaimed this recitative admirably, and she added beauty by tonal richness to the exquisite opening phrase of the air "Aura, che intorno." This opening is the most expressive part of the air. There are measures afterward of sheer formula according to the period. Miss Farrar was naturally not so effective in these formulas as in the emotional recitative or in the purely lyric portions of the air.

The dances from Monsigny's "Aline" were a fitting part of the archaic intermezzo between the modern symphonic romanticism of Rachmaninoff and the dramatic romanticism of Beethoven, that is for all time. These dances, with the songs of Isouard and Mozart, furnished a strong contrast by their old world flavor.

The program of the concerts Nov. 18-19 will be as follows: Symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay," by Henry Hadley (first time here; conducted by the composer); Chopin's concerto in F minor for piano (Mr. Carlo Buonamici, pianist); Tschaikowsky's suite in G major, No. 3. There will be no concerts next week.

BOSTON POST, NOVEMBER 5 1910

Farrar Wears Xmas Tree Hat

Hundreds Turned Away in Rush to Hear Singer at Symphony Hall

Yesterday morning, at 8:30, a solitary figure huddled close to a pillar on the wind and rain-swept steps of Symphony Hall.

By 9 o'clock about one dozen umbrellas, with billowing skirts beneath, were exuding large raindrops. The first pair of trousers ventured up about 30 minutes past 10 o'clock.

HUNDREDS JOIN THRONG

By that time there must have been 200 in line. At 12 o'clock the line curled back and forth along the rows of the broad steps and stretched from the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues around the corner of Gainsboro street, a full block away.

Geraldine Farrar was coming.

There are 525 "rush seats" in the upper balcony of Symphony Hall. From 12 o'clock on each street car brought more hopeless groups, some of which walked a block and a half and attached themselves to the end of that line, and others who came, saw, and went away with indignant expressions. The crowd seethed and swayed, and it was all that the officials could do to keep the prospective procession in order until the doors opened at 1 o'clock.

Then 525 quarters dropped in a waiting bag as the lucky members filed in decorously enough, then tried to pass each other on the way upstairs for the sake of the best view and the nearest seat to lovely Geraldine.

Bring Their Lunch

Seated upstairs, lunch baskets appeared in some quarters. There was gossip of all sorts, and there were crumbs in Symphony programmes. Then the lights were turned higher, the audience of season subscribers commenced to file in, the stage brightened, the orchestra appeared by degrees, and the joyously discordant din of tuning up lasted until Mr. Longy, the oboe of the orchestra, gave out the 'A' to which the orchestra tunes. Shortly after Mr. Fiedler appeared, to conduct one of the most brilliant performances in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler was compelled to return and acknowledge stormy applause after the symphony by Rachmaninoff, and the orchestra players had finally to rise with him. All this was good, but it is safe to say that not one woman out of ten profited by the following intermission to leave her seat, for fear that she might miss the first glimpse of Geraldine and her concert costume.

When the bell rang which announced the end of the intermission, there was dead silence, and women almost rose to their feet when Boston's songstress tripped on the stage.

And what did Miss Farrar wear? She wore a gown of which the general shade was pink, and the general impression oriental. This gown was touched with black velvet. The waist line had a hint of a bolero effect. The tunic skirt—notwithstanding Miss Farrar's late outspoken objections to skirts of the "hobble" variety—was slightly "hobbled" about six inches from the floor, with a strip of gray fur. The fur matched the color of a chinchilla muff of the very latest, most ultra-modern creation, trimmed with a gray satin bow at the lower end. And the skirt had a train.

Miss Farrar's hat, which made such a celebrated sensation when she sang with the Symphony Orchestra about this time last year, has not been forgotten. Lacking technical phraseology, that hat reminded the witness somewhat of the plumes of a parrot. Well, the hat that Miss Farrar wore yesterday was a "bucket" hat, with something that might have been a much exaggerated black aigrette on the top, and which looked like a young Christmas tree. Nor was the hat ignored after the performance. It, as well as Miss Farrar, received recalls, and there was an ovation when the singer finally shook hands with Mr. Fiedler, and bowed herself from the stage with the girlish grace which all know so well, so well.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
NOVEMBER 6, 1910

Joseph Hofmann Coming.

The recital of piano music which Josef Hofmann is to give in Symphony hall a week from tomorrow afternoon should attract a large audience. Hofmann today is one of the very few great pianists in the world and it is several years since he was heard here last.

The program will begin with the opus 111, Beethoven. Then will come the seldom heard scherzo in E minor by Mendelssohn, which will be followed by Schumann's C major fantasia. His second part will be devoted to Chopin, the G minor ballad, E flat major nocturne, A flat major valse and B minor scherzo, and his program will end with three Liszt pieces, "Funerailles," "Consolation" and "Campanella."

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony orchestra leaves for Philadelphia tonight on its first southern trip of the season. Tomorrow evening it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening in New York, Friday evening in Brooklyn, Saturday afternoon in New York and the following Monday evening in Hartford.

Mme Melba will be the soloist in Philadelphia, Baltimore and at the matinee concert in New York; Miss Geraldine Farrar will open the New York season by being soloist at the concert Thursday evening. In Washington the soloist will be Miss Margaret Keys, in Brooklyn Mme Jomelli, in Hartford Mme Berta Morena.

BOSTON JOURNAL
NOVEMBER 6, 1910.

"OMAR KHAYYAM"

The association of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of three concerts, with Max Fiedler as conductor, will open a new epoch in choral music in this city. The Cecilia Society has for several weeks been rehearsing for the first concert on Dec. 1, when Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be given, and Mr. Fiedler has already had the chorus under his hand. In the work of rehearsing he is assisted by Malcolm Lang. In "Omar Khayyam" the soloists will be Margaret Keyes, George Harris, Jr., and Robert Maitland, an Englishman, who comes highly recommended by the composer.

HOFMANN RECITAL

Josef Hofmann will give a recital at Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow afternoon. Hofmann today is one of the very few great pianists in the world, and it is several years since he was heard here last. The program which he will play here begins with the Opus III., by Beethoven. Then will come the seldom heard Scherzo in E minor, by Mendelssohn, which will be followed by Schumann's C major Fantasia. The second part will be devoted to Chopin—the G minor ballade, E flat major nocturne, A flat major valse and the B minor scherzo—and at the end will come three Liszt pieces, "Funerailles," "Consolation" and the "Campanella."

[51]

T[illegible]SCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER [illegible], 1910

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Public Interest and Favor That Mr. Witek Has Won at a Single Stroke—Henry Hadley to Conduct in His Own Music at the Symphony Concerts—The Delayed Constantino—Mr. Copeland's Programme—The Sayings of Miss Farrar

MR. WITEK, by his playing of Beethoven's concerto at the Symphony Concerts of last week, has at a stroke stirred public interest as none of his predecessors among the concertmasters of the orchestra were fortunate enough to do. Mr. Kneisel came to the post as a young and unknown violinist, discovered by Mr. Gericke, and as he developed, so public interest and approval for him waxed. Mr. Hess, with all his brilliance, had also slowly to make his way. The performance of a single concerto, on the other hand, has established Mr. Witek. Two circumstances aided him: Beethoven's concerto had not been played at the Symphony Concerts for four years, so that the music seemed fresh again; while the violinist himself made it seem the more unhackneyed by a performance that sought a relatively novel end. Oftenest, heretofore, the violinists have "interpreted" the concerto to the utmost. They have read their own passion for an eloquent performance into the music and given it an emotional stress that it hardly bears. They would have it of the mighty Beethoven, and not of the composer who could "also," in Whistler's phrase, write a concert piece for a virtuoso. He wrote it, of course, with distinction, with musical imagination, with sensitive feeling for the instrument; but he wrote it, believedly, with no thought of a passionate symphonic eloquence. With a just discernment, that praises Mr. Witek's understanding, the violinist so played the music. He sought its continence of design and expression; he cherished its beauty as musical sound with the violin for its voice. He sought and cherished equally the beauty of his instrument. The fineness, the sweetness, the edgeless quality of his tone caressed the ears of his hearers. The sensitiveness to abstract musical beauty with which he rounded his phrases, led and shaded melodies, answered or joined the orchestral voices, wove patterns of ornament—and all unclouded by any technical slip—seemed the counterpart of this tone, while a delicate warmth of feeling saved his playing from any suspicion of polished lifelessness. His two audiences departed content, not merely with the revelation of a remarkable [illegible], but of a violinist who could make a much "interpreted" classic speak with unforced voice. They have talked much of him and his performance since.

Henry Hadley's second symphony, which the Boston, the Chicago, and the Damrosch orchestras are all undertaking this month will be played here at the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 18 and 19. Mr. Fiedler, like Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch, has invited Mr. Hadley to conduct in his own music, and Mr. Hadley has accepted the invitation. At Mayence in Germany, where he was the chief conductor at the opera house, and more recently at Seattle, where he is the director of a symphony orchestra, Mr. Hadley has had his experience. Here in Boston, he has not conducted since his student years; but as a composer his tone-poem of "Salome and his first symphony have praised him.

Mr. Baermann, the esteemed pianist among an elder generation of Bostonians whom the younger knows too little because of his infrequent appearances in public, announces a recital for the evening of Wednesday, Nov. 9, in Jordan Hall, for the students of the New England Conservatory, where he teaches. His programme runs through a Prelude and Fugue by Bach, Beethoven's "Waldstein" sonata, a Rondo by Mozart, a Study by Scarlatti, a Study by Chopin, Liszt's transcription of Schumann's song of the linden tree, Liszt's own "Venice and Naples" and a "Pathetic Polonaise" by the pianist himself. The more the pity that the concert is not open to Mr. Baermann's wider public.

Mr. Constantino, in the venturesome spirit born of much public favor in Buenos Ayres and Santiago last summer and this autumn, risked the precarious fortunes of a journey from Valparaiso to Boston, up the west coast of South America, across the Isthmus and thence to New York. Almost inevitably he missed his connections at Panama and he will not reach Boston in time to appear as Faust in "Mefistofele" at the first performance next Monday of the second season at the opera house. Mr. Lasselle, the young French tenor, will undertake the part for the first time and after only a week of preparation. Mr. Constantino is confidently expected for the representation of "Rigoletto," announced for the following Wednesday.

Here follows in full the programme for Mr. Copeland's concert on the evening of Thursday, Nov. 10, at Chickering Hall. By reason of the new Preludes by Debussey and the unfamiliar dances by Albeñiz, it is unusually interesting. It goes:

Les Vieux Seigneurs.....Couperin
Sonata No. I.—Sonata No. V.—Capriccio.Scarlatti
Nocturne, Op. 37.—Valse, Op. 70.—Ballade, No. 1.....Chopin
La Soirée dans Grenade.....Debussy
Des pas sur la neige.—Minstrels.—Voiles.—La sérenade interrompue.—La Cathédrale engloutie.—La Danse de Puck.....Debussy
Danses Espagnoles. Tango.—El Puerto.—.....Albeñiz

Miss Farrar returned to New York yesterday from Berlin, and she will proceed forthwith to Boston, where she will sing at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. To the waiting reporters, she commented with more impatience than good taste upon the marriagable qualities of dukes and less highly placed persons; repeated the announcement that she will have Ariane in Dukas's "Ariane et Barbe-Bleue" and the princess in Humperdinck's "Konigskinder" for her new parts next winter at the Metropolitan; professed eagerness to reappear as Elisabeth and Juliet, and confided the familiar impression of all those that come into personal contact with the German emperor—that "he is a remarkable personality."

Discovered at Last—Disputations aside, there is much splendid orchestral utterance in "Also sprach Zarathustra," and any music lover can enjoy hearing it. [W. J. Henderson in the New York Sun.

THE BOSTON HERALD NOVEMBER 5, 1910

GERALDINE FARRAR SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Crowded Hall and Much Enthusiasm at Fifth Rehearsal —Rachmaninoff Repeated.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fifth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Geraldine Farrar was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony, E minor, No. 2...Rachmaninoff
Air from "Jeannot and Colin"...Isouard
Chaconne and Rigadon...Monsigny-Gevaert
"Misero! o sogno" and.....
"Aura, che intorno".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphony, played here for the first time at the second concert of this season, was repeated yesterday at the request of many. Seldom has an unfamiliar composition of so great porportions gained immediately such popularity. When an opera singer of wido-spread reputation sings at a Symphony concert the audience is usually impatient until she sings for the first time, and restless during the orchestral piece that precedes her second solo. Composers have often suffered cruelly thus sandwiched. The concert is then turned into a prima donna's festival, and the composers of the orchestral pieces, the orchestra and the conductor are butchered to make a singer's holiday. No wonder that there are conductors who are bitterly opposed against the appearance of a prima donna at a Symphony concert.

Yesterday Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphony was first on the program. The composition is a long one; it lasts about an hour; but there was no sign of restlessness; the music was evidently enjoyed; there was hearty applause, applause that was more than an expression of courtesy; and at the end the applause was enthusiastic and long continued, so that Mr. Fiedler was recalled and the orchestra with him acknowledged the tribute to a superb performance. A prima donna, if envy ever dwells in the heart of one, might well have envied the composer, the conductor and the players.

The symphony was reviewed in The Herald at length when it was first played here and so short a time has elapsed that it is not now necessary to dwell upon the character of the work. As before the first two movements seemed by far the strongest, architecturally and emotionally. Again the third movement seemed insufferably long drawn out and sentimental. The fourth movement gained on a second hearing. It had a more decided profile and seemed less episodic.

Themes of Singular Beauty.

The reasons for the popularity of this symphony are not far to seek. The themes are eminently melodious, and some of them are of singular beauty; there is rich coloring; there are beautiful nuances in color; there is impressive sonority; there are frequent and sharp contrasts in sentiment, rhythm, expression; there is stirring vitality. Mr. Rachmaninoff in this symphony is romantic in the old and accustomed forms. He does not surprise or perplex by experiments in harmony; his form is essentially academic and traditional. Here is another case of new wine in old leather bottles, but first of all the bottles were put in thorough order, patched, strengthened, cleaned.

Instantaneous popularity often indicates some weakness in a composition. It will be interesting to watch the life of this symphony. There was a time when Raff's "Lenore" was as rapturously applauded. The most extravagant things were said about it. Raff, too, had uncommon contrapuntal skill; he, too, was a fecund melodist; he, too, had a pretty sense of color in his day. And what, pray, has become of Raff's Lenore?" It is in the great cemetery of orchestral compositions buried snugly with its heroine and her Wilhelm.

Let us enjoy, however the gifts the gods give us and not indulge ourselves in gloomy thoughts. Mr. Rachmaninoff has written beautiful and eloquent music in this symphony. He has shown technical skill and revealed an emotional side that he has concealed in other compositions. Whether he would show inspiration outside of traditional forms; whether he has imagination in sufficient degree to shape wondrous thoughts in a freer form and be a law not only to himself, but to his hearers—these are questions that are not now necessary, nor would it be pertinnent to compare this symphony with Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which was played at the last concert; for, in the first place, the works are wholly disparate.

Old French Treasure House.

Miss Farrar again went to the old French treasure-house of Opera Comique for an air and again she chose for her second selection a recitative and an aria composed originally for a tenor. Last season she sang music by Gretry and Debussy. Yesterday she brought out the air of Therese, "Ah! pour moi quelle peine extreme" from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin" and music written by Mozart for the tenor Adamberger. She sang the first with the appropriate simplicity and earnestness, with the quiet emotion that was preferred [illegible] to pas-

The music by Mozart had been abridged for her by Dr. Muck, and it is said that he revised the instrumentation of the accompaniment. The original recitative is very long, and the air too may well be shortened. Miss Farrar at once made a fitting distinction between the lightness of Isouard's style, the sprightliness even in sorrow of the old Opera Comique and the grand style of the Italian recitative. She declaimed this recitative admirably, and she added beauty by tonal richness to the exquisite opening phrase of the air "Aura, che intorno." This opening is the most expressive part of the air. There are measures afterward of sheer formula according to the period. Miss Farrar was naturally not so effective in these formulas as in the emotional recitative or in the purely lyric portions of the air.

The dances from Monsigny's "Aline" were a fitting part of the archaic intermezzo between the modern symphonic romanticism of Rachmaninoff and the dramatic romanticism of Beethoven, that is for all time. These dances, with the songs of Isouard and Mozart, furnished a strong contrast by their old world flavor.

The program of the concerts Nov. 18-19 will be as follows: Symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay," by Henry Hadley (first time here; conducted by the composer); Chopin's concerto in F minor for piano (Mr. Carlo Buonamici, pianist); Tschaikowsky's suite in G major, No. 3. There will be no concerts next week.

BOSTON POST, NOVEMBER 5 1910

Farrar Wears Xmas Tree Hat

Hundreds Turned Away in Rush to Hear Singer at Symphony Hall

Yesterday morning, at 8:30, a solitary figure huddled close to a pillar on the wind and rain-swept steps of Symphony Hall.

By 9 o'clock about one dozen umbrellas, with billowing skirts beneath, were exuding large raindrops. The first pair of trousers ventured up about 30 minutes past 10 o'clock.

HUNDREDS JOIN THRONG

By that time there must have been 200 in line. At 12 o'clock the line curled back and forth along the rows of the broad steps and stretched from the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues around the corner of Gainsboro street, a full block away.

Geraldine Farrar was coming.

There are 525 "rush seats" in the upper balcony of Symphony Hall. From 12 o'clock on each street car brought more hopeless groups, some of which walked a block and a half and attached themselves to the end of that line, and others who came, saw, and went away with indignant expressions. The crowd seethed and swayed, and it was all that the officials could do to keep the prospective procession in order until the doors opened at 1 o'clock.

Then 525 quarters dropped in a waiting bag as the lucky members filed in decorously enough, then tried to pass each other on the way upstairs for the sake of the best view and the nearest seat to lovely Geraldine.

Bring Their Lunch

Seated upstairs, lunch baskets appeared in some quarters. There was gossip of all sorts, and there were crumbs in Symphony programmes. Then the lights were turned higher, the audience of season subscribers commenced to file in, the stage brightened, the orchestra appeared by degrees, and the joyously discordant din of tuning up lasted until Mr. Longy, the oboe of the orchestra, gave out the 'A' to which the orchestra tunes. Shortly after Mr. Fiedler appeared, to conduct one of the most brilliant performances in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fielder was compelled to return and acknowledge stormy applause after the symphony by Rachmaninoff, and the orchestra players had finally to rise with him. All this was good, but it is safe to say that not one woman out of ten profited by the following intermission to leave her seat, for fear that she might miss the first glimpse of Geraldine and her concert costume.

When the bell rang which announces the end of the intermission, there was dead silence, and women almost rose to their feet when Boston's songstress tripped on the stage.

And what did Miss Farrar wear? She wore a gown of which the general shade was pink, and the general impression oriental. This gown was touched with black velvet. The waist line had a hint of a bolero effect. The tunic skirt—notwithstanding Miss Farrar's late outspoken objections to skirts of the "hobble" variety—was slightly "hobbled" about six inches from the floor, with a strip of gray fur. The fur matched the color of a chinchilla muff of the very latest, most ultra-modern creation, trimmed with a gray satin bow at the lower end. And the skirt had a train.

Miss Farrar's hat, which made such a celebrated sensation when she sang with the Symphony Orchestra about this time last year, has not been forgotten. Lacking technical phraseology, that hat reminded the witness somewhat of the plumes of a parrot. Well, the hat that Miss Farrar wore yesterday was a "bucket" hat, with something that might have been a much exaggerated black aigrette on the top, and which looked like a young Christmas tree. Nor was the hat ignored after the performance. It, as well as Miss Farrar, received recalls, and there was an ovation when the singer finally shook hands with Mr. Fiedler, and bowed herself from the stage with the girlish grace which all know so well, so well.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE NOVEMBER 6, 1910

Joseph Hofmann Coming.

The recital of piano music which Josef Hofmann is to give in Symphony hall a week from tomorrow afternoon should attract a large audience. Hofmann today is one of the very few great pianists in the world and it is several years since he was heard here last.

The program will begin with the opus 111, Beethoven. Then will come the seldom heard scherzo in E minor by Mendelssohn, which will be followed by Schumann's C major fantasia. His second part will be devoted to Chopin, the G minor ballad, E flat major nocturne, A flat major valse and B minor scherzo, and his program will end with three Liszt pieces, "Funerailles," "Consolation" and "Campanella."

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony orchestra leaves for Philadelphia tonight on its first southern trip of the season. Tomorrow evening it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening in New York, Friday evening in Brooklyn, Saturday afternoon in New York and the following Monday evening in Hartford.

Mme Melba will be the soloist in Philadelphia, Baltimore and at the [illegible] concert in New York; Miss Geraldine Farrar will open the New York season by being soloist at the concert Thursday evening. In Washington the soloist will be Miss Margaret Keys, in Brooklyn Mme Jomelli, in Hartford Mme Berta Morena.

BOSTON JOURNAL NOVEMBER 6, 1910.

"OMAR KHAYYAM"

The association of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of three concerts, with Max Fiedler as conductor, will open a new epoch in choral music in this city. The Cecilia Society has for several weeks been rehearsing for the first concert on Dec. 1, when Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be given, and Mr. Fiedler has already had the chorus under his hand. In the work of rehearsing he is assisted by Malcolm Lang. In "Omar Khayyam" the soloists will be Margaret Keyes, George Harris, Jr., and Robert Maitland, an Englishman, who comes highly recommended by the composer.

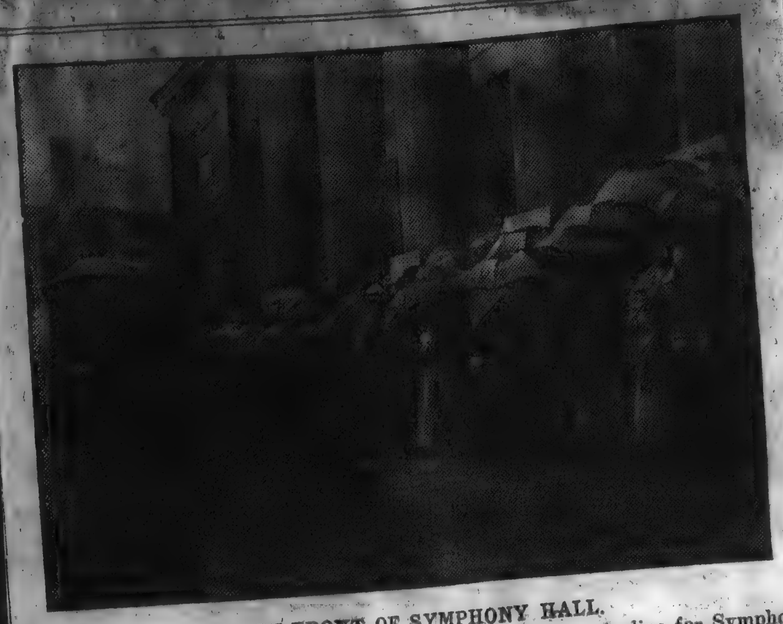
HOFMANN RECITAL

Josef Hofmann will give a recital at Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow afternoon. Hofmann today is one of the very few great pianists in the world, and it is several years since he was heard here last. The program which he will play here begins with the Opus III., by Beethoven. Then will come the seldom heard Scherzo in E minor, by Mendelssohn, which will be followed by Schumann's C major Fantasia. The second part will be devoted to Chopin—the G minor ballade, E flat major nocturne, A flat major valse and the B minor scherzo—and at the end will come three Liszt pieces, "Funerailles," "Consolation" and the "Campanella."

[51]

MONITOR, BOSTON NOVEMBER 5, 1910.

WOMEN MUSIC LOVERS WAIT HOURS IN RAIN



IN FRONT OF SYMPHONY HALL.
Picture taken before 11 a. m. on Friday of crowd standing in line for Symphony rehearsal in the afternoon.

Music hath charms—to keep a crowd waiting gladly for hours in the rain.

The faithful patrons of the second balcony seats for the rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra on Friday began to gather as early as 8 a. m. The accompanying picture was taken between 10 and 11 o'clock.

Miss Geraldine Farrar was to be the soloist, and the name had the power to draw out a crowd that was sufficient in numbers long before the doors were opened to fill the 505 seats open to them.

Long before the lesson hours of the students would permit them to reach the hall, however, the half dozen "regulars" were on hand and occupying their favorite posts near the door.

Along about 10 o'clock the line begins to grow slowly, stretching its serpentine shape back over the steps. By 11 o'clock on days such as Friday when there is a noted soloist, the steps are always filled and the line begins to extend down Huntington avenue.

Few drop out, however, and there are nearly always more than the hall can accommodate in line when the doors are opened at 1:30 o'clock. Each must have the 25 cents admission fee ready in hand when they pass into the door. No change is made—each must have a quarter ready. Once upstairs the waiters beguile themselves in various ways, reading and talking.

A large number eat their lunches. The hum of talk increases in volume as the players straggle in and begin tuning their instruments.

The director enters to a patter of applause. He turns to his men and a hush falls on the chattering assembly. The concert begins.

This unique musical event takes place 24 times every season, and has for years, as a result of the generosity of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, and deviser of the plan whereby music lovers may for this trifling fee have the finest musical pleasure that money can provide.

THE BOSTON ... TRAVELLER, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER ...

FARRAR HEARD FIRST TIME IN NEW OPERA

By EDITH BURNHAM.

The Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon had two special features, the repetition of the Rachmaninoff Symphony, and the appearance of Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The latter feature, despite the storm, started the rush line in front of Symphony Hall before 10 o'clock and packed the house.

The Rachmaninoff Symphony at its second playing revealed new beauties and enhanced all the old ones. The orchestra, even more than before, entered into it with a fulsomeness of expression that irradiated it throughout. They seem to admire it as much as do the audiences, which earnestly requested Mr. Fiedler to repeat it. One is singularly impressed on a second hearing with the fact that the entire composition is permeated with life, every instrument is saying something vital every minute—there are no dead levels, no merely transitional passages as such, no mere cover-passages; it never depends at any time on compositional effect for its being. It is a living thing—not a mere composition. It is introspective, yet full of the passion of earth; it spans the great chasm between the real and the ideal.

Thematically rich throughout, in the finale bits of all the themes are gathered into a perfect whole, as bits of a life sometimes gather themselves together at its close and make it a great life.

The orchestra is to play this symphony on their southern tour next week, and they are sure to win laurels with it. Yesterday's audience applauded till Mr. Fiedler made many bowing acknowledgments and the orchestra itself rose in response.

Following the symphony was Miss Farrar's first appearance, in the Air of Therese, from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin," an opera comique in three acts. The opening strains of the orchestra are full of promise, but the aria fails to fulfil it. Its pathos is only weakly piteous and it is almost arid of variety.

If heroines must suffer the fate of rejected love, it is the duty of the composer to make their sorrow more effective or else leave them to grieve in secret.

Miss Farrar's voice was plainly not up to its standard. It was thin and without music in its low and middle register, and in the high register several times she resorted to the expletive and explosive to produce the effect of full or tragic tone. Now and then some of its usual mellowness and its rare quality, like the tang of a wild olive, were heard, as in the Mozart recitative, "Misero, o segno," her second number; but even then it was only a glint of these qualities.

In the Mozart air, "Aura, che intorno," the deeper, sincerer tragic notes brought out Miss Farrar's voice and revealed it in something like its usual quality and expressiveness. It showed less strain and less tendency to depend on "effects" rather than genuine quality of tone.

The orchestra gave a sprightly rendering of the Chaconne and Rigadon from the opera "Aline, Reine de Golconde," dances of the eighteenth century in France which assumed artistic form and crept into the ballet.

The closing "Egmont Overture," Beethoven, was as gratifying as it ever can be; but a Goethe theme and a Beethoven conception do not make for concrete expression. One longs for a Wagnerian treatment of this half-mythical hero. The fortissimo outcry of the people is almost a blare of triumph, and all the mystery-laden gloom of a nation praying for a deliverer is compressed into a few mildly impressive wails, while the Egmont of Goethe finds no adequate expression at all. None of the "dream qualities" of the poet's hero pervade it, while all his haunting agonies are made to cry out in fortissimo passages that are not agony laden. Plainly the composer did not see the poet's vision.

SYMPHONY.

Sunday night the Symphony Orchestra leaves on its first trip South. Boston has reason to feel distinctly proud of the fact that New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington have broken all previous records on the subscription sales and that in Philadelphia there is hardly a seat left in the Academy of Music for single concerts. The first concert is in Philadelphia, Monday night. In Philadelphia, Baltimore and the matinee concert in New York, Madame Melba will be the soloist. Miss Margaret Keyes will be the soloist in Washington. Madame Jomelli in Brooklyn, and Geraldine Farrar will sing at the Thursday night concert in New York. The symphonies which Mr. Fiedler will play are the Rachmaninoff No. 2, the Brahms No 3, and Brahms No. 2.

HOFFMAN RECITAL.

Following is the programme of the Hofmann recital on Monday afternoon, Nov. 14: I, (a) Sonate, op. III., Beethoven; (b) Scherzo, E minor, Mendelssohn; (c) Phantasie, C major, Schumann; II., Chopin, (a) Ballade, G minor; (b) Nocturne, E flat major; (c) Valse, A flat major; (d) Scherzo, B minor; III., Litzt, (a) Funerailles; (b) Consolation; (c) Campanella. Hofmann, who two years ago was heralded as a child prodigy and packed houses all over the country, now returns to this country a more mature artist, a master of technique, after years of normal development under the direction of Rubenstein. Though now only 21 his playing is of the most brilliant style.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 5, 1910

GREAT AUDIENCE GREETS GERALDINE FARRAR

MELROSE SINGER GAINING IN ARTISTIC EXCELLENCE

First Appearance Since Return From Berlin Triumphs Made Yesterday at Symphony Orchestra Concert.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Rachmaninoff—Symphony in E minor.
Isouard—Aria from "Jeannot et Colin."
Monsigny—Chaconne et Rigaudon from "Aline."
Mozart—Aria, "Misero; o segno."
Beethoven—"Egmont" overture.
Soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar.

Much as we admire Miss Farrar, we are always sorry to see a soloist outweigh the merits of an orchestral programme with the public. But it is a fault the world over that a celebrated singer counts more with an audience than the greatest band of instrumentalists that can be gathered together. Yesterday, as if to throw the singer into greater prominence, the instrumental list was not especially new or likely to excite an audience inured to classical music. The Rachmaninoff symphony had been heard a couple of weeks before, the "Egmont" overture is more than a twice-told tale, and the Monsigny numbers were not of importance.

But even had this not been the case the result would have been the same. We begin to suspect that our tremendously educated musical audiences in Boston are more or less of a myth. Only the other day we saw nearly an entire audience march out of a hall after a sonata and a concerto (six movements) had been played, serene in the conviction that they had heard the six numbers that the programme called for. Too often at crowded recitals do we suspect auditors in 50c. hats who occupy $2 seats. This last, however, does not apply to Symphony concert audiences, who wear large and expensive hats—and keep them on.

Let us clear away the orchestral work first, that we may come to more appreciated subject of the singer. The Rachmaninoff symphony was worth a second hearing, if only for purposes of study. We recognize a great work here, even if we do not rank it with the best symphonies of Bruckner and Brahms. The orchestra is handled with surety and power, but this is an epoch of orchestral skill. Our moderns even when they are scant of ideas can handle an orchestra in a manner that almost conceals that fact. But Rachmaninoff is not poor in the content of his work. He has very much to say, even if he is too long in saying it, and too fond of mysterious touches and sharp contrasts.

On a second hearing we find the first movement to grow more impressive. It has some really great moments. We are still unreconciled to that acrid and aggressive fugue in the second movement. The amount of woe that a Russian can give in a symphony is wonderful, but after tasting of Scriabin's "Ecstasy" we are quite satisfied to return to Rachmaninoff's grief. Again the technical work was a credit to Mr. Fiedler and our orchestra. The modern composers see to it that our orchestral men earn their salaries. The audience gave recognition to the difficulties that had been conquered, and Mr. Fiedler was recalled and allowed the orchestra to rise in response to the applause.

Once upon a time the "Egmont" overture was held to be too difficult for practical performance. We wish that the violinists of a century ago, who found the passage running up to C "impossible," could hear some of our latter-day tone-poems. For all that, the simpler style seems to us the more effective. Here is an overture that is quite short, yet it says all that its subject calls for. It is deeply emotional, yet it is symmetrical in form. It is not heavily scored, yet its piccolo (with trumpets, strings, etc.) gives as fiery a note of triumph as the more recent, ponderous, many-voiced spasms; and it is beautiful in the midst of war, disaster, gloom, or victory, for Beethoven held (and said) that Music even when picturing evil must itself remain beautiful. The performance was true Beethoven playing, virile and impetuous and tender and sorrowful by turns. To us it was the gem of the entire programme.

The Monsigny pieces were tuneful and had Gallic grace and daintiness. Father Gevaert, the chief of musical antiquaries, had retouched the work with reverent hands and had not too greatly modernized it. The first violins were well to the fore during the two numbers (which were continuous) and the rollicking style of the Rigaudon was well preserved.

In the old Rigaudons they used to sing as well as dance. We wish that this feature had been preserved. We should like to hear our orchestra as a chorus—once. But it was the vocal numbers that the audience were chiefly interested in. And yet, possibly not the numbers so much as in the American singer who had conquered Berlin and charmed even the critical Emperor; the artist who had won the right to look down even upon dukes with supercilious profanity. But it is more to the reviewer's purpose to note the fact that she is constantly gaining in artistic excellence. It is not so long ago that we found Miss Farrar faulty and decidedly unmagnetic upon the concert platform. A brief time has changed this. We feel that this young American deserves what she has won and may attain to yet greater heights.

Yet she was not in her best voice. The deluge outside may have dampened the vocal chords, so that the artist seemed at first to display effort. The Isouard number was a chaste and modest selection and Miss Farrar entered sweetly into the spirit of it. Nevertheless, there was no very great abandon in it, from the timorous horn passages of the beginning to the discreetly abbreviated C in alt at the end.

The Mozart aria was another musicianly selection which again showed Miss Farrar's earnest vein. It was composed for tenor voice, and has been arranged by Dr. Muck. It is not attached to an opera, but displays the sorrows of a young man who is shut up in a cavern for some unknown reason, and naturally feels badly about it. He, however, sends his farewell sighs to her whom he adored and expresses considerable doubt about seeing her again.

Modern audiences do not thrill to these 18th century sentimentalities of rhyme, even though the music is earnest and tender. In this Miss Farrar, although an occasional deflection of intonation could be detected, was better than in the preceding number. Her "canto splanato" was very good; she took the B flat bravely, and she won much applause, being recalled again and again. But the truest tribute to Miss Farrar was paid before the concert began. Two hours before the concert began there was a long line of waiters for a chance to buy balcony seats. This line was in the street, extending even as far as Gainsborough st.; it was largely composed of women; it stood there patiently in the fierce tempest; and many were not admitted even after their vigil. We do not believe that this heroic band of moistened martyrs was waiting there on account of our Symphony orchestra, for when there is a purely orchestral programme they are not in evidence.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 6, 1910

CECILIA AND SYMPHONY

The association of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a series of three concerts, with Max Fiedler as conductor, should mean much for choral music in this city. Years ago a chorus was formed to co-operate with the orchestra and in Mr. Gericke's first term of service some interesting performances were given, but the plan did not work out satisfactorily.

The association of the orchestra and the Cecilia is necessarily in the nature of an experiment. The concerts are directly under the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis, and the orchestra through him assumes responsibility for them.

The three works to be presented were chosen after long deliberation.

Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will have its first Boston appearance on Thursday evening, Dec. 1, and Pierve's "Children's Crusade" will be sung at the second concert on Thursday evening, Feb. 16.

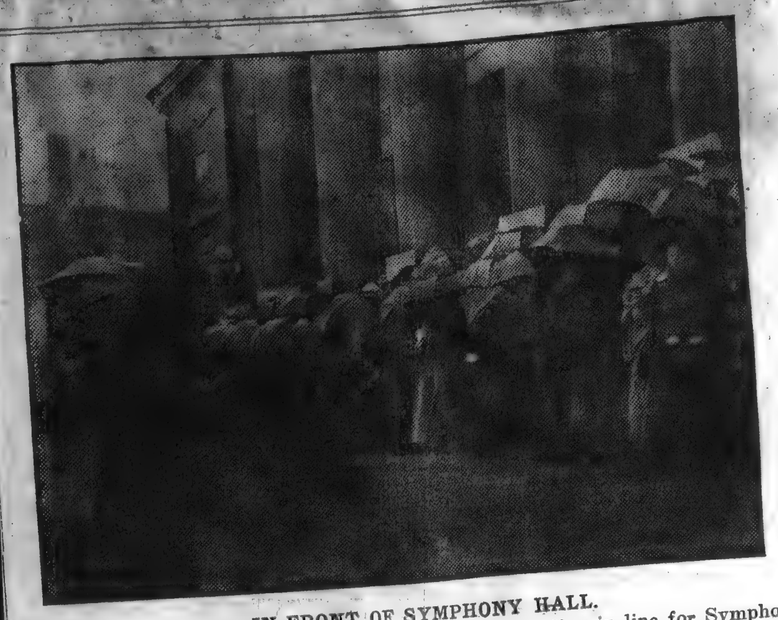
It is many years since Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" has been sung in Boston. The work presents many and great difficulties of performance and demands long and arduous preparation if it is to be worthily done. It was felt that the time was ripe to present this once more and the date of its performance was made appropriately enough—Good Friday, April 14. Following the custom of many years the public rehearsals of the orchestra, which usually fall on Friday, on Holy Week, is placed on Thursday, thus leaving Friday free.

Hoffmann Recital

Josef Hoffmann will give a recital in Symphony Hall one week from tomorrow afternoon, on the 14th. Of Mr. Hoffmann's playing at a recent concert in New York, Richard Aldrich, of the New York Times, said this: "It may be truly said that he has now reached the point where that title ('master') is rightfully his without reservation. His playing yesterday showed a remarkable quickening of the emotional and temperamental powers that long seemed to be lying latent in him, and it was only such a quickening that was needed to raise him to the highest rank among the masters of his instrument. A keener intellectual insight, or a more complete mastery of all the technical demands of piano-forte playing few players have had. Nor have any held higher ideals of his art than Mr. Hoffmann as to sincerity, the abhorrence of the sensational element, the exploitation of self." Mr. Hoffmann's Boston programme will be as follows: Sonata, op. III., Beethoven; Scherso in E minor, Mendelssohn; Fantaisie in C, Schumann; G minor Ballade, E-flat major Nocturne, A-flat major waltz and B minor Scherso, Chopin; Funerailles, Consolation, and Campanella Etude, Liszt.

MONITOR, BOSTON NOVEMBER 5, 1910.

WOMEN MUSIC LOVERS WAIT HOURS IN RAIN



IN FRONT OF SYMPHONY HALL.
Picture taken before 11 a. m. on Friday of crowd standing in line for Symphony rehearsal in the afternoon.

Music hath charms—to keep a crowd waiting gladly for hours in the rain.

The faithful patrons of the second balcony seats for the rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra on Friday began to gather as early as 8 a. m. The accompanying picture was taken between 10 and 11 o'clock.

Miss Geraldine Farrar was to be the soloist, and the name had the power to draw out a crowd that was sufficient in numbers long before the doors were opened to fill the 505 seats open to them.

Long before the lesson hours of the students would permit them to reach the hall, however, the half dozen "regulars" were on hand and occupying their favorite posts near the door.

Along about 10 o'clock the line begins to grow slowly, stretching its serpentine shape back over the steps. By 11 o'clock on days such as Friday when there is a noted soloist, the steps are always filled and the line begins to extend down Huntington avenue.

Few drop out, however, and there are nearly always more than the hall can accommodate in line when the doors are opened at 1:30 o'clock. Each must have the 25 cents admission fee ready in hand when they pass into the door. No change is made—each must have a quarter ready. Once upstairs the waiters beguile themselves in various ways, reading and talking.

A large number eat their lunches. The hum of talk increases in volume as the players straggle in and begin tuning their instruments.

The director enters to a patter of applause. He turns to his men and a hush falls on the chattering assembly. The concert begins.

This unique musical event takes place 24 times every season, and has for years, as a result of the generosity of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, and deviser of the plan whereby music lovers may for this trifling fee have the finest musical pleasure that money can provide.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1910.

FARRAR HEARD FIRST TIME IN NEW OPERA

By EDITH BURNHAM.

The Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon had two special features, the repetition of the Rachmaninoff Symphony, and the appearance of Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The latter feature, despite the storm, started the rush line in front of Symphony Hall before 10 o'clock and packed the house.

The Rachmaninoff Symphony at its second playing revealed new beauties and enhanced all the old ones. The orchestra, even more than before, entered into it with a fulsomeness of expression that irradiated it throughout. They seem to admire it as much as do the audiences, which earnestly requested Mr. Fiedler to repeat it. One is singularly impressed on a second hearing with the fact that the entire composition is permeated with life, every instrument is saying something vital every minute—there are no dead levels, no merely transitional passages as such, no mere cover-passages; it never depends at any time on compositional effect for its being. It is a living thing—not a mere composition. It is introspective, yet full of the passion of earth; it spans the great chasm between the real and the ideal.

Thematically rich throughout, in the finale bits of all the themes are gathered into a perfect whole, as bits of a life sometimes gather themselves together at its close and make it a great life.

The orchestra is to play this symphony on their southern tour next week, and they are sure to win laurels with it. Yesterday's audience applauded till Mr. Fiedler made many bowing acknowledgments and the orchestra itself rose in response.

Following the symphony was Miss Farrar's first appearance, in the Air of Therese, from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin," an opera comique in three acts. The opening strains of the orchestra are full of promise, but the aria fails to fulfil it. Its pathos is only weakly piteous and it is almost arid of variety.

If heroines must suffer the fate of rejected love, it is the duty of the composer to make their sorrow more effective or else leave them to grieve in secret.

Miss Farrar's voice was plainly not up to its standard. It was thin and without music in its low and middle register, and in the high register several times she resorted to the expletive and explosive to produce the effect of full or tragic tone. Now and then some of its usual mellowness and its rare quality, like the tang of a wild olive, were heard, as in the Mozart recitative, "Misero, o segno," her second number; but even then it was only a glint of these qualities.

In the Mozart air, "Aura, che intorno," the deeper, sincerer tragic notes brought out Miss Farrar's voice and revealed it in something like its usual quality and expressiveness. It showed less strain and less tendency to depend on "effects" rather than genuine quality of tone.

The orchestra gave a sprightly rendering of the Chaconne and Rigadon from the opera "Aline, Reine de Golconde," dances of the eighteenth century in France which assumed artistic form and crept into the ballet.

The closing "Egmont Overture," Beethoven, was as gratifying as it ever can be; but a Goethe theme and a Beethoven conception do not make for concrete expression. One longs for a Wagnerian treatment of this half-mythical hero. The fortissimo outcry of the people is almost a blare of triumph, and all the mystery-laden gloom of a nation praying for a deliverer is compressed into a few mildly impressive wails, while the Egmont of Goethe finds no adequate expression at all. None of the "dream qualities" of the poet's hero pervade it, while all his haunting agonies are made to cry out in fortissimo passages that are not agony laden. Plainly the composer did not see the poet's vision.

SYMPHONY.

Sunday night the Symphony Orchestra leaves on its first trip South. Boston has reason to feel distinctly proud of the fact that New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington have broken all previous records on the subscription sales and that in Philadelphia there is hardly a seat left in the Academy of Music for single concerts. The first concert is in Philadelphia, Monday night. In Philadelphia, Baltimore and the matinee concert in New York, Madame Melba will be the soloist. Miss Margaret Keyes will be the soloist in Washington, Madame Jomelli in Brooklyn, and Geraldine Farrar will sing at the Thursday night concert in New York. The symphonies which Mr. Fiedler will play are the Rachmaninoff No. 2, the Brahms No. 3, and Brahms No. 2.

HOFFMAN RECITAL.

Following is the programme of the Hofmann recital on Monday afternoon, Nov. 14: I, (a) Sonate, op. III., Beethoven; (b) Scherzo, E minor, Mendelssohn; (c) Phantasie, C major, Schumann; II., Chopin, (a) Ballade, G minor; (b) Nocturne, E flat major; (c) Valse, A flat major; (d) Scherzo, B minor; III., Litzt, (a) Funerailles; (b) Consolation; (c) Campanella. Hofmann, who two years ago was heralded as a child prodigy and packed houses all over the country, now returns to this country a more mature artist, a master of technique, after years of normal development under the direction of Rubenstein. Though now only 21 his playing is of the most brilliant style.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 5, 1910

GREAT AUDIENCE GREETS GERALDINE FARRAR

MELROSE SINGER GAINING IN ARTISTIC EXCELLENCE

First Appearance Since Return From Berlin Triumphs Made Yesterday at Symphony Orchestra Concert.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Rachmaninoff—Symphony in E minor.
Isouard—Aria from "Jeannot et Colin."
Monsigny—Chaconne et Rigaudon from "Aline."
Mozart—Aria, "Misero; o segno."
Beethoven—"Egmont" overture.
Soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar.

Much as we admire Miss Farrar, we are always sorry to see a soloist outweigh the merits of an orchestral programme with the public. But it is a fault the world over that a celebrated singer counts more with an audience than the greatest band of instrumentalists that can be gathered together. Yesterday, as if to throw the singer into greater prominence, the instrumental list was not especially new or likely to excite an audience inured to classical music. The Rachmaninoff symphony had been heard a couple of weeks before, the "Egmont" overture is more than a twice-told tale, and the Monsigny numbers were not of importance.

But even had this not been the case the result would have been the same. We begin to suspect that our tremendously educated musical audiences in Boston are more or less of a myth. Only the other day we saw nearly an entire audience march out of a hall after a sonata and a concerto (six movements) had been played, serene in the conviction that they had heard the six numbers that the programme called for. Too often at crowded recitals do we suspect auditors in 50c. hats who occupy $2 seats. This last, however, does not apply to Symphony concert audiences, who wear large and expensive hats—and keep them on.

Let us clear away the orchestral work first, that we may come to more appreciated subject of the singer. The Rachmaninoff symphony was worth a second hearing, if only for purposes of study. We recognize a great work here, even if we do not rank it with the best symphonies of Bruckner and Brahms. The orchestra is handled with surety and power, but this is an epoch of orchestral skill. Our moderns even when they are scant of ideas can handle an orchestra in a manner that almost conceals that fact. But Rachmaninoff is not poor in the content of his work. He has very much to say, even if he is too long in saying it, and too fond of mysterious touches and sharp contrasts.

On a second hearing we find the first movement to grow more impressive. It has some really great moments. We are still unreconciled to that acrid and aggressive fugue in the second movement. The amount of woe that a Russian can give in a symphony is wonderful, but after tasting of Scriabin's "Ecstasy" we are quite satisfied to return to Rachmaninoff's grief. Again the technical work was a credit to Mr. Fiedler and our orchestra. The modern composers see to it that our orchestral men earn their salaries. The audience gave recognition to the difficulties that had been conquered, and Mr. Fiedler was recalled and allowed the orchestra to rise in response to the applause.

Once upon a time the "Egmont" overture was held to be too difficult for practical performance. We wish that the violinists of a century ago, who found the passage running up to C "impossible," could hear some of our latter-day tone-poems. For all that, the simpler style seems to us the more effective. Here is an overture that is quite short, yet it says all that its subject calls for. It is deeply emotional, yet it is symmetrical in form. It is not heavily scored, yet its piccolo (with trumpets, strings, etc.) gives as fiery a note of triumph as the more recent, ponderous, many-voiced spasms; and it is beautiful in the midst of war, disaster, gloom, or victory, for Beethoven held (and said) that Music even when picturing evil must itself remain beautiful. The performance was true Beethoven playing, virile and impetuous and tender and sorrowful by turns. To us it was the gem of the entire programme.

The Monsigny pieces were tuneful and had Gallic grace and daintiness. Father Gevaert, the chief of musical antiquaries, had retouched the work with reverent hands and had not too greatly modernized it. The first violins were well to the fore during the two numbers (which were continuous) and the rollicking style of the Rigaudon was well preserved.

In the old Rigaudons they used to sing as well as dance. We wish that this feature had been preserved. We should like to hear our orchestra as a chorus—once. But it was the vocal numbers that the audience were chiefly interested in. And yet, possibly not the numbers so much as in the American singer who had conquered Berlin and charmed even the critical Emperor; the artist who had won the right to look down even upon dukes with supercilious profanity. But it is more to the reviewer's purpose to note the fact that she is constantly gaining in artistic excellence. It is not so long ago that we found Miss Farrar faulty and decidedly unmagnetic upon the concert platform. A brief time has changed this. We feel that this young American deserves what she has won and may attain to yet greater heights.

Yet she was not in her best voice. The deluge outside may have dampened the vocal chords, so that the artist seemed at first to display effort. The Isouard number was a chaste and modest selection and Miss Farrar entered sweetly into the spirit of it. Nevertheless, there was no very great abandon in it, from the timorous horn passages of the beginning to the discreetly abbreviated C in alt at the end.

The Mozart aria was another musicianly selection which again showed Miss Farrar's earnest vein. It was composed for tenor voice, and has been arranged by Dr. Muck. It is not attached to an opera, but displays the sorrows of a young man who is shut up in a cavern for some unknown reason, and naturally feels badly about it. He, however, sends his farewell sighs to her whom he adored and expresses considerable doubt about seeing her again.

Modern audiences do not thrill to these 18th century sentimentalities of rhyme, even though the music is earnest and tender. In this Miss Farrar, although an occasional deflection of intonation could be detected, was better than in the preceding number. Her "canto spianato" was very good; she took the B flat bravely, and she won much applause, being recalled again and again. But the truest tribute to Miss Farrar was paid before the concert began. Two hours before the concert began there was a long line of waiters for a chance to buy balcony seats. This line was in the street, extending even as far as Gainsborough st.; it was largely composed of women; it stood there patiently in the fierce tempest; and many were not admitted even after their vigil. We do not believe that this heroic band of moistened martyrs was waiting there on account of our Symphony orchestra, for when there is a purely orchestral programme they are not in evidence.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 6, 1910

CECILIA AND SYMPHONY

The association of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a series of three concerts, with Max Fiedler as conductor, should mean much for choral music in this city. Years ago a chorus was formed to co-operate with the orchestra and in Mr. Gericke's first term of service some interesting performances were given, but the plan did not work out satisfactorily.

The association of the orchestra and the Cecilia is necessarily in the nature of an experiment. The concerts are directly under the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis, and the orchestra through him assumes responsibility for them.

The three works to be presented were chosen after long deliberation.

Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will have its first Boston appearance on Thursday evening, Dec. 1, and Pierve's "Children's Crusade" will be sung at the second concert on Thursday evening, Feb. 16.

It is many years since Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" has been sung in Boston. The work presents many and great difficulties of performance and demands long and arduous preparation if it is to be worthily done. It was felt that the time was ripe to present this once more and the date of its performance was made appropriately enough—Good Friday, April 14. Following the custom of many years the public rehearsals of the orchestra, which usually fall on Friday, on Holy Week, is placed on Thursday, thus leaving Friday free.

Hoffmann Recital

Josef Hoffmann will give a recital in Symphony Hall one week from tomorrow afternoon, on the 14th. Of Mr. Hoffmann's playing at a recent concert in New York, Richard Aldrich, of the New York Times, said this: "It may be truly said that he has now reached the point where that title ('master') is rightfully his without reservation. His playing yesterday showed a remarkable quickening of the emotional and temperamental powers that long seemed to be lying latent in him, and it was only such a quickening that was needed to raise him to the highest rank among the masters of his instrument. A keener intellectual insight, or a more complete mastery of all the technical demands of piano-forte playing few players have had. Nor have any held higher ideals of his art than Mr. Hoffmann as to sincerity, the abhorrence of the sensational element, the exploitation of self." Mr. Hoffmann's Boston programme will be as follows: Sonata, op. III., Beethoven; Scherzo in E minor, Mendelssohn; Fantaisie in C, Schumann; G minor Ballade, E-flat major Nocturne, A-flat major waltz and B minor Scherzo, Chopin; Funerailles, Consolation, and Campanella Etude, Liszt.

[52]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISS FARRAR SINGS TWO RARE AIRS

The Preliminary Crisis in Corridor and Auditorium—The Diversified but Successful Passage of It—Miss Farrar's Discoveries in French Opera-Comique and Mozart's Concert-Pieces—The Discrimination in Her Singing of Each—The Grace of the One and the Large Expression of the Other

Josef Hofmann, explaining his choice of one of Beethoven's pianoforte concertos for his appearances next month with the Symphony Orchestra, said that he had made it because he understood that Boston preferred something weighty and eloquent rather than merely brilliant. Of such is the ancient tradition that clothes the likings of this town in and out of the arts. Happily the tradition has become a little obsolete nowadays, and we Bostonians, like the rest of a sophisticated pleasure-loving and metropolitan world, would have at least our modicum of brilliancy. Perhaps, too, the logical Mr. Hoffmann would have modified his opinion had he heard the buzz of talk that hummed through the corridors and the auditorium during the intermission in the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. Miss Farrar, reappearing for the first time this autumn, was to be the singer. Numerous and eager was the press of listeners; the last possible entrant to the second balcony had need to be in line early in the morning, and keen was the interest in all that Miss Farrar might do. She had chosen two unusual pieces—an air from a forgotten Parisian opéra-comique, written nearly a hundred years ago by the equally forgotten Isauard, and a concert piece by Mozart equally unknown and neglected, originally written for a tenor, and lately compressed and revised for Miss Farrar by Dr. Muck. The talk, however, ran not to these rare pieces. No more was it concerned with anticipations of the quality of Miss Farrar's singing. It did not recall her appearances in Paris, at Salzburg and in Berlin in the months that she has been absent from America; it speculated upon none of the parts that she will take at the Metropolitan next winter. It was busy simple, solely and very intensely with what on this particular afternoon she might wear—the cut and color of her gown, the fashion of her hat, the variety of her jewels, the likelihood and the unlikelihood of a muff and other subtle artistic matters of the dressmaker's shop.

The hum subsided, the auditorium filled again; Hr. Fiedler took his place, and to the stage came Miss Farrar. A thousand necks craned themselves that twice as many eager eyes might scrutinize her. Gloved hands lifted opera glasses by tens, twenties and hundreds. One woman rose, stood unabashed, and looked her will. The debated question was answered: Miss Farrar carried a muff—to the masculine eye an oval pouch of white and gray fur. Anticipations and speculations were fulfilled or unfulfilled. Miss Farrar wore a simply cut pink frock touched at elbows and belt with black velvet. Her hat was turban-like with white lace around it, emanating a spiky bush of black feathers. The elect ladies of the audience whispered praise or dispraise during the orchestral preludings to Isouard's air. To the masculine eye, Miss Farrar with her clear skin, her dark eyes, her slender and elastic figure was altogether youthful and charming. Better still, never before in the concert-room in Boston has she seemed of such unaffected and poised youth. Her sicerity, her unconsciousness of herself and her audience, the grace of simplicity, the charm of repose all commended her.

Thus passed the critical moments of the afternoon, thus were the subtle æsthetic questions that the concert raised decided, thus was conjecture, disappointed or elated; and the company could settle into its seats to have its pleasure of Miss Farrar's singing. Her choice of her two airs praised her intelligent interest and inquiry into music, especially of French opéra-comique, that is unwisely neglected and her appreciation of the finer requirements of the concert-room and of a symphony concert in particular. The air from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin" is gentle and graceful music; the simple melody, meandering now and then over little rapids of vocal ornament, flows lightly, elegantly, beguilingly to a running accompaniment now softened by the woodwind choir, now accented by the strings, and it has its formal graces of repetition and return. It begins in the vein of tender and gently melancholy revery; it passes to the mood of girlish resolution; it rises in the final Allegro to youthful agitation and confident hope.

Miss Farrar, with her usual discriminative intelligence, made the timbre of her voice of the young girl who in the opera sings the music. Her voice was all of lightly melancholy, lightly resolved and lightly confident youth. Her tones flowed in the two-fold grace of simplicity and sincerity. They sustained the melodic hue of the air yet never once thickened it; they shaded it with the utmost delicacy; her phrases in half voice charmed the ear. She understood, she imparted the quiet elegance of the music. In light tones, almost in flecks of sound above the running accompaniment, she made play with the mood and the music of resolution, and led it adroitly into the repetitions and returns. Only near the end, where Isouard writes for vocal display, did her upper tones, smoother and rounder than she has sometimes made them, threaten a little and so lost the adgelessness of her middle voice. Throughout, her finesse, her elegance, her grace of tone had been beautifully sympathetic to the music, even though the singing teachers may mistake her deliberately chosen timbre.

Mr. Fiedler shortly continued the impression of Isouard's music in the two simple and—shall we say?—genteel dances from Monsigny's "Aline" that made an orchestral intermezzo between Miss Farrar's numbers. The air from Mozart ("Misero! O Sogno, O son Desto", was of another sort and stamp. Mozart wrote it as a concert piece for an admired tenor, wrote in the Italian "grand style" that so delighted the Viennese of his last years—the style of his opera, "La Clemenza di Tito." Accordingly, the introductory recitative runs its portentous lengths that Dr. Muck has wisely shortened; and the air continues, according to the Italian manner as the end of the eighteenth century understood in measures that might be passionate at the beginning of the twentieth, were they not so complaisantly final, and so bedecorated with the ornaments of song. The recitative is of the composer of the final scenes of "Don Giovanni." It has breadth and sweep, intensity and power; it is of the voice of the abandoned and distraight lover. The andante of the air itself begins with a phrase of Mozartean loveliness of line and substance; but soon the precious "Italian manner" settles witheringly upon it. Formalism harnesses the emotional quality of the music. Much decoration checks it. The air is of Mozart easily accepting trammels that when he chose he could adjust to his dramatizing and imparting well.

MONDAY, Nov. 14, in Symphony Hall, a recital by Josef Hofmann, the pianist, for his first appearance here in seven years. Within that time he has attained to a rich maturity of powers of mind and hand and ripened into a pianist of imagination, feeling, range of expression and continent beauty of tone. The world over, except in the Boston to which he now returns, he has established his public. His programme is:

Sonata, Op. 111.....Beethoven
Scherzo, E Minor.....Mendelssohn
Phantasie, C Major.....Schumann
Ballade, G Minor.—Nocturne, E-Flat Major.—Valse, A-flat Major.—Scherzo, B Minor.....Chopin
Funerailles.—Consolation.—Campanella....Liszt

THE BOSTON AMERICAN.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1910.

THREE CONCERTS TO MARK EPOCH HERE

The association of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of three concerts, with Max Fiedler as conductor, should mean the opening of a new epoch in choral music in this city. The concerts are directly under the management of Charles A. Ellis, and the orchestra, through him, assumes responsibility for them. The Cecilia Society has for several weeks been rehearsing for the first concert on December 1, when Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be given and Mr. Fiedler has already had the chorus under his hand.

The chorus of the society now consists of one hundred and seventy voices, and in it there is absolutely not a "dead one." A chorus of trained singers of this kind is infinitely more effective than a large unwieldy chorus of untrained voices.

Novelty Wanted.

The three works to be presented were chosen after long deliberation. It was felt that one novelty should be given and that one of the great classical works should be presented, while it was decided that the success won several seasons ago by Pierne's "The Children's Crusade" warranted a repetition of this work. Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" was chosen because this is the most important choral composition in English that has been given to the world in several years. "Omar Khayyam" will have its first Boston appearance on Thursday evening, December 1, and "The Children's Crusade" will be sung at the second concert on Thursday evening, February 16.

It is many years since Bach's St. Matthew Passion has been sung in Boston. The work presents many and great difficulties of performance and demands long and arduous preparation if it is to be worthily done. It was felt that the time was ripe to present this once more and the date of its performance was made appropriately enough, Good Froday, April 14.

"Omar Khayyam" Soloists.

In "Omar Khayyam" the soloists will be Margaret Keyes, George Harris, Jr., and Robert Maitland. Mr. Maitland is an Englishman, who comes highly recommended by the composer, Mr. Bantock. In "The Children's Crusade" the singers will be Madame Rider Kelsey, Edith Chapman Goold, Edmond Clement and Claude Cunningham for the principal parts, local singers for the minor parts and a chorus of one hundred. Clement is the French tenor who had such extraordinary success in New York last year.

For the Passion music the singers will be Marie Zimmerman, who has made a specialty of Bach music; Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham. There will also be a choir of fifty boys.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves for Philadelphia to-night on its first Southern trip of the season. To-morrow evening it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening in New York, Friday evening in Brooklyn, Saturday afternoon in New York and the following Monday evening in Hartford.

Madame Melba will be the soloist in Philadelphia, Baltimore and at the matinee concert in New York, while Miss Geraldine Farrar will open the New York season by being soloist at the concert on Thursday evening. In Washington the soloist will be Miss Margaret Keyes and in Brooklyn Madame Jomelli, while in Hartford on the 14th the soloist will be Madame Berta Morena. Mr. Fiedler will play the second and third symphonies of Brahms and the second of Rachmaninoff.

NOVEMBER 6, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Symphony orchestra will leave for Philadelphia tonight on its first southern trip of the season. Tomorrow evening it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening in New York, Friday evening in Brooklyn, Saturday afternoon in New York and the following Monday evening in Hartford. Never has the orchestra begun a season out of town with brighter prospects. The largest subscriptions in its history are reported in New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington. In Philadelphia there is hardly a seat for a single concert. Mme. Melba will be the soloist in Philadelphia, Baltimore and at the matinee concert in New York, while Miss Geraldine Farrar will open the New York season at the concert on Thursday evening. In Washington the soloist will be Miss Margaret Keyes, in Brooklyn Mme. Jomelli, in Hartford on the 14th Mme. Berta Morena. Mr. Fiedler will conduct the 2d and 3d symphonies of Brahms and the second of Rachmaninoff.

CECILIA AND THE SYMPHONY.

The association of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of three concerts, with Max Fiedler as conductor, should mean the opening of a new epoch in choral music in this city. Years ago a chorus was formed to co-operate with the orchestra, and in Mr. Gericke's first term of service and in the reign of Mr. Nikisch some interesting performances were given; but the plan did not work out satisfactorily. The Cecilia in its long and honorable career, during which it has brought many new works to Boston, has been hampered by its inability, especially in modern works, to employ a sufficient orchestra. The association of the orchestra and the Cecilia is necessarily in the nature of an experiment. The concerts are directly under the management of Charles A. Ellis, and the orchestra, through him, assumes responsibility for them.

At the first concert on Dec. 1 Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be performed, and Mr. Fiedler has already had the chorus under his hand. In rehearsing he is assisted by Mr. Malcolm Lang. The chorus of the society now consists of 170 live voices.

The three works chosen for performance were selected after long deliberation. It was felt that one novelty should be given and that one of the great classical works should be given. It was decided that the success of Pierne's "The Children's Crusade" warranted another performance. Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" was chosen because the score is attractive vocally and orchestrally; the subject itself is familiar and interesting. Furthermore Bantock is a leading English composer, and his "Omar Khayyam" is the most important choral composition in English that has been produced for several years.

"The Children's Crusade" will be sung at the second concert on Thursday evening, Feb. 16. It is many years since Bach's Passion according to Matthew has been performed in Boston. The work presents many difficulties and demands long preparation. The date of performance is appropriately Good Friday, April 14. The public rehearsal of the orchestra, which usually falls on Friday, in Holy Week is placed on Thursday, thus leaving Friday free.

In "Omar Khayyam" the singers will be Margaret Keyes, George Harris, Jr., and Robert Maitland. Mr. Maitland is an Englishman, highly recommended by Mr. Bantock. In "The Children's Crusade" the singers will be Mme. Rider-Kelsey, Edith Chapman Goold, Edmond Clement and Claude Cunningham for the principal parts, local singers for the minor parts and a chorus of 100. Mr. Clement is the French tenor who had such extraordinary success in New York last year. For the Passion music the singers will be Marie Zimmerman, who has made a specialty of such music; Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham. There will also be a choir of 50 boys.

The season sale will open at Symphony Hall Nov. 14.

JOSEF HOFMANN'S RECITAL.

The recital of piano music which Josef Hofmann is to give in Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow afternoon, Monday, the 14th, should attract a very large audience. Mr. Hofmann now ranks among the few great pianists in the world, and it is several years since he was heard here. There is a dearth of great artists in America this winter, and piano recitals worth while will be very few. Mr. Hofmann opened his season in New York on Oct. 29 with a recital in Carnegie Hall, and demonstrated that he is the only pianist capable of filling that hall with the exception of Mr. Paderewski. The critical notices were enthusiastic. The program will include Beethoven's sonata Opus 111, Mendelssohn's Scherzo in E-minor, Schumann's C-major Fantasia, Chopin's G-minor Ballade, E-flat major Nocturne, A-flat major Valse and the B-minor Scherzo, and Liszt's Funerailles, Consolation and Campanella.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

Boston Symphony To-night.

The first of the five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to be presented in Providence during the coming winter will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15. The subscription so far exceeds that for anything of the kind ever held in this city. The soloist will be Mme. Olive Fremstad, who is the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York city. The first two numbers on the programme are Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115, and Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97. The second section of the programme will consist of Gluck's aria, "Enfin il est dans ma puissance" from "Armide;" Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, and the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristran and Isolde" of Wagner.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 30 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

It will please the friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to know that the subscription for the five concerts which the orchestra will give in Philadelphia this season is the largest it has had in years, and nearly double that of last year. Comparatively few seats remain unsold.

For the first concert on Monday evening, November 7, Melba is to be the soloist, thus making her only appearance in Philadelphia this year. Her two numbers will be the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." The novelty will be an overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, and a man of very unusual creative talent, whose music has found a place in the repertoire of orchestras of Europe.

This overture had its first performance in Boston last spring, and made so favorable an impression that Mr. Fiedler is using it on all the programs of this first Southern trip. The symphony will be Brahms in F-major No. 3, and the other numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Manfred," and Wagner's overture, "Tannhauser."

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

D

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, when the orchestra will present Mme. Melba as soloist. This will be the only opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear this greatest of sopranos during the coming season. Mme. Melba has chosen for her numbers two strongly contrasted pieces, one the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," which demands perfection of bel canto, and the other, the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' opera, "Hamlet," which exacts the utmost virtuosity of execution in matters of skips, jumps, trills and all the other ornaments which are in the armory of a coloratura soprano.

The orchestral numbers will comprise Schumann's overture "Manfred," Brahm's Symphony No. 3 in F-major, Strube's comedy overture "Puck," and the "Tannhauser" overture. Gustav Strube, the composer of "Puck," is a man of extraordinary talent, which, like that of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, has been carefully fostered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he has been a member for the last twenty years. "Puck" is a work which has been received with such favor and in which Mr. Fiedler has so much faith that he placed it on all his concert programs of this present Southern trip of the orchestra.

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 31 '10

The subscription for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia this season is the largest in years, and is nearly double that of last year. Comparatively few seats remain unsold. For the first concert on Monday evening, November 7, Melba is to be the soloist, making her only appearance in Philadelphia this year. Her two numbers will be the "Dove Song" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." The novelty will be an overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, a man whose music has found a place in the repertoire of orchestras of Europe. This overture had its first performance in Boston last spring. Fiedler is using it on all the programs of this first Southern trip. The symphony will be Brahms in F major, No. 3, and the other numbers will be Schumann's overture "Manfred" and Wagner's overture, "Tannhaeuser."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PROVIDENCE R. I.

Address

Date OCT 5

The first large gathering of society will assemble in Infantry Hall to-night for the opening concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISS FARRAR SINGS TWO RARE AIRS

The Preliminary Crisis in Corridor and Auditorium—The Diversified but Successful Passage of It—Miss Farrar's Discoveries in French Opera-Comique and Mozart's Concert-Pieces—The Discrimination in Her Singing of Each—The Grace of the One and the Large Expression of the Other

Josef Hofmann, explaining his choice of one of Beethoven's pianoforte concertos for his appearances next month with the Symphony Orchestra, said that he had made it because he understood that Boston preferred something weighty and eloquent rather than merely brilliant. Of such is the ancient tradition that clothes the likings of this town in and out of the arts. Happily the tradition has become a little obsolete nowadays, and we Bostonians, like the rest of a sophisticated pleasure-loving and metropolitan world, would have at least our modicum of brilliancy. Perhaps, too, the logical Mr. Hoffmann would have modified his opinion had he heard the buzz of talk that hummed through the corridors and the auditorium during the intermission in the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. Miss Farrar, reappearing for the first time this autumn, was to be the singer. Numerous and eager was the press of listeners; the last possible entrant to the second balcony had need to be in line early in the morning, and keen was the interest in all that Miss Farrar might do. She had chosen two unusual pieces—an air from a forgotten Parisian opéra-comique, written nearly a hundred years ago by the equally forgotten Isouard, and a concert piece by Mozart equally unknown and neglected, originally written for a tenor, and lately compressed and revised for Miss Farrar by Dr. Muck. The talk, however, ran not to these rare pieces. No more was it concerned with anticipations of the quality of Miss Farrar's singing. It did not recall her appearances in Paris, at Salzburg and in Berlin in the months that she has been absent from America; it speculated upon none of the parts that she will take at the Metropolitan next winter. It was busy simple, solely and very intensely with what on this particular afternoon she might wear—the cut and color of her gown, the fashion of her hat, the variety of her jewels, the likelihood and the unlikelihood of a muff and other subtle artistic matters of the dressmaker's shop.

The hum subsided, the auditorium filled again; Hr. Fiedler took his place, and to the stage came Miss Farrar. A thousand necks craned themselves that twice as many eager eyes might scrutinize her. Gloved hands lifted opera glasses by tens, twenties and hundreds. One woman rose, stood unabashed, and looked her will. The debated question was answered: Miss Farrar carried a muff—to the masculine eye an oval pouch of white and gray fur. Anticipations and speculations were fulfilled or unfulfilled. Miss Farrar wore a simply cut pink frock touched at elbows and belt with black velvet. Her hat was turban-like with white lace around it, emanating a spiky bush of black feathers. The elect ladies of the audience whispered praise or dispraise during the orchestral preludings to Isouard's air. To the masculine eye, Miss Farrar with her clear skin, her dark eyes, her slender and elastic figure was altogether youthful and charming. Better still, never before in the concert-room in Boston has she seemed of such unaffected and poised youth. Her sicerity, her unconsciousness of herself and her audience, the grace of simplicity, the charm of repose all commended her.

Thus passed the critical moments of the afternoon, thus were the subtle æsthetic questions that the concert raised decided, thus was conjecture, disappointed or elated; and the company could settle into its seats to have its pleasure of Miss Farrar's singing. Her choice of her two airs praised her intelligent interest and inquiry into music, especially of French opéra-comique, that is unwisely neglected and her appreciation of the finer requirements of the concert-room and of a symphony concert in particular. The air from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin" is gentle and graceful music; the simple melody, meandering now and then over little rapids of vocal ornament, flows lightly, elegantly, beguilingly to a running accompaniment now softened by the woodwind choir, now accented by the strings, and it has its formal graces of repetition and return. It begins in the vein of tender and gently melancholy revery; it passes to the mood of girlish resolution; it rises in the final Allegro to youthful agitation and confident hope.

Miss Farrar, with her usual discriminative intelligence, made the timbre of her voice of the young girl who in the opera sings the music. Her voice was all of lightly melancholy, lightly resolved and lightly confident youth. Her tones flowed in the two-fold grace of simplicity and sincerity. They sustained the melodic hue of the air yet never once thickened it; they shaded it with the utmost delicacy; her phrases in half voice charmed the ear. She understood, she imparted the quiet elegance of the music. In light tones, almost in flecks of sound above the running accompaniment, she made play with the mood and the music of resolution, and led it adroitly into the repetitions and returns. Only near the end, where Isouard writes for vocal display, did her upper tones, smoother and fuller than she has sometimes made them, sharpen a little and so lost the adgelessness of her middle voice. Throughout, her finesse, her elegance, her grace of tone had been beautifully sympathetic to the music, even though the singing teachers may mislike her deliberately chosen timbre.

Mr. Fiedler shortly continued the impression of Isouard's music in the two simple and—shall we say?—genteel dances from Monsigny's "Aline" that made an orchestral intermezzo between Miss Farrar's numbers. The air from Mozart ("Misero! O Sogno, O son Desto", was of another sort and stamp. Mozart wrote it as a concert piece for an admired tenor, wrote in the Italian "grand style" that so delighted the Viennese of his last years—the style of his opera, "La Clemenza di Tito." Accordingly, the introductory recitative runs its portentous lengths that Dr. Muck has wisely shortened; and the air continues, according to the Italian manner as the end of the eighteenth century understood in measures that might be passionate at the beginning of the twentieth, were they not so complaisantly final, and so bedecorated with the ornaments of song. The recitative is of the composer of the final scenes of "Don Giovanni." It has breadth and sweep, intensity and power; it is of the voice of the abandoned and distraight lover. The andante of the air itself begins with a phrase of Mozartean loveliness of line and substance; but soon the precious "Italian manner" settles witheringly upon it. Formalism harnesses the emotional quality of the music. Much decoration checks it. The air is of Mozart easily accepting trammels that when he chose he could adjust to his dramatizing and imparting well.

MONDAY, Nov. 14, in Symphony Hall, a recital by Josef Hofmann, the pianist, for his first appearance here in seven years. Within that time he has attained to a rich maturity of powers of mind and hand and ripened into a pianist of imagination, feeling, range of expression and continent beauty of tone. The world over, except in the Boston to which he now returns, he has established his public. His programme is:

Sonata, Op. 111.....Beethoven
Scherzo, E Minor.....Mendelssohn
Phantasie, C Major.....Schumann
Ballade, G Minor.—Nocturne, E-Flat Major.—Valse, A-flat Major.—Scherzo, B Minor.....Chopin
Funerailles.—Consolation.—Campanella....Liszt

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1910.

THREE CONCERTS TO MARK EPOCH HERE

The association of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of three concerts, with Max Fiedler as conductor, should mean the opening of a new epoch in choral music in this city. The concerts are directly under the management of Charles A. Ellis, and the orchestra, through him, assumes responsibility for them. The Cecilia Society has for several weeks been rehearsing for the first concert on December 1, when Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be given and Mr. Fiedler has already had the chorus under his hand.

The chorus of the society now consists of one hundred and seventy voices, and in it there is absolutely not a "dead one." A chorus of trained singers of this kind is infinitely more effective than a large unwieldy chorus of untrained voices.

Novelty Wanted.

The three works to be presented were chosen after long deliberation. It was felt that one novelty should be given and that one of the great classical works should be presented, while it was decided that the success won several seasons ago by Pierne's "The Children's Crusade" warranted a repetition of this work. Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" was chosen because this is the most important choral composition in English that has been given to the world in several years. "Omar Khayyam" will have its first Boston appearance on Thursday evening, December 1, and "The Children's Crusade" will be sung at the second concert on Thursday evening, February 16.

It is many years since Bach's St. Matthew Passion has been sung in Boston. The work presents many and great difficulties of performance and demands long and arduous preparation if it is to be worthily done. It was felt that the time was ripe to present this once more and the date of its performance was made appropriately enough, Good Froday, April 14.

"Omar Khayyam" Soloists.

In "Omar Khayyam" the soloists will be Margaret Keyes, George Harris, Jr., and Robert Maitland. Mr. Maitland is an Englishman, who comes highly recommended by the composer, Mr. Bantock. In "The Children's Crusade" the singers will be Madame Rider Kelsey, Edith Chapman Goold, Edmond Clement and Claude Cunningham for the principal parts, local singers for the minor parts and a chorus of one hundred. Clement is the French tenor who had such extraordinary success in New York last year.

For the Passion music the singers will be Marie Zimmerman, who has made a specialty of Bach music; Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham. There will also be a choir of fifty boys.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves for Philadelphia to-night on its first Southern trip of the season. To-morrow evening it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening in New York, Friday evening in Brooklyn, Saturday afternoon in New York and the following Monday evening in Hartford.

Madame Melba will be the soloist in Philadelphia, Baltimore and at the matinee concert in New York, while Miss Geraldine Farrar will open the New York season by being soloist at the concert on Thursday evening. In Washington the soloist will be Miss Margaret Keyes and in Brooklyn Madame Jomelli, while in Hartford on the 14th the soloist will be Madame Berta Morena. Mr. Fiedler will play the second and third symphonies of Brahms and the second of Rachmaninoff.

HERALD, BOSTON,
NOVEMBER 6, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Symphony orchestra will leave for Philadelphia tonight on its first southern trip of the season. Tomorrow evening it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday evening in Baltimore, Thursday evening in New York, Friday evening in Brooklyn, Saturday afternoon in New York and the following Monday evening in Hartford. Never has the orchestra begun a season out of town with brighter prospects. The largest subscriptions in its history are reported in New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington. In Philadelphia there is hardly a seat for a single concert. Mme. Melba will be the soloist in Philadelphia, Baltimore and at the matinee concert in New York, while Miss Geraldine Farrar will open the New York season at the concert on Thursday evening. In Washington the soloist will be Miss Margaret Keyes, in Brooklyn Mme. Jomelli, in Hartford on the 14th Mme. Berta Morena. Mr. Fiedler will conduct the 2d and 3d symphonies of Brahms and the second of Rachmaninoff.

CECILIA AND THE SYMPHONY.

The association of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of three concerts, with Max Fiedler as conductor, should mean the opening of a new epoch in choral music in this city. Years ago a chorus was formed to co-operate with the orchestra, and in Mr. Gericke's first term of service and in the reign of Mr. Nikisch some interesting performances were given; but the plan did not work out satisfactorily. The Cecilia in its long and honorable career, during which it has brought many new works to Boston, has been hampered by its inability, especially in modern works, to employ a sufficient orchestra. The association of the orchestra and the Cecilia is necessarily in the nature of an experiment. The concerts are directly under the management of Charles A. Ellis, and the orchestra, through him, assumes responsibility for them.

At the first concert on Dec. 1 Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be performed, and Mr. Fiedler has already had the chorus under his hand. In rehearsing he is assisted by Mr. Malcolm Lang. The chorus of the society now consists of 170 live voices.

The three works chosen for performance were selected after long deliberation. It was felt that one novelty should be given and that one of the great classical works should be given. It was decided that the success of Pierne's "The Children's Crusade" warranted another performance. Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" was chosen because the score is attractive vocally and orchestrally; the subject itself is familiar and interesting. Furthermore Bantock is a leading English composer, and his "Omar Khayyam" is the most important choral composition in English that has been produced for several years.

"The Children's Crusade" will be sung at the second concert on Thursday evening, Feb. 16. It is many years since Bach's Passion according to Matthew has been performed in Boston. The work presents many difficulties and demands long preparation. The date of performance is appropriately Good Friday, April 14. The public rehearsal of the orchestra, which usually falls on Friday, in Holy Week is placed on Thursday, thus leaving Friday free.

In "Omar Khayyam" the singers will be Margaret Keyes, George Harris, Jr., and Robert Maitland. Mr. Maitland is an Englishman, highly recommended by Mr. Bantock. In "The Children's Crusade" the singers will be Mme. Rider-Kelsey, Edith Chapman Goold, Edmond Clement and Claude Cunningham for the principal parts, local singers for the minor parts and a chorus of 100. Mr. Clement is the French tenor who had such extraordinary success in New York last year. For the Passion music the singers will be Marie Zimmerman, who has made a specialty of such music; Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham. There will also be a choir of 50 boys.

The season sale will open at Symphony Hall Nov. 14.

JOSEF HOFMANN'S RECITAL.

The recital of piano music which Josef Hofmann is to give in Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow afternoon, Monday, the 14th, should attract a very large audience. Mr. Hofmann now ranks among the few great pianists in the world, and it is several years since he was heard here. There is a dearth of great artists in America this winter, and piano recitals worth while will be very few. Mr. Hofmann opened his season in New York on Oct. 29 with a recital in Carnegie Hall, and demonstrated that he is the only pianist capable of filling that hall with the exception of Mr. Paderewski. The critical notices were enthusiastic. The program will include Beethoven's sonata Opus 111, Mendelssohn's Scherzo in E-minor, Schumann's C-major Fantasia, Chopin's G-minor Ballade, E-flat major Nocturne, A-flat major Valse and the B-minor Scherzo, and Liszt's Funerailles, Consolation and Campanella.

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 30 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra

It will please the friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to know that the subscription for the five concerts which the orchestra will give in Philadelphia this season is the largest it has had in years, and nearly double that of last year. Comparatively few seats remain unsold.

For the first concert on Monday evening, November 7, Melba is to be the soloist, thus making her only appearance in Philadelphia this year. Her two numbers will be the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." The novelty will be an overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, and a man of very unusual creative talent, whose music has found a place in the repertoire of orchestras of Europe.

This overture had its first performance in Boston last spring, and made so favorable an impression that Mr. Fiedler is using it on all the programs of this first Southern trip. The symphony will be Brahms in F-major No. 3, and the other numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Manfred," and Wagner's overture, "Tannhauser."

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, when the orchestra will present Mme. Melba as soloist. This will be the only opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear this greatest of sopranos during the coming season. Mme. Melba has chosen for her numbers two strongly contrasted pieces, one the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," which demands perfection of bel canto, and the other, the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' opera, "Hamlet," which exacts the utmost virtuosity of execution in matters of skips, jumps, trills and all the other ornaments which are in the armory of a coloratura soprano.

The orchestral numbers will comprise Schumann's overture "Manfred," Brahm's Symphony No. 3 in F-major, Strube's comedy overture "Puck," and the "Tannhauser" overture. Gustav Strube, the composer of "Puck," is a man of extraordinary talent, which, like that of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, has been carefully fostered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he has been a member for the last twenty years. "Puck" is a work which has been received with such favor and in which Mr. Fiedler has so much faith that he placed it on all his concert programs of this present Southern trip of the orchestra.

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The subscription for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia this season is the largest in years, and is nearly double that of last year. Comparatively few seats remain unsold. For the first concert on Monday evening, November 7, Melba is to be the soloist, making her only appearance in Philadelphia this year. Her two numbers will be the "Dove Song" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." The novelty will be an overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, a man whose music has found a place in the repertoire of orchestras of Europe. This overture had its first performance in Boston last spring. Fiedler is using it on all the programs of this first Southern trip. The symphony will be Brahms in F major, No. 3, and the other numbers will be Schumann's overture "Manfred" and Wagner's overture, "Tannhaeuser."

From
Address
Date

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony To-night.

The first of the five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to be presented in Providence during the coming winter will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15. The subscription so far exceeds that for anything of the kind ever held in this city. The soloist will be Mme. Olive Fremstad, who is the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York city. The first two numbers on the programme are Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115, and Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97. The second section of the programme will consist of Gluck's aria, "Enfin il est dans ma puissance" from "Armide;" Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, and the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristran and Isolde" of Wagner.

The first large gathering of society will assemble in Infantry Hall to-night for the opening concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[53]

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE FIRST HALT IN THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Ten Concerts of the Autumn Bring the Orchestra to Finer Estate Than It Has Attained Since Mr. Fiedler Took It —Reger's New Quartet—The Singers, Songs in English and the "Final Group" of Their Programmes—Miss Farrar's Singing on Saturday—Mme. Melba at the Opera Houses—The New Season at the Metropolitan—Mr. Beecham Revises "Don Giovanni"

THE first period, so to say, of the Symphony Concerts ended on Saturday night—the five pairs that precede the autumnal departure of the orchestra to New York and the other cities of its monthly "trips." It was signalized by a repetition of Rachmaninoff's symphony in E-minor, the most interesting new piece of the year thus far, and the most generally liked new piece of many seasons. The repetition was signalized, in turn, like the playing of Brahms's symphony in F-major a week ago, by qualities of performance that Mr. Fiedler has fostered and attained in the band this autumn to a higher degree than in all the first two years of his conductorship. In a word, in the five weeks of the present season, Mr. Fiedler has cultivated beauty, euphony and varied finesse of tone as well as its amplitude, sweep and power. He has sought adroitly blended half tints of tonal coloring, as well as the broad spreading and the sharp emphases of its primary hues. His men, long expert in these changes and justly proud of their expertness, have been quick to answer him to the utmost of their ability. For the two years, indeed, in which he has been their chief, they have been only waiting for his call to such accomplishment, while these qualities happen also to be the merits that most shine in Mr. Witek, the new concert-master. The conductor and the orchestra, moreover, have regained them with no loss of the expressive force, the warming fire, the dramatizing and the poetizing accent, the emotional and the characterizing eloquence that was their heritage from the days of Dr. Muck. In the band and the conductor, as they have played since the first pair of concerts, the two sides of orchestral efficiency have been better balanced, have come nearer each to its own perfections, than they have in all the two years of Mr. Fiedler.

Rachmaninoff's and Brahms's symphonies, Scriabin's relentless tone-poem, Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Weber's to "Oberon" and Bach's "Brandenburg" concerto have all tested these qualities. Recall severally the performances of this music, and when have the trumpets been so brightly resonant, the trombones so richly sonorous, the whole brass choir at once so full-voiced, mellow and alive of tone. The new drummer has made his tympani the expressive means of an imaginative virtuoso. The wood-winds and the horns, unmatchable in any orchestra in America, have excelled their own loveliness of smooth, songful, delicately-bodied, and exquisitely-phrased tone, be it bright or shadowy. The violoncelli have wakened to new life with Mr. Schroeder at their first desk, and the whole body of strings has advanced in brightness and roundness of tone, in precision of accent, in united finesse of transitions and shadings. All these separate qualities, the conductor and the virtuosi who sit around him, and who were called to their feet on Saturday night by such applause as Symphony Hall has not known this year, have blended into a whole that is symmetry, euphony, and variety in unity themselves. Whether the orchestra has spoken with few or many voices, it has spoken with a harmonious and an adjusted beauty, with an ordered and a balanced power. In the gain of these attributes on the purely musical side of its playing, it has not lost a whit of the emotional force, the imparting sensitiveness, the imaginative range, the communicating and thrilling art that can make Rachmaninoff's symphony a changeful and intense drama in tones, that can revive the smiting chords and the tragic stride of "Egmont," summon the romantic glamor of "Oebron," unroll Scriabin's monstrous visions, and weave the patterns of Brahms's symphony and clothe them with the meditative passion, the still glow of feeling that lie behind. Last night the orchestra departed to other cities. They will hear it, as the sportsmen say, at the very top of its form.

H. T. P.

News of Music

IN quality of tone and in vocal artistry, Miss Farrar sang better in the Symphony Concert of Saturday night than she had in that of Friday afternoon. She attained her upped tones, even when they ran highest in the ornate passages of her two pieces, without the effort that sometimes thins, sharpens and dries them. On Saturday, alike in Isouard's and in Mozart's air, they were bright, clear and warm, with no detectable trace of effort and stridency. She renewed in her singing of Isouard's French music of a century ago, the elegance of phrasing, the sense of vocal style for its own sake that commended her on Friday and that even when the particular piece and the righteous demands of the concert-room exacted them, she has sometimes neglected. Dryly formal as much of Mozart's air seemed on a second hearing and so alien to the passion for expression that is usually uppermost in Miss Farrar, she sang it with a like sense of vocal style and with a polished felicity that was as finely discriminating as it was truly Mozartean. On the other hand, in her regard for equality of tone in the magnificent recitative that precedes the air, she hardly struck the dramatizing fire that she had in her first declaiming of it. Similarly, too, in her care, in Isouard's air, lest her tones become too "whitish," she hardly attained the characterizing timbre that made her singing on Friday seem like the very voice of a young girl songfully expressing her musings. In a word Miss Farrar to her first audience chose to be the dramatic singer who has entered the concert-room. To her second audience she preferred to be the singer that sets vocal purity and artistry above all else. Her hearers applauded her none too heartily after the air from the Parisian opéra-comique, perhaps, because, such music is strange to many and exacts an acquired taste. They were on surer ground with Mozart, and their applause was eager, warm and long. They had their joy, too, since Miss Farrar's dresses are a part of her artistry, of a very elaborately composed costume, seemingly, for the most part, of a dull golden web. It might becomingly have clothed one of the women that rise out of the heavy vapors of Théophile Gautier's oriental verses, and it was very far from the Watteau-like simplicity of her frock of Friday afternoon.

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. This will be the sixth successive season that the orchestra has visited Washington since it abandoned its concerts here in 1897.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of great brilliancy with which to open the season, and the management offers as soloist Miss Margaret Keyes, who is one of the leading contraltos on the concert stage.

The first number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," practically the only thing that has been left of Schumann's one opera. This will be followed by Brahms' Second Symphony in D major, the one which has been called the "idyllic" symphony, in that it seems to mirror the calm of a summer's day in the fields. It was the first of his symphonies to win general approval, and today is one of the most popular works of its kind in musical literature. The other orchestral numbers will be a comedy overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, and a tone poem by Sibelius, entitled "Finlandia."

Miss Keyes will sing two numbers; the first will be the lovely and familiar "Che Faro" from Gluck's "Orfeo" and the second the great aria from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," entitled "Penelope's Lament."

From EVE. STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducting, will open its series of five concerts for this season Tuesday afternoon, November 8, at the National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloists for the series will be Miss Margaret Keyes, Joseph Hofmann, Mischa Etman, Alwin Schroeder and Mme. Jomelli. The sale of seats is now in progress.

From EVE. STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the sixth successive season the orchestra has visited Washington. Five concerts are promised.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of brilliancy with which to open the season and the management offers as soloist Miss Margaret Keyes, a leading contralto.

The first number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva," practically the only thing that has been left of Schumann's one opera. This will be followed by Brahm's Second Symphony in D major, "the idyllic symphony." It was the first of Brahm's symphonies to win general approval, and today is one of the most popular works of its kind in musical literature. The other orchestral numbers will be a comedy overture entitled "Puck" by Gustav Strube and a tone poem by Sibelius entitled "Finlandia." Mr. Strube leans strongly toward the modern French school, especially in the matter of orchestration. "Puck" is light and sparkling. "Finlandia," by Sibelius, the Finnish composer, is a work expressing ardent patriotic feelings.

Miss Keyes will sing two numbers—the first "Che faro" from Gluck's "Orfeo" and the second the aria from Max Bruch's "Odysseus" entitled "Penelope's Lament."

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date NOV 6 - 10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. This will be the sixth successive season that the orchestra has visited Washington since it abandoned its concerts here in 1897.

The first number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," practically the only thing that has been left of Schumann's one opera. This will be followed by Brahm's "Second Symphony," in D major, the one which has well been called the "idyllic" symphony. The other orchestral number will be a comedy overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, and a tone poem by Sibelius, entitled "Finlandia." Gustav Strube is one of the extraordinary creative talents which has been developed in the orchestra, for Mr. Strube for the past twenty years has been one of the first violins, having been brought to America during the regime of Arthur Nikisch.

Miss Keyes will sing two numbers; the first will be the lovely and familiar "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the second the great aria from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," entitled "Penelope's Lament."

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM ARRANGED

The first Boston Symphony concert in Washington will be given at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 8, at 4:30 o'clock.

The soloist will be Miss Margaret Keyes, who has won wide attention in the last two or three years and today is generally regarded as a leading concert contralto of this country. She is to sing two numbers, one of which is the familiar "Che faro, Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orfeo" and the other is "Penelope's Lament," from Bruch's cantata, "Odysseus."

The symphony will be Brahm's second in D major.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

---

* * *

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8:15. This is the 26th successive season in which the orchestra has come to Philadelphia, its first appearance here having been in the spring of 1886, and it starts this season with the largest subscription it has had in many years. Moreover, in accordance with the set policy of the management to begin its series of concerts in each of the different cities it visits as brilliantly as possible, the orchestra will present as soloist Madame Melba. This will be the only opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear this great soprano during the coming season. In fact, she has no intention of returning to the United States for at least two years, for she is entirely engrossed with her plans of giving opera in Australia, which will occupy all her time and attention for the coming two seasons. Madame Melba has just finished a tour through British America, which extended from Halifax, in the East, to Calgary and Edmonton, in the far Northwest. Her progress has been one of triumph, for most of the places that she visited had never heard her before. Those who have heard her sing this year say that her voice has never been more beautiful nor her art more perfect.

The prima donna has chosen for her numbers two strongly contrasted arias, one the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the other the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's opera "Hamlet," which demands the utmost virtuosity of execution. The orchestral numbers will comprise Schumann's overture "Manfred," Brahms' Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Strube's comedy overture "Puck" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. Gustav Strube, the composer of "Puck," is a man of extraordinary talent, which like that of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler has been carefully fostered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he has been a member for the last 20 years. "Puck" is a work which has been received with such favor that Mr. Fiedler has placed it on all the concert programmes of the present Southern trip of the orchestra.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

---

* * *

For the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, November 7, Melba is to be the soloist, thus making her only appearance in Philadelphia this year. Her two numbers will be the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the mad scene from Thomas's "Hamlet." The novelty will be an overture, entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, and a man of very unusual creative talent, whose music has found a place in the repertoire of orchestras of Europe. This overture had its first performance in Boston last spring, and made so favorable an impression that Mr. Fiedler is using it on all the programmes of this first southern trip. The symphony will be Brahms in F major, No. 3, and the other numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Manfred," and Wagner's overture, "Tannhauser."

From EVE. STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony concert in Washington will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 8, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Miss Margaret Keyes, who is generally regarded as one of the leading concert contraltos of this country. She is to sing two numbers, one of which is the familiar "Che faro, Eurydice" from Gluck's "Orfeo" and the other is Penelope's "Lament" from Bruch's cantata, "Odysseus." This last work used to be a favorite number with concert contraltos, for it lies in the best of their voice and is full of good, sound melody. Of recent years it has not been sung so much and will be a novelty to many. The symphony will be Brahm's second in D major.

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony concert in Washington will be given in the National on Tuesday afternoon, November 8, at 4:30, and the sale of seats will open tomorrow morning at Droop's music store, Thirteenth and G streets. The soloist will be Miss Margaret Keyes, who has rushed forward in the last two or three years, and today is regarded by many as the leading concert contralto of this country. She is to sing two numbers, one of which is the familiar "Che faro, Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the other is "Penelope's Lament," from Bruch's cantata, "Odysseus." The symphony will be Brahm's delightful second in D major.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

It will please the friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to know that the subscription for the five concerts which the orchestra will give in Philadelphia this season is the largest it has had in years and nearly double that of last year. Comparatively few seats remain unsold.

For the first concert on Monday evening, November 7, Melba is to be the soloist, thus making her only appearance in Philadelphia this year. Her two numbers will be the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." The novelty will be an overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, and a man of very unusual creative talent whose music has found a place in the repertoire of orchestras of Europe. This overture had its first performance in Boston last Spring, and made so favorable an impression that Mr. Fiedler is using it on all the programs of this first southern trip. The symphony will be Brahms in F Major No. 3, and the other numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Manfred," and Wagner's overture, "Tannhauser."

* * *

From EVE. BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Giving the first of its series of five concerts at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 7, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have as soloist Madame Melba, who, it is announced, on that occasion is to make her only appearance in Philadelphia this season, and probably for at least two years. Her two numbers will be the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the florid Mad Scene from Thomas's "Hamlet," in which her facility as a coloratura singer will have full opportunity for display. The instrumental novelty of the program is to be an overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra and said to be a man of unusual creative talent, whose music has found a place in the repertoire of orchestras in Europe. This overture had its first performance in Boston last spring and made so favorable an impression that Mr. Fiedler is making frequent use of it. The symphony will be Brahms's E-major, No. 3, the other numbers being Schumann's overture, "Manfred," and the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner.

From TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

It will please the friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to know that the subscription for the five concerts which the Orchestra will give in Philadelphia this season is the largest it has had in years and nearly double that of last year. For the first concert, on Monday evening, November 7, Mme. Melba is to be the soloist, making her only appearance in Philadelphia this year. Her two numbers will be the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the Mad Scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." The novelty will be an overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the Orchestra and a man of very unusual creative talent, whose music has found a place in the repertoires of orchestras of Europe. The symphony will be Brahms', in F major, No. 3, and the other numbers will be Schumann's overture "Manfred" and Wagner's overture "Tannhaeuser."

From NEWS
Address
Date OCT 26 1910

DELIGHTFUL CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

The opening of the 30th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in this city, which occurred at Infantry Hall last evening, was a brilliant affair, both artistically and socially, and the first of the five concerts of the series advertised for the season, was all that music lovers could desire.

The magnificent band of instrumentalists, under the direction of Dr. Max Fiedler, never played better than it did last evening, and much interest was manifested in M. A. Witek, formerly of Berlin, who fills the concertmaster's chair, in place of Willy Hess, so well known to Providence audiences, and it is evident that the change has brought no detriment whatever to the splendid orchestra.

It is a recognized fact that Dr. Fiedler has always excelled as a maker of programs, and every devotee of music warmly appreciated his delicate compliment to the memory of Robert Schumann, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the eminent composer, and the first part of the concert was made up of the works of Schumann, the program being as follows:

Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115 ..... Schumann
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97 ..... Schumann
Aria, "Enfin, il est dans ma puissance," from "Armide,".....Gluck
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20 ..... Richard Strauss
Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," ..... Wagner

The overture to "Manfred" is widely known, and has been made familiar to Providence audiences by the predecessors of Dr. Fiedler, but it can truthfully be said that never was it played better in Providence, its beautifully sympathetic qualities being brought out with a charm that was truly delightful. The symphony in E-flat, also displayed a masterly piece of playing on the part of the orchestra.

Strauss' tone-poem, like much of his work, even if a trifle sensational, is a brilliant composition, and the orchestra, under Dr. Fiedler's splendid reading, did the composer full justice, and applause was most lavish, but most deserved.

Great as was the orchestra music, there were, perhaps, many in the audience who were more interested in the appearance of Mme. Olive Fremstad, classed as the first dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Mme. Fremstad is a vocalist, in all that the term implies, and while no fault can be found with the clearness of her voice, nor with her method, the fact remains that in certain passages there seems to be a marked lack of sympathetic qualities, those qualities so necessary to a lyric artist, and without which great success is impossible.

Mme. Fremstad, however, is an artist, for in the Gluck aria she did splendid work in vocalization, while in the finale of "Tristan and Isolde" she arose to artistic heights which easily proved how she had scored so much success as an opera singer.

The next concert by the orchestra will be given on the evening of Tuesday, Nov. 22.

From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it has secured three artists of unusual quality for the three concerts it is to give in Hartford during the coming season. At the first concert, Monday evening, November 14, the soloist will be Mme. Berta Morena, one of the principal dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera company of New York. Madame Morena was the successor in the Munich opera of Mme. Milka Ternina and the two seasons in which she has been in America were marked with unusual success. Not only is Madame Morena the possessor of a beautiful voice and great histrionic talent, but she is considered one of the most beautiful women in the world, having been made famous by Lenbach, the great German painter.

At the second concert, January 16, the soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has made so profound an impression in the few weeks he has been in this country. Mr. Witek is a Bohemian by birth, 38 years old and for sixteen years preceding his coming to this country was concert master of the famous Philharmonic orchestra of Berlin.

At the third and last concert on February 27, the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, the great pianist, who is coming to America again this year for a limited tour.

Mr. Fiedler, of course, will again be the conductor of the orchestra. Seats and details at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT

BIG AUDIENCE HEARD BRILLIANT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Fremstad Enthusiastically Received.

It was a notable audience that gathered in Infantry Hall last evening for the first concert of the series to be given during the winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra has been kinder to Providence this year than ever before, assigning five concerts for this city and promising some of the finest soloists in the country to assist the musicians at these events. It is to the credit of the city, too, that the music lovers have responded with evident appreciation of the favor and a determination to improve an opportunity such as has never before been accorded the people of this city to the same extent. The audience that practically filled the spacious hall last night was one of which any musical organization might well be proud, including music lovers, society people and indeed men and women in all walks of life. It was thoroughly representative of the classes in the city who appreciate the best things in the musical held and are glad to enjoy them when they are given the chance to do so.

The orchestra is as fine as ever and Conductor Max Fiedler has the same control over it and has it keyed up to the same high pitch of excellence that has been responsible for the perfection of its programmes since he took charge. Mr. Fiedler knows how to make up a programme as well as to train his men to render it with skill and expression. For the opening concert of the local season he selected numbers which were not only admirably calculated to show the ability of the orchestra but also to give the height of enjoyment to the audience. The first two were chosen from Schumann's works in tribute to the great composer whose centenary was celebrated this year; the third was a Gluck composition for vocalist, the fourth a Strauss production for the orchestra, and the last a selection from Wagner, for both instrumental and vocal rendition. This is a variety of authors that could not be excelled, and the numbers themselves were among the best works of the composers.

The two orchestral numbers from Schumann were the overture to Byron's "Manfred" and the "Rhenish" symphony in E-flat major, and the Strauss selection was the tone poem, "Don Juan." These were all rendered in a manner that evoked the enthusiasm of the audience and left little to be said in criticism or in restraint of praise. There was a brilliance of technique and a sonorous quality to the music that quite satisfied the most exacting, while the Wagner music in connection with the final vocal selection was particularly effective.

The vocalist was Mme. Olive Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York and the audience at the close counted itself fortunate to have had the pleasure of listening to her. Her first number was the aria from Gluck's "Armide," which by many is considered the masterpiece of the composer. "Enfin, il est dans ma puissance" is known by title, but has not been rendered in this country for many years so that it had all the charm of a new production. Her other selection was the closing song of the great tragedy from "Tristan and Isolde," and as she is counted as one of the best singers of those who aspire to the rendering of this production it was a rare treat. Mme. Fremstad possesses a voice of fine volume and pleasing quality and handles it in a manner that shows the long and painstaking training she has given it. She showed that she fully deserves the position she has won as a concert singer and she was given hearty and prolonged applause at the close of her selections.

This initial concert gives promise of a most enjoyable season of musical events this winter under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From TRIBUNE
Address
Date

Symphony Concert.

In the audience at the first of the series of Symphony Concerts in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening were President Faunce of Brown University and Mrs. Faunce, Gen. Willam Ames, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Charles L. A. Heiser, Mrs. Howard Richmond, Mr. Laurence Richmond, Rev. and Mrs. Richard R. Graham, Mr. Edward Aborn Greene, Mrs. Sarah A. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Prof. John W. Greene, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Miss Lyra Brown Nickerson, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Miss Edith Kimball, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Metcalf, Mrs. Albert A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mrs. Ellery H. Wilson, Mrs. Austin Strong, the Misses Hunt, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Miss Harriot Eudora Barrows, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. Hans Schneider, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mrs. George M. Thornton, Mrs. Samuel Morris Conant, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Miss May Atwood, Mrs. E. P. Trowbridge, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mrs. E. B. Knight, Miss Amelia S. Knight, Miss Molly Banigan, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Bubier, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. and Mrs. George Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen Capron, Judge and Mrs. William H. Sweetland, Mr. and Mrs. G. C. Cameron, Miss Ethel Tower, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley Martin, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Mrs. Walter H. Durfee, Mrs. Henry D. Wellman, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara Hess.

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 23 19
Establi 4

There has been so much discussion in Berlin over the coming to this country of Anton Witek, the Boston Symphony's new concert master, that the following from the Berlin correspondent of the Musical Courier will be of interest:

"Berlin is sorry to lose Witek. For 16 years he was a prominent figure in the musical life of this city, and he made a host of friends and admirers here, as a man as well as concert master, soloist, ensemble performer and teacher. As a concert master, Witek is unexcelled, and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra will find it difficult to replace him. He came here from Prague in 1894, and for a full decade and a half he led the violins of this band of musicians. He was also the leading soloist among the personnel of the orchestra, and his frequent appearances at the Tuesday, Wednesday and Sunday popular concerts were always signals for full houses.

"It happened that I came to Berlin the same year that Witek did, and I distinctly recall hearing him play for the first time at one of the Tuesday 'Pops' in the fall of 1894. His number that night was Mendelssohn's concerto; he gave a beautiful, finished, artistic performance of the well-worn piece, his technic was impeccable, his intonation faultless, even then, and he played with the ease and assurance of the brilliant virtuoso.

"Witek at that time was only about 18 years old. Since then I have heard him play practically his entire repertory, which embraces everything of interest in violin literature. Witek prefers, however, the big symphonic concertos, like Brahms's, Beethoven's and Tschaikowsky's, although he is thoroughly at home in the virtuoso pieces of Wieniawski, Ernst and Paganini. As an ensemble player, Witek has made an enviable reputation for himself in Germany. The annual series of concerts given by his trio in this city ranked among the best that Berlin had to offer in this genre.

"It was always a marvel to me how Witek retained his technic and repertory, as with his orchestra work, his solo and ensemble playing and teaching, he was an exceedingly busy man. Many Americans studied under him during his stay in the German capital, and they always spoke of their teacher with enthusiasm. Witek is a Bohemian, not a German, and he studied at the Prague Conservatory under Bennewitz, who was also the teacher of Halir, Ondricek and Zajic. He came to Berlin at the age of 18, and he was identified with the musical life of this city uninterruptedly up to the end of last season.

"Vita Witek, the violinist's wife, is a pianist of ability and attainments. A pupil of Leschetizky and Carreno, she has been the pianist of the Witek trio ever since it was founded, and she has proved to be an able partner for her husband. The artist couple will continue their ensemble work in Boston."

* * *

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From
Address
Dat
Es 884

Musical Notes

THE event of the week in local musical circles will be the inauguration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here, with a concert at which Madame Olive Fremstad will be the soloist, in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening. The subscription sale has been the largest in the history of Providence concerts by this organization, and the season promises to be a brilliant one.

The first part of the opening programme will be devoted to Schumann. Mr. Fiedler this year has joined in celebrating the centenary of Schumann's birth and at his first concert in Boston devoted the entire programme to the works of that composer. This is possible where a series of 24 concerts is given, but he did not feel it fair to give the whole of one programme out of the five in this city to any one composer. The first number will be the "Manfred" overture, which is a part of the music Schumann wrote, inspired by Byron's poem. The second number will be the "Rhenish" Symphony, the third of the series of four Schumann wrote and the one which was inspired by his much-beloved river Rhine.

The second part of the programme will be miscellaneous. The first number will be the aria from Gluck's "Armide," "Enfin, il est dans ma puissance," which is to open the coming season at the Metropolitan in New York with Madame Fremstad as the principal star. Following this will come Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and finally the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," the last part of which Madame Fremstad will sing. While this in its purely orchestral transcription has been played many times in Providence, it is doubtful whether the voice part has ever been given.

The complete programme is as follows: Schumann, overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115; Schumann, symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97; I. Lebhaft; II. Sehr massig; III. Nicht schnell; IV. Feierlich; V. Lebhaft; Gluck, Aria, "Enfin, is est dans ma puissance" from "Armide;" Richard Strauss, tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20; Wagner, prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

* * *

1884

[55]

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT -6

Symphony Concert.

In the audience at the first of the series of Symphony Concerts in Infantry Hall last evening were President Faunce of Brown University and Mrs. Faunce, Gen. William Ames, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Charles L. A. Heiser, Mrs. Howard Richmond, Mr. Laurence Richmond, Rev. and Mrs. Richard R. Graham, Mr. Edward Aborn Greene, Mrs. Sarah A. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott A. Clarke, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Prof. John W. Greene, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Miss Lyra Brown Nickerson, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Miss Edith Kimball, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Metcalf, Mrs. Albert A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mrs. Ellery H. Wilson, Mrs. Austin Strong, the Misses Hunt, Mrs. Annie Gilbreth Cross, Miss Harriot Eudora Harrows, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. Hans Schneider, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mrs. George M. Thornton, Mrs. Samuel Morris Conant, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Miss May Atwood, Mrs. E. P. Trowbridge, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mrs. E. B. Knight, Miss Amelia S. Knight, Miss Molly Banigan, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Bubier, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. and Mrs. George Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen Capron, Judge and Mrs. William A. Sweetland, Mr. and Mrs. G. C. Cameron, Miss Ethel Tower, Mr. and Mrs. Wesley Martin, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Mrs. Walter Durfee, Mrs. Henry D. Wellman, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara Hess.

McDowell Club.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Excellent Programme is to be Rendered This Evening.

To-night brings to Infantry Hall the first of the five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which will be given here this season. The management reports that the subscriptions far exceed anything of the kind the orchestra has ever had in this city, and to-night it is fairly certain that every seat in the house will be sold, not only because of the great favor that has been won here in the past by the orchestra, but because Providence is not willing to miss the opportunity to hear an artist like Mme. Olive Fremstad, who is the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. The programme is as follows:

Overture to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115, Schumann; Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3, "Rhenish," op. 97, Schumann; aria, "Enfin, il est dans ma puissance," from "Armide," Gluck; tone poem, "Don Juan," op. 20, Richard Strauss; prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner. Soloist, Mme. Olive Fremstad.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

HANS SCHNEIDER LECTURES.

Gives Talk on Boston Symphony Concert Programme at Brown.

Hans Schneider delivered an instructive informal talk at Brown University yesterday afternoon on last night's programme of the Boston Symphony concert before an audience which followed the remarks of the speaker with close attention.

Mr. Schneider did not give a so-called analytical exposition of the programme, but spoke on the programme itself in general as a beautiful representation of the romantic and modern school of music.

He spoke at length on Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" as one of the greatest tonal monuments to the philosophy of Schopenhauer, and demonstrated the tremendous development of the "musical sense." He commented on the astonishing ability and the complicated brainwork the compositions of such modern masters as Strauss represented.

From
Address
Date

The Boston Symphony will open its season this evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15 o'clock, with a delightful programme, in which it will have the assistance of Mme. Olive Fremstad, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT -6

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME TALK.

Aans Schneider Gave Interesting Lecture at Brown University.

The lectures o nthe programme of the Symphony concerts had a most auspicious opening, with Hans Schneider's talk yesterday afternoon at Brown University before a distinguished audience of people. Mr. Schneider made the well-arranged programme the basis of a most interesting talk on the Romantic School of Music, and the most modern school. He showed how tremendously the so-called Music Science gained, when men of education, such as Schumann, Wagner and Strauss, brought their musical ability into touch with life in general.

The audience followed the expositions of the speaker with the closest attention, from beginning to end. As usual, Mr. Schneider traveled untrodden paths and opened a new avenue of thought to his audience.

From WORLD
Address New York City
Date

CONCERTS BY BOSTON LEADING ORCHESTRA.

MME. SHANNA C JONES.

Mme. Shanna Cumming Jones to Give Two Lecture Recitals.

The first of the five Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Opera House of the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, soprano, will be the soloist. She will sing an interesting work, which will be heard for the first time in this country. It is a hymn to Pallas Athena by Saint-Saens and was written for the Musical Festival given in the old Roman Theatre in Orange, France, in 1894. The hymn shows Saint-Saens at his best. The concert Friday evening will be the one hundred and eighteenth the orchestra has given in this city.

From PRESS
Address New York City.
Date

Symphony Rehearsals Popular.

Rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston attract as fashionable a throng as do the regular Saturday evening performances. These rehearsals are held on a Friday afternoon and are suited specially for persons living at a distance from Boston or for persons who may have other engagements on Saturday evening. Though the rehearsals at first were held purely to give poorer persons an opportunity to hear good music, they became so popular that they have become really an institution. Middle-aged men and women, perhaps, take to them more than the younger folk who make the Saturday evening concert a brilliant affair. Mrs. Francis G. Peabody is a regular attendant of the concerts. Eben D. Jordan, former Governor and Mrs. John D. Long, Mrs. Frederick L. W. Richardson, Mrs. Frances Stanley, Mrs. Francis L. Higginson and Mrs. Leon White may often be seen at the concerts.

From EVE. SUN
Address New York City.
Date NOV 3 - 1910

FARRAR AND MELBA.

Max Fiedler Brings Symphonies and Stars.

For perhaps the last time before the Pennsylvania tunnels open a new way across New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra passed down the East River and around the Battery yesterday on the first journey of the season to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and back again to New York.

Max Fiedler has made Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor his principal number to be played in Baltimore and New York, Brahms's symphony in F major in Philadelphia, New York and Brooklyn, and Gustav Strube's overture, "Puck," to be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and New York.

These are the chief items in his programmes, with Schumann's overtures to "Manfred" and to "Genoveva," Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and Sibelius's "Finlandia" for the incidental pieces to be oftenest repeated.

NELLY MELBA.

In Baltimore and in Philadelphia Mme. Melba will assist the orchestra and at one concert in this city, the Saturday matinée, while Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the singer here on Thursday evening.

From MORN. TELEGRAPH
Address New York City.
Date OCT 30 1910

Max Fiedler has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday evening, November 10, Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, and he will use a genuine harpsichord for the continuo. He tried this in Boston last week with much success and found that it was infinitely better than a piano and quite loud enough for the purpose even in a large hall against fifty-eight strings. On Saturday afternoon he purposes [illegible] Gustav Strube's Comedy Overture "Puck." Mr. Strube, as is generally known, is a member of the orchestra, and is unusually gifted as a composer. This overture is the last of his large works and was played first by the orchestra last Spring and has just been published by Schirmer. Mr. Fiedler thinks so well of it that he plays it at all of the concerts of the November tour of the orchestra.

From Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 29 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS ITS THIRTIETH SEASON

Famous Orchestra Comes Here for Twenty-second Year.

ITS INTERESTING HISTORY.

Long Acknowledged the Peer of Any Similar Organization in the World.

The musical writers in Boston during the past month have been devoting considerable space in commemoration of the fact that the season of 1910-1911 will be the thirtieth of Boston's great orchestra. This will be the twentieth consecutive season in which it has given concerts in Brooklyn and twenty-second season in which it has visited this city, and in the twenty-one seasons that have passed it has given here 117 concerts.

As is generally known, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was organized in the fall of 1881 by Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, whose purpose was to provide that city with a competent band, which up to that time it had not possessed. In the first year the orchestra gave twenty pairs of concerts in Boston—that is to say, twenty public rehearsals and twenty concerts, respectively, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The men of the orchestra were engaged for four days a week, this time being deemed sufficient to cover the rehearsals and performances, for in those days the public rehearsals were rehearsals in fact as well as in name and it was not at all unusual for the conductor to stop the orchestra in the midst of a work and begin over again. The next year, however, a change was made. The orchestra was hired by the week and the rule then put in force which has been one of the secrets of the orchestra's success, that the members must give their time exclusively to it.

In 1882-83 a few concerts were given outside of Boston, the first out-of-town concert being in Newport, and in the next season a few more concerts were given outside of Boston. In the second year the number of public rehearsals and concerts was increased to twenty-four, and in the third year to twenty-six, but in 1884-85, with the coming of Mr. Gericke from Vienna, the number of rehearsals and concerts in Boston was set at twenty-four each, which number has held good since that time.

In the five years that Mr. Gericke served with the orchestra its number was gradually increased from sixty-five to eighty, and the invasion of the South and West began. In the spring of 1886 concerts were given in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and cities as far west as St. Louis. In the spring of 1887 three concerts were given in New York and in the following year the first concert, on Dec. 12, 1887, was given in the old Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Brooklyn was next visited on April 1, 1899, when the orchestra was on its way to the South and West and it was not until the fall of 1891 that it began to come regularly to this city. In that year it succeeded the Thomas Orchestra in giving the philharmonic concerts, and in 1891-92, 1892-93, 1893-94 and 1894-95 it gave ten concerts each season, in pairs usually, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. In the season of 1895-96 but five concerts were given, but in 1896-97 eight concerts were the allotment, one in November, one in December and three pairs, respectively, in January, February and March. Ten concerts also were given in 1897-98 and 1898-99, but in 1899-1900 the number was reduced to five on Friday evenings, which has held good since. Until the burning of the old Academy of Music in the season of 1903-04 all the concerts were given there and in the years intervening between then and the opening of the new Academy of Music the concerts were given in the Baptist Temple.

When Mr. Gericke came to Boston from Vienna in the fall of 1884 he quickly made up his mind that radical changes were necessary in the personnel if results worthy of the cause were to be obtained and in the following year he brought over from Vienna a number of young men to strengthen the string choirs. Among these were the members of the original Kneisel Quartet, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Svecenski, Emanuel Fiedler and Fritz Giese. The formation of the Kneisel Quartet followed in the next season and during the years of its struggle to gain a permanent footing, it, like the orchestra, was supported by the generosity of Mr. Higginson.

In the five years Mr. Gericke was conductor of the orchestra, it attained a high degree of efficiency, took its place as the leading organization of its kind in this country, and was able to dispute supremacy with any orchestra in Europe. The policy of improving the personnel was followed with persistent care, no expense being spared to get the right men in the right places. The result was that when Arthur Nikisch, known then only as a young and talented conductor, came to Boston in the fall of 1889 from Leipsic, he found a remarkable instrument with which to work and when he left four years later his fame as one of the great conductors of the world was secure, while the Boston Symphony Orchestra was undisputed leader in the

It is a bit of interesting history that Hans Richter was engaged as successor to Nikisch. At the last moment, although the contract was signed, sealed and delivered, the great Austrian conductor defaulted, pleading his fear of crossing the Atlantic, but he recommended highly as a man to take his place young Karl Muck of Berlin, who was then in his third year as conductor of the Royal Opera in that city. Dr. Muck still possesses the letter Richter wrote him at that time, urging him most strongly to leave Germany and go to Boston. But Dr. Muck doubted the wisdom of such a move and refused the appointment without qualification, so that in the eleventh hour, Mr. Higginson, having hurried to Germany in the middle of the summer, Emil Paur, who has succeeded Nikisch in the Opera House in Leipsic, was engaged for a term of five years.

When this term was ended Mr. Gericke returned and was at the head of the orchestra for the succeeding eight years. It was during this time that Henry Wood, the celebrated English conductor, called the Boston Symphony Orchestra "the most wonderful music box in the world." It is ony fair to say that never in its history were the tonal qualities of the orchestra so absolutely perfect as they were during these last years under Mr. Gericke. Although to get such a perfection of tone, other qualities had to be sacrificed, yet when the final history of the orchestra is written, the name of Gericke will loom large on its pages, for he is the man who delivered a perfect instrument, first to Nikisch and then to Muck.

Mr. Gericke was followed for two years by Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who was obtained by a petition sent direct to the German Emperor to give him a leave of absence for that time, and when at the end of his second season Emperor William refused to allow him to stay away from Berlin any longer, Mr. Fiedler, of Hamburg, the present conductor, was engaged. Mr. Fiedler has now been at the head of the orchestra for two years and his contract runs for this season and next.

When its thirtieth year is finished the orchestra will have given a total of 2,846 concerts which is an average of nearly 100 concerts a year. When it is considered that the orchestra's season runs but seven months and that the time is devoted solely to serious symphony concerts, this is a record which can hardly be equaled the world over. In that time over 900 different titles or orchestral works have appeared on its programmes. This year it gives a total of 117 concerts, which is the largest number in its history.

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York City.

Date NOV 6 - 1910

Symphonie-Konzert.

Die beiden ersten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler finden in Carnegie Hall nächsten Donnerstag Abend resp. Samstag Nachmittag mit den Damen Farrar, bezw. Melba als Solistinnen statt. Das Programm für den Donnerstag lautet: Rachmaninoff, Zweite Symphonie; Bach, Drittes Brandenburgisches Streich-Konzert; Beethoven's „Egmont"-Ouverture, wozu Frl. Farrar Arien von Mozart und Isouard singen wird. Die Samstags-Matinee bringt Schumann's „Manfred"-Ouverture; Brahms' Dritte Symphonie, Sibelius „Finlandia" und Strube's Lustspielouverture „Puck" (neu). Frau Melba singt eine Arie aus Mozart's „Die Hochzeit des Figaro" und die Wahnsinnsscene aus Thomas' „Hamlet".

Das Programm der kommenden Freitag und Samstag Nachmittag unter Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch stattfindenden Konzerte des New Yorker Symphonie-Orchesters ist Gluck und Mozart gewidmet. Das Programm bringt u. a. Mozart's G-Moll-Symphonie, die Balletmusik aus "Les petits riens", drei Balletarien von Gluck und mehrere von Herrn Emilio de Gogorza gesungene Kompositionen der genannten Meister.

Am Abend des 17. November findet in Carnegie Hall das Eröffnungs-Konzert des Russischen Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Herrn Modest Altschuler statt. Auch dieses Orchester bringt Rachmanioff's Zweite Symphonie und mehrere russische Novitäten. Herr Alexander Heinemann, der bekannte deutsche Liedersänger, wirkt als Solist mit.

Am 17. Dezember, anläßlich des zweiten diesjährigen Konzerts der Konzerte für junge Leute, findet eine Bühnenvorstellung von Pierné's „Kinder von Bethlehem" in Carnegie Hall unter der Leitung von Walter Damrosch statt.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date NOV 9 - 1910

IN WASHINGTON SOCIETY.

[From The Tribune Bureau.]

Washington, Nov. 8.—Members of the diplomatic corps and official and resident society gathered at the New National this afternoon for the Boston Symphony concert. Mrs. Taft occupied a box, and had with her Mrs. MacVeagh, wife of the Secretary of the Treasury; Mrs. A. Garrison McClintock, of New York and Washington, and the Assistant Secretary of War and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver. Mrs. Leiter had in her box General and Mrs. Ernst, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner M. Randolph and Mrs. Norman Williams. Mrs. Robert R. Hitt entertained Mrs. William J. Boardman and Miss Boardman, and among others at the concert were Mrs. Philander C. Knox, the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff and the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon.

Lieutenant and Mrs. Charles Russell Train will entertain a party of young people at luncheon on board the Sylph on November 15, with Miss Helen Taft as the guest of honor.

The Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, who are now in New York, will return here to-morrow. They will be accompanied by the latter's mother, Mrs. John D. Wood.

Mr. and Mrs. Edson Bradley arrived here to-day and will remain until Thursday, when they will go to North Carolina for two weeks. They will then return to Washington for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. William P. Eno will arrive here at the end of this week, to open their house for the season.

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York City.

Date NOV 910

The first New York concerts this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place Thursday evening, Nov. 10, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 12, at Carnegie Hall. Thursday evening, with Miss Geraldine Farrar as soloist, the programme will comprise Rachmaninoff's second symphony, an air from Isouard's opera "Jeannot et Colin," Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, a rediscovered concert scena by Mozart, "Misero! O segno! O son desto!" and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. At the Saturday concert Mme Melba will be the soloist, singing "Dove sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and the mad scene from "Hamlet." The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms's F major symphony, Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck," and Sibelius's tone poem "Finlandia."

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiedler has arranged the opening programme of the first Boston Symphony orchestra to include Bach's Third Brandenbourg Concerto for strings and he will use a genuine harpsichord as he did in Boston last week, with much success. The Rachmaninoff Symphony will also figure on the programme and Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist.

Saturday afternoon he will play Gustav Struber's comedy overture "Puck." Mr. Struber is a member of the orchestra and several of his compositions have already been played by this organization. Mme. Melba will be the soloist for the afternoon concert and Mme. Jomelli will appear with the Boston Symphony orchestra in its Brooklyn concert.

ANGES BAUER.

From EVE. TELEGRAM

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiedler has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next Thursday evening Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings and he will use a genuine harpsichord. He tried this in Boston last week with much success and found that it was infinitely better than a piano and quite loud enough for the purpose even in a large hall against fifty-eight strings.

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

Date OCT 29 1910

Philip Hale announces that an exhaustive catalogue of the programmes of all the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra outside of Boston, as well as in that city, is now being prepared. The catalogue is so made that any one looking, for instance, at "Beethoven: Symphony No. 1," will see at a glance how often and where this symphony has been played, with the date of performance.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences has arranged for several concerts to be held in the coming weeks. On November 11 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of a series of five philharmonic concerts. Mme. Jomelli will sing as an assisting artist. The New York Symphony Orchestra will begin a course of five symphony concerts for young people on November 11.

The concerts will be held on Saturday afternoons. Signor Alessandro Bonci will appear under the auspices of the institute on November 17. R. G. Knowles will complete his course of illustrated lectures on travel on November 12. His last topic will be "Bohemia and Prague."

Three days later, on November 15, Dwight L. Elmendorf will return to Brooklyn to give a series of five afternoon and evening illustrated lectures on travel. His first topic will be "London and Edward VII." The lectures will fall on successive Tusdays.

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date

With Mr. Max Fiedler again as conductor, the Boston Orchestra will give its first concert here this season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening. Miss Geraldine Farrar, the soloist on this occasion, will sing a Mozart aria and one from a forgotten French opera, "Jeannot et Colin," by Isouard, who died in 1818. The orchestra will be heard in Rachmaninoff's second symphony, in one of Bach's Brandenburg concertos for strings and in Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who is to be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music Nov. 11, has chosen as her numbers two very unusual works, both of them French. The first will be a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens. This was written by the great Frenchman for one of those outdoor musical festivals which are held from time to time in the great Roman theatres in the south of France. Madame Jomelli's second number will be Azael's recitative and air from Claude Debussy's "l'Enfant Prodigue." It was with this work that Debussy won the Prix de Rome.

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

Date

With Geraldine Farrar as soloist next Thursday evening, and Nellie Melba next Saturday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season at Carnegie Hall under Max Fiedler, who has returned for his third year as conductor of this admirable organization. There is a new concert-master, Anton Witek, whom Berliners had the privilege of hearing as concert-master of their Philharmonic Orchestra for sixteen years. Miss Farrar will sing an old French operatic air by Isouard, and an unknown Mozart aria, arranged for concert use by Dr. Muck. The orchestral numbers on Thursday are to be: Rachmaninoff, second symphony; Bach's third Brandenburg concerto (with a real harpsichord), and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Nellie Melba will sing the "Dove sono" aria from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and for her second number the Mad Scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet." The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms's F major symphony No. 3, Gustav Strube's Comedy overture, "Puck," and Sibelius's tone poem, "Finlandia." Gustav Strube is one of the first violins of the orchestra. His last work heard here was his violin concerto, played five years ago by Timothee Adamowski. This new overture has been received with great favor in Boston.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

The first Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday next, presents Rachmaninoff's symphony No. 2, Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3 and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont."

The alternate numbers are airs from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin" and Mozart's "Misero, O Segno, O Son Desto," sung by the most popular prima donna in opera to-day, Geraldine Farrar.

Nelly Melba returns for one day only to sing "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Figaro" and the mad scene from Thomas's "Hamlet" at the Boston Orchestra's Saturday matinée.

The string pieces then are Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Brahms's symphony No. 3, Gustav Strube's new comedy overture, "Puck," and Sibelius's "Finlandia."

[57]

The
Brooklyn Citizen
TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES
THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS
BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.
YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR
THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN
W. OESTREICHER

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS ITS THIRTIETH SEASON

Famous Orchestra Comes Here for Twenty-second Year.

ITS INTERESTING HISTORY.

Long Acknowledged the Peer of Any Similar Organization in the World.

The musical writers in Boston during the past month have been devoting considerable space in commemoration of the fact that the season of 1910-1911 will be the thirtieth of Boston's great orchestra. This will be the twentieth consecutive season in which it has given concerts in Brooklyn and twenty-second season in which it has visited this city, and in the twenty-one seasons that have passed it has given here 117 concerts.

As is generally known, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was organized in the fall of 1881 by Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, whose purpose was to provide that city with a competent band, which up to that time it had not possessed. In the first year the orchestra gave twenty pairs of concerts in Boston—that is to say, twenty public rehearsals and twenty concerts, respectively, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The men of the orchestra were engaged for four days a week, this time being deemed sufficient to cover the rehearsals and performances, for in those days the public rehearsals were rehearsals in fact as well as in name and it was not at all unusual for the conductor to stop the orchestra in the midst of a work and begin over again. The next year, however, a change was made. The orchestra was hired by the week and the rule then put in force which has been one of the secrets of the orchestra's success, that the members must give their time exclusively to it.

In 1882-83 a few concerts were given outside of Boston, the first out-of-town concert being in Newport, and in the next season a few more concerts were given outside of Boston. In the second year the number of public rehearsals and concerts was increased to twenty-four, and in the third year to twenty-six, but in 1884-85, with the coming of Mr. Gericke from Vienna, the number of rehearsals and concerts in Boston was set at twenty-four each, which number has held good since that time.

In the five years that Mr. Gericke served with the orchestra its number was gradually increased from sixty-five to eighty, and the invasion of the South and West began. In the spring of 1886 concerts were given in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and cities as far west as St. Louis. In the spring of 1887 three concerts were given in New York and in the following year the first concert, on Dec. 12, 1887, was given in the old Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Brooklyn was next visited on April 1, 1899, when the orchestra was on its way to the South and West and it was not until the fall of 1891 that it began to come regularly to this city. In that year it succeeded the Thomas Orchestra in giving the philharmonic concerts, and in 1891-92, 1892-93, 1893-94 and 1894-95 it gave ten concerts each season, in pairs usually, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. In the season of 1895-96 but five concerts were given, but in 1896-97 eight concerts were the allotment, one in November, one in December and three pairs, respectively, in January, February and March. Ten concerts also were given in 1897-98 and 1898-99, but in 1899-1900 the number was reduced to five on Friday evenings, which has held good since. Until the burning of the old Academy of Music in the season of 1903-04 all the concerts were given there and in the years intervening between then and the opening of the new Academy of Music the concerts were given in the Baptist Temple.

When Mr. Gericke came to Boston from Vienna in the fall of 1884 he quickly made up his mind that radical changes were necessary in the personnel if results worthy of the cause were to be obtained and in the following year he brought over from Vienna a number of young men to strengthen the string choirs. Among these were the members of the original Kneisel Quartet, Mr. Franz Kneisel, Mr. Svecenski, Emanuel Fiedler and Mr. Giese. The formation of the [illegible] followed in the next [illegible] years of the [illegible] Higginson

In the [illegible] supremacy with any orchestra in Europe. The policy of improving the personnel was followed with persistent care, no expense being spared to get the right men for the right places. The result was that when Arthur Nikisch, known then merely as a young and talented conductor, came to Boston in the fall of 1889 from Leipsic, he found a remarkable instrument with which to work and when he left four years later his fame as one of the great conductors of the world was secure while the Boston Symphony Orchestra was undisputed leader in the world of music.

It is a bit of interesting history that Hans Richter was engaged as successor to Nikisch. At the last moment, although the contract was signed, sealed and delivered, the great Austrian conductor defaulted, pleading his fear of crossing the Atlantic, but he recommended highly as a man to take his place young Karl Muck of Berlin, who was then in his third year as conductor of the Royal Opera in that city. Dr. Muck still possesses the letter Richter wrote him at that time, urging him most strongly to leave Germany and go to Boston. But Dr. Muck doubted the wisdom of such a move and refused the appointment without qualification, so that in the eleventh hour, Mr. Higginson, having hurried to Germany in the middle of the summer, Emil Paur, who has succeeded Nikisch in the Opera House in Leipsic, was engaged for a term of five years.

When this term was ended Mr. Gericke returned and was at the head of the orchestra for the succeeding eight years. It was during this time that Henry Wood, the celebrated English conductor, called the Boston Symphony Orchestra "the most wonderful music box in the world." It is ony fair to say that never in its history were the tonal qualities of the orchestra so absolutely perfect as they were during these last years under Mr. Gericke. Although to get such a perfection of tone, other qualities had to be sacrificed, yet when the final history of the orchestra is written, the name of Gericke will loom large on its pages, for he is the man who delivered a perfect instrument, first to Nikisch and then to Muck.

Mr. Gericke was followed for two years by Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who was obtained by a petition sent direct to the German Emperor to give him a leave of absence for that time, and when at the end of his second season Emperor William refused to allow him to stay away from Berlin any longer, Mr. Fiedler, of Hamburg, the present conductor, was engaged. Mr. Fiedler has now been at the head of the orchestra for two years and his contract runs for this season and next.

When its thirtieth year is finished the orchestra will have given a total of 2,846 concerts which is an average of nearly 100 concerts a year. When it is considered that the orchestra's season runs but seven months and that the time is devoted solely to serious symphony concerts, this is a record which can hardly be equaled the world over. In that time over 900 different titles or orchestral works have appeared on its programmes. This year it gives a total of 117 concerts, which is the largest number in its history.

The
Brooklyn Citizen
TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES
THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS
BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.
YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR
THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN
W. OESTREICHER

The opening general sale of season tickets for the five Boston Symphony concerts to be given during the coming winter in the Academy of Music, will be on next Friday, Oct. 28, at 4 p. m., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue thereafter at the hours when the ticket offices of the Institute are open. The dates of the concerts, as already announced, are Friday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24.

At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, the distinguished dramatic soprano, who will sing as her first number Saint-Saens' hymn to Pallas Athene, which will be heard in this country for the first time, and for her second number Mendelssohn's now seldom-heard but beautiful aria, "Infelice."

The soloist at the second concert, in December, will be Josef Hofman, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. This will be an unusual treat for lovers of the piano. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the third concert, in January. As he has not yet reached this country he has not signified what he will play. Ferruccio Busoni, who, with Hofmann, will divide this season the pianistic honors in the United States, will be the soloist at the fourth concert, and for the last concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist.

Those who have heard the orchestra this year at its Boston concerts are unanimous in the opinion that never has it sounded more beautiful than it does now. The recent changes that have been made in the personnel have been [illegible] for the better and the one [illegible]

The
Brooklyn Citizen
TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES
THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS
BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.
YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR
THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN
W. OESTREICHER

The October meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at the Academy of Music recently. Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided, and Mrs. Charles F. Pray, in the absence of Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, acted as secretary. Mrs. Dike presented the following report:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its twenty-fourth year in Brooklyn on Nov. 11, the first concert in Brooklyn having been given by this orchestra on Dec. 12, 1887, during the first period of Mr. Gericke's services as conductor. The orchestra has been increased from 98 to 104 musicians, the largest number in its history, and will give altogether during the present season 117 concerts.

Anton Witek, heretofore concert meister of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, takes the place of Prof. Willy Hess, who has served as concert meister since the withdrawal of Franz Kneisel. Alwin Schroeder, who has been so much enjoyed as 'cellist, both in the orchestra and in the Kneisel String Quartet in years gone by, returns to the orchestra as first cellist this year. The soloists engaged are, for the November concert, Mme. Jomelli, and for the succeeding concerts, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Busoni and Alwin Schroeder. The programme for the opening concert is: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115 (Schumann); Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90 (Brahms); Hymn to Pallas Athene (Saint-Saens); tone poem "Don Juan," after N. Lenau, Op. 20 (Strauss); Azael's recitative, "These Joyous Airs" and aria, "O Time That Is No More," from the lyric scene in "The Prodigal Son" (Debussy); "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7 (Sibelius).

"The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society (John E. Leech, president) has arranged to have floral decorations and plants at the front of the stage, and has also arranged with the Institute to have lecture recitals on the programmes given on Thursday afternoons just preceding the concerts. These lecture recitals will be given by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred de Voto at the piano; Daniel Gregory Mason, Howard Brockway and Miss Mary Hallock. Tickets to these lecture recitals are issued to all the subscribers to the Philharmonic concerts."

Among those present, beside the officers, were the following: Mrs. Dwight P. Clapp, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. William S. Packer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. J. H. Recknagel, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. J. Elliott Langstaff, Mrs. George W. Wingate, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Miss Sallie A. Ingalls, Mrs. Merwin Rushmore and Mrs. William Tuttle.

About twenty new members of the Auxiliary Board were elected, and Mrs. Charles F. Pray was elected chairman of the Executive Committee in place of Mrs. Thomas Prosser, resigned.

The
Brooklyn Citizen
TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES
THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS
BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.
YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR
THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN
W. OESTREICHER

Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who is to be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Nov. 11, has chosen as her numbers two very unusual works, both of them French, one of them representative of the older classical school, and the other representative of the greatest of modern Frenchmen in a period of his career that was more closely allied to the classics than to the innovations which have since characterized his works. The first will be a Hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens. This was written by the great Frenchman for one of those out-door musical festivals which are held from time to time in the great Roman Theatres in the south of France. It was sung for the first time in Orange in 1895. Madame Jomelli's second number will be Azael's recitative and air from Claude Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." It was with this work that Debussy won the Prix de Rome. It is a cantata and this air was written originally for tenor, but it has been transposed for soprano. It is rather interesting that the Boston [illegible]

The
Brooklyn Citizen
Telephone, 2924 Main
Connecting All Branches
The Great Home Paper
Daily, One Cent Sunday, Three Cents
Borough of Brooklyn
New York City

Dear Sir:
I take pleasure in enclosing you a clipping of Theatrical Notice which appeared in recent issue of The Brooklyn Citizen.
Yours very truly,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
Dramatic Editor
The Brooklyn Citizen
W. OESTREICHER

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is set for next Friday evening, Nov. 11, in the Academy of Music. The sploist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won notable favor in Brooklyn by her fine voice and her finished art. Madame Jomelli has forsworn the conventional works of the concert hall and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the vast majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saeus. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the outdoor festivals which are held from time to time in the old Roman theatres in the south of France.

Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Debussy wrote the lyric scene of "The Prodigal Son" in 1884, and with it won the Grand Prix de Rome. The text is by Edouard Guinand and Debussy's setting was sung by Madame Rosa Caron, Ernest Van Dyck and Taskin, and Debussy received twenty-two votes out of the twenty-eight.

The principal orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms' F-Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

The
Brooklyn Citizen
Telephone, 2924 Main
Connecting All Branches
The Great Home Paper
Daily, One Cent Sunday, Three Cents
Borough of Brooklyn
New York City

Dear Sir:
I take pleasure in enclosing you a clipping of Theatrical Notice which appeared in recent issue of The Brooklyn Citizen.
Yours very truly,
W. OESTREICHER
Dramatic Editor
The Brooklyn Citizen

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto at the piano, will give the explanatory lecture recital on the programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening. This will be the first in a series, one of which is to precede each concert of the five which the orchestra will have here this season, concerts and lecture recitals being, as usual, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. Messrs. Elson and De Voto have been heard in explanatory studies on the concerts in previous seasons. This lecture recital is set for the lecture hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday at 4 p. m.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau (Incorporated)
STANDARD UNION,
From BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 1 1910
Estab.

Josef Hofmann will be heard in piano recital on Thursday evening next in the Opera House, Academy of Music, when he will appear under direction of the Brooklyn Institute. For the past two seasons he has been giving concerts in Russia. He opened his American tour yesterday afternoon in recital in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, though for a few months to come most of his playing will be in connection with orchestral concerts, for he is to appear fourteen times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (here on Dec. 9) and at least once each with the New York Philharmonic and the New York, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Minneapolis, Los Angeles, San Diego and Toronto Symphony orchestras. For Thursday night next he has arranged a charming programme, eclectic enough to suit [illegible] tastes, for it includes the [illegible] E minor Sonata and [illegible] tremendous transcription [illegible] march from the "Ruins of [illegible] the Chopin A flat [illegible] Liszt's dreamy "Legende [illegible] major Polonaise.

The
Brooklyn Citizen
TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES
THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS
BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.
YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR
BROOKLYN CITIZEN
W. OESTREICHER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS ITS THIRTIETH SEASON

Famous Orchestra Comes Here for Twenty-second Year.

ITS INTERESTING HISTORY.

Long Acknowledged the Peer of Any Similar Organization in the World.

The musical writers in Boston during the past month have been devoting considerable space in commemoration of the fact that the season of 1910-1911 will be the thirtieth of Boston's great orchestra. This will be the twentieth consecutive season in which it has given concerts in Brooklyn and twenty-second season in which it has visited this city, and in the twenty-one seasons that have passed it has given here 117 concerts.

As is generally known, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was organized in the fall of 1881 by Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, whose purpose was to provide that city with a competent band, which up to that time it had not possessed. In the first year the orchestra gave twenty pairs of concerts in Boston—that is to say, twenty public rehearsals and twenty concerts, respectively, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The men of the orchestra were engaged for four days a week, this time being deemed sufficient to cover the rehearsals and performances, for in those days the public rehearsals were rehearsals in fact as well as in name, and it was not at all unusual for the conductor to stop the orchestra in the midst of a work and begin over again. The next year, however, a change was made. The orchestra was hired by the week and the rule then put in force which has been one of the secrets of the orchestra's success, that the members must give their time exclusively to it.

In 1882-83 a few concerts were given outside of Boston, the first out-of-town concert being in Newport, and in the next season a few more concerts were given outside of Boston. In the second year the number of public rehearsals and concerts was increased to twenty-four, and in the third year to twenty-six, but in 1884-85, with the coming of Mr. Gericke from Vienna, the number of rehearsals and concerts in Boston was set at twenty-four each, which number has held good since that time.

In the five years that Mr. Gericke served with the orchestra its number was gradually increased from sixty-five to eighty, and the invasion of the South and West began. In the spring of 1886 concerts were given in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and cities as far west as St. Louis. In the spring of 1887 three concerts were given in New York and in the following year the first concert, on Dec. 12, 1887, was given in the old Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Brooklyn was next visited on April 1, 1899, when the orchestra was on its way to the South and West and it was not until the fall of 1891 that it began to come regularly to this city. In that year it succeeded the Thomas Orchestra in giving the philharmonic concerts, and in 1891-92, 1892-93, 1893-94 and 1894-95 it gave ten concerts each season, in pairs usually, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. In the season of 1895-96 but five concerts were given, but in 1896-97 eight concerts were the allotment, one in November, one in December and three pairs, respectively, in January, February and March. Ten concerts also were given in 1897-98 and 1898-99, but in 1899-1900 the number was reduced to five on Friday evenings, which has held good since. Until the burning of the old Academy of Music in the season of 1903-04 all the concerts were given there and in the years intervening between then and the opening of the new Academy of Music the concerts were given in the Baptist Temple.

When Mr. Gericke came to Boston from Vienna in the fall of 1884 he quickly made up his mind that radical changes were necessary in the personnel if results worthy of the cause were to be obtained and in the following year he brought over from Vienna a number of young men to strengthen the string choirs. Among these were the members of the original Kneisel Quartet, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Svecenski, Emanuel Fiedler and Fritz Giese. The formation of the Kneisel Quartet followed in the next season and during the years of its struggle to gain a permanent footing, it, like the orchestra, was supported by the generosity of Mr. Higginson.

In the five years Mr. [illegible] conductor of the orchestra, it attained a high degree of efficiency, took its place as the leading organization of its kind in this country, and was able to dispute supremacy with any orchestra in Europe. The policy of improving the personnel was followed with persistent care, no expense being spared to get the right men for the right places. The result was that when Arthur Nikisch, known then merely as a young and talented conductor, came to Boston in the fall of 1889 from Leipsic, he found a remarkable instrument with which to work and when he left four years later his fame as one of the great conductors of the world was secure while the Boston Symphony Orchestra was undisputed leader in the world of music.

It is a bit of interesting history that Hans Richter was engaged as successor to Nikisch. At the last moment, although the contract was signed, sealed and delivered, the great Austrian conductor defaulted, pleading his fear of crossing the Atlantic, but he recommended highly as a man to take his place young Karl Muck of Berlin, who was then in his third year as conductor of the Royal Opera in that city. Dr. Muck still possesses the letter Richter wrote him at that time, urging him most strongly to leave Germany and go to Boston. But Dr. Muck doubted the wisdom of such a move and refused the appointment without qualification, so that in the eleventh hour, Mr. Higginson, having hurried to Germany in the middle of the summer, Emil Paur, who has succeeded Nikisch in the Opera House in Leipsic, was engaged for a term of five years.

When this term was ended Mr. Gericke returned and was at the head of the orchestra for the succeeding eight years. It was during this time that Henry Wood, the celebrated English conductor, called the Boston Symphony Orchestra "the most wonderful music box in the world." It is ony fair to say that never in its history were the tonal qualities of the orchestra so absolutely perfect as they were during these last years under Mr. Gericke. Although to get such a perfection of tone, other qualities had to be sacrificed, yet when the final history of the orchestra is written, the name of Gericke will loom large on its pages, for he is the man who delivered a perfect instrument, first to Nikisch and then to Muck.

Mr. Gericke was followed for two years by Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who was obtained by a petition sent direct to the German Emperor to give him a leave of absence for that time, and when at the end of his second season Emperor William refused to allow him to stay away from Berlin any longer, Mr. Fiedler, of Hamburg, the present conductor, was engaged. Mr. Fiedler has now been at the head of the orchestra for two years and his contract runs for this season and next.

When its thirtieth year is finished the orchestra will have given a total of 2,846 concerts which is an average of nearly 100 concerts a year. When it is considered that the orchestra's season runs but seven months and that the time is devoted solely to serious symphony concerts, this is a record which can hardly be equaled the world over. In that time over 900 different titles or orchestral works have appeared on its programmes. This year it gives a total of 117 concerts, which is the largest number in its history.

The
Brooklyn Citizen
TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES
THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS
BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.
YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR
THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN
W. OESTREICHER.

The opening general sale of season tickets for the five Boston Symphony concerts to be given during the coming winter in the Academy of Music, will be on next Friday, Oct. 28, at 4 p. m., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, and the sale will continue thereafter at the hours when the ticket offices of the Institute are open. The dates of the concerts, as already announced, are Friday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24.

At the first concert the soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, the distinguished dramatic soprano, who will sing as her first number Saint-Saens' hymn to Pallas Athene, which will be heard in this country for the first time, and for her second number Mendelssohn's now seldom-heard but beautiful aria, "Infelice."

The soloist at the second concert, in December, will be Josef Hofman, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. This will be an unusual treat for lovers of the piano. Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the third concert, in January. As he has not yet reached this country he has not signified what he will play. Ferruccio Busoni, who, with Hofmann, will divide this season the pianistic honors in the United States, will be the soloist at the fourth concert, and for the last concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist.

Those who have heard the orchestra this year at its Boston concerts are unanimous in the opinion that never has it sounded more beautiful than it does now. The slight changes that have been made in it seem to have been entirely for the better and the one or two weak spots which the critical ear could have heard last year have been eliminated. Mr. Fiedler has not yet decided on the orchestral numbers he will present at the November [illegible]

The
Brooklyn Citizen
TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES
THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS
BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.
YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR
THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN
W. OESTREICHER.

The October meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at the Academy of Music recently. Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided, and Mrs. Charles F. Pray, in the absence of Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, acted as secretary. Mrs. Dike presented the following report:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its twenty-fourth year in Brooklyn on Nov. 11, the first concert in Brooklyn having been given by this orchestra on Dec. 12, 1887, during the first period of Mr. Gericke's services as conductor. The orchestra has been increased from 98 to 104 musicians, the largest number in its history, and will give altogether during the present season 117 concerts.

Anton Witek, heretofore concert meister of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, takes the place of Prof. Willy Hess, who has served as concert meister since the withdrawal of Franz Kneisel. Alwin Schroeder, who has been so much enjoyed as 'cellist, both in the orchestra and in the Kneisel String Quartet in years gone by, returns to the orchestra as first cellist this year. The soloists engaged are, for the November concert, Mme. Jomelli, and for the succeeding concerts, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Busoni and Alwin Schroeder. The programme for the opening concert is: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115 (Schumann); Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90 (Brahms); Hymn to Pallas Athene (Saint-Saens); tone poem "Don Juan," after N. Lenau, Op. 20 (Strauss); Azael's recitative, "These Joyous Airs" and aria, "O Time That Is No More," from the lyric scene in "The Prodigal Son" (Debussy); "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7 (Sibelius).

"The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society (John E. Leech, president) has arranged to have floral decorations and plants at the front of the stage, and has also arranged with the Institute to have lecture recitals on the programmes given on Thursday afternoons just preceding the concerts. These lecture recitals will be given by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred de Voto at the piano; Daniel Gregory Mason, Howard Brockway and Miss Mary Hallock. Tickets to these lecture recitals are issued to all the subscribers to the Philharmonic concerts."

Among those present, beside the officers, were the following: Mrs. Dwight P. Clapp, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. William S. Packer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. J. H. Recknagel, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. J. Elliott Langstaff, Mrs. George W. Wingate, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Miss Sallie A. Ingalls, Mrs. Merwin Rushmore and Mrs. William Tuttle.

About twenty new members of the Auxiliary Board were elected, and Mrs. Charles F. Pray was elected chairman of the Executive Committee in place of Mrs. Thomas Prosser, resigned.

The
Brooklyn Citizen
TELEPHONE, 2924 MAIN
CONNECTING ALL BRANCHES
THE GREAT HOME PAPER
DAILY 1 CENT SUNDAY 3 CENTS
BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN
NEW YORK CITY

DEAR SIR:
I TAKE PLEASURE IN ENCLOSING YOU A CLIPPING OF THEATRICAL NOTICE WHICH APPEARED IN RECENT ISSUE OF THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN.
YOURS VERY TRULY,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
DRAMATIC EDITOR
THE BROOKLYN CITIZEN
W. OESTREICHER.

Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who is to be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Nov. 11, has chosen as her numbers two very unusual works, both of them French, one of them representative of the older classical school, and the other representative of the greatest of modern Frenchmen in a period of his career that was more closely allied to the classics than to the innovations which have since characterized his works. The first will be a Hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens. This was written by the great Frenchman for one of those out-door musical festivals which are held from time to time in the great Roman Theatres in the south of France. It was sang for the first time in Orange in 1895. Madame Jomelli's second number will be Azael's recitative and air from Claude Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodique." It was with this work that Debussy won the Prix de Rome. It is a cantata and this air was written originally for tenor, but it has been transposed for soprano. It is rather interesting that the Boston opera purposes to give this little work in dramatic form during the coming season.

The
Brooklyn Citizen
Telephone, 2924 Main
Connecting All Branches
The Great Home Paper
Daily, One Cent Sunday, Three Cents
Borough of Brooklyn
New York City

Dear Sir:
I take pleasure in enclosing you a clipping of Theatrical Notice which appeared in recent issue of The Brooklyn Citizen.
Yours very truly,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
Dramatic Editor
The Brooklyn Citizen
W. OESTREICHER.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is set for next Friday evening, Nov. 11, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won notable favor in Brooklyn by her fine voice and her finished art. Madame Jomelli has forsworn the conventional works of the concert hall and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the vast majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saeus. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the outdoor festivals which are held from time to time in the old Roman theatres in the south of France.

Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Debussy wrote the lyric scene of "The Prodigal Son" in 1884, and with it won the Grand Prix de Rome. The text is by Edouard Guinand and Debussy's setting was sung by Madame Rosa Caron, Ernest Van Dyck and Taskin, and Debussy received twenty-two votes out of the twenty-eight.

The principal orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms' F-Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

The
Brooklyn Citizen
Telephone, 2924 Main
Connecting All Branches
The Great Home Paper
Daily, One Cent Sunday, Three Cents
Borough of Brooklyn
New York City

Dear Sir:
I take pleasure in enclosing you a clipping of Theatrical Notice which appeared in recent issue of The Brooklyn Citizen.
Yours very truly,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
Dramatic Editor
The Brooklyn Citizen
W. OESTREICHER.

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto at the piano, will give the explanatory lecture recital on the programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening. This will be the first in a series, one of which is to precede each concert of the five which the orchestra will have here this season, concerts and lecture recitals being, as usual, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. Messrs. Elson and De Voto have been heard in explanatory studies on the concerts in previous seasons. This lecture recital is set for the lecture hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday at 4 p. m.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
STANDARD UNION,
From BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 1 1910

Josef Hofmann will be heard in piano recital on Thursday evening next in the Opera House, Academy of Music, when he will appear under direction of the Brooklyn Institute. For the past two seasons he has been giving concerts in Russia. He opened his American tour yesterday afternoon in recital in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, though for a few months to come most of his playing will be in connection with orchestral concerts, for he is to appear fourteen times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (here on Dec. 9) and at least once each with the New York Philharmonic and the New York, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Minneapolis, Los Angeles, San Diego and Toronto Symphony orchestras. For Thursday night next he has arranged a charming programme, eclectic enough to suit varied musical tastes, for it includes the Beethoven E minor Sonata and Rubinstein's tremendous transcription of the march from the "Ruins of Athens," the Chopin A flat major Valse, Liszt's dreamy "Legende" and his E major Polonaise.

Estab

[58]

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

Boston Symphony

Opening Concerts Here Thursday and Saturday.

The musical season has well begun by the time the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to New York to give its first pair of concerts. This year these first concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, November 10, and Saturday afternoon, November 12, with brilliant programmes announced for both of them. At the first concert the soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar and at the matinee concert on Saturday afternoon Mme. Melba will make her only concert appearance here of the season.

With the exception of the presence of Anton Witek at the head of the first violins, instead of Mr. Hess, the personnel of the orchestra shows few changes, and these few are chiefly in the way of additions. One or two men in the strings, one or two men in the wind choirs and a new tympanist comprise the total. Mr. Fiedler returns as conductor, this being his third year in this important post. Incidentally the orchestra seems to be more firmly established in New York than ever, for its management reports that the subscription for the ten concerts is quite the largest on record and proportionately is exceeded only by that which the orchestra has in Boston.

At the first concert, on Thursday night, the symphony will be Rachmaninoff's in E minor, No. 2, which will be a novelty to the vast majority of Boston Symphony patrons here, although it was played last year at one of the concerts of the Russian Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler placed it on his second programme in Boston, and it had such an unusual success that he repeated it at the fifth concert. It was written in Dresden and had its first performance in Moscow, and a year ago this month it was performed for the first time in Berlin by Nikisch, and for the first time in America in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The other orchestral numbers will be Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, in which Mr. Fiedler will make use of a harpsichord for the continuo, an instrument which worked most successfully in Boston, and Beethoven's overture "Egmont."

Miss Farrar will lend additional novelty to the concert by singing two arias, which are so old and forgotten that they are really new. The first one is a charming air from an opera comique by Nicolò Isouard, entitled "Jeannot et Colin," which was produced in Paris in 1814. The second is a very effective concert aria by Mozart, written originally for tenor voice, which to the best of Koechel's belief was sung for the first time in Vienna in December, 1783. This has been arranged for Miss Farrar's use by Dr. Muck.

On Saturday afternoon Mme. Melba will sing two numbers. The first will be the familiar "Dove Sono" aria from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the second the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," which Melba has not sung here for many years. Although she is to appear here four times in opera, this will be her only appearance in New York in concert.

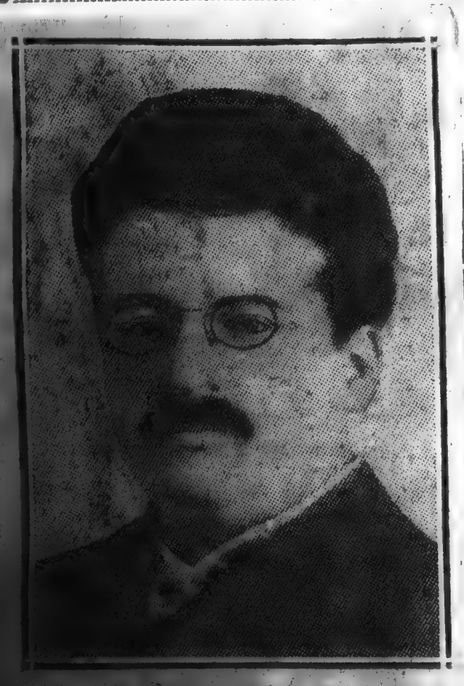
On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms's third symphony in F major, Gustav Strube's "Puck" overture and Sibelius's tone poem "Finlandia." Gustav Strube is one of those whose remarkable talents, like those of Charles Martin Loeffler, developed while sitting among the first violins of the orchestra. This little overture is brilliant and has met with great success in Boston.

EVENING SUN,

From

Address New York City.

Date



ANTON WITEK.
The Boston Symphony Orchestra's New Concert Master.

From

Address New York City.

Date OCT. 29 1910

The musical writers in Boston during the past month have been devoting considerable space in commemoration of the fact that the season of 1910-1911 will be the thirtieth of Boston's great orchestra, and it is certain that the many patrons and admirers of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn, will be interested in the recital of some of the things the orchestra has done in that time. This will be the twentieth consecutive season in which it has given concerts in Brooklyn and twenty-second season in which it has visited this city, and in the twenty-one seasons that have passed it has given here one hundred and seventeen concerts.

As is generally known the orchestra was organized in the fall of 1881, by Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, whose purpose was to provide that city with a competent band, which up to that time it had not possessed. It is doubtful that even Mr. Higginson realized at the time what a tremendous part the orchestra was to play in the musical development of this country for generally speaking it may be considered the most potent factor that music has had to work in its favor. Not only has it played in the past twenty-nine years to a large and widespread public, but its success has been the direct impulse in the formation of all the other orchestras in this country save the Philharmonic Society and the Symphony Society of New York. In the beginning it had sixty-five men drawn from the local forces and its conductor was George Henchel, who laid a firm foundation for the greater work which was to follow under the direction of his successors.

After Mr. Henchel came Mr. Gericke, from 1884 to 1889, and this meant much for the future of the orchestra. He was followed by Mr. Nikisch. Emil Paur succeeded Nikisch, and when his term ended Mr. Gericke returned and was at the head of the orchestra for the next eight years. It was during this time that Henry Wood, the celebrated English conductor, called the Boston Symphony Orchestra "the most wonderful music box in the world." It is only fair to say that never in its history were the tonal qualities of the orchestra so absolutely perfect as they were during these last years under Mr. Gericke. Although to get such a perfection of tone other qualities had to be sacrificed, but when the final history of the orchestra is written the name of Gericke will loom large on its pages, for he is the man who delivered a perfect instrument first to Nikisch and then to Muck.

Mr. Gericke was followed for two years by Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who was obtained by a petition sent direct to the German Emperor to give him a leave of absence for that time and when at the end of his second season Emperor William refused to allow him to stay away from Berlin any longer, Mr. Fielder, of Hamburg, the present conductor, was engaged. Mr. Fielder has now been at the head of the orchestra for two years, and his contract runs for this season and next.

When its thirtieth year is finished the orchestra will have given a total of two thousand eight hundred and forty-six concerts, which is an average of nearly one hundred concerts a year, and when it is considered that the orchestra's season runs but seven months, and that the time is devoted solely to serious symphony concerts, this is a record which can hardly be equaled the world over. In that ime over nine hundred different titles or orchestral works have appeared on its programmes. This year it gives a total of one hundred and seventeen concerts, which is the largest number in its history.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date

***

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is set for next Friday evening, Nov. 11, in the Academy of Music. The solist will be Mme. Jeanne Jomelli. Mme. Jomelli has foresworn the conventional works of the concert hall, and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the vast majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a Hymn to Pallas Athene, by Saint-Saëns. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the outdoor festivals which are held from time to time in the old Roman theatres in the south of France. This particular festival was held in the theatre at Orange. Her second number will be Azael's air from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." The orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms's F Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius's symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date OCT 30 1910

Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, who has been singing under the management of the Quinlan Agency, in England, will be heard here in the Boston Orchestra concert next week, and again in Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of November 15.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date

The first Boston Symphony concert in Washington this season is scheduled for the New National Tuesday afternoon, November 8, with Miss Margaret Keyes as the soloist. The following afternoon at the Columbia the first concert of the Radcliffe series will take place with the Bostonia Sextette Club as the booking. On Friday afternoon, November 11, Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who is a Washington favorite, is announced for a recital at the New National Theatre.

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date OCT 30 1910

Max Fiedler has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday evening, November 10, Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, and he will use a genuine harpsichord for the continuo. He tried this in Boston last week with much success and found that it was infinitely better than a piano and quite loud enough for the purpose even in a large hall against fifty-eight strings. On Saturday afternoon he purposes playing Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck." Mr. Strube, as is generally known, is a member of the orchestra and is unusually gifted as a composer. This overture is the last of his large works and was played first by the orchestra last spring and has just been published by Schirmer. Mr. Fiedler thinks so well of it that he plays it at all the concerts of the November trip of the orchestra.

[59]

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date NOV - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Max Fiedler will make its first appearances of the season in New York in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, November 10, and Saturday afternoon, November 12. A few changes have been made in its personnel. Mr. Anton Witek is the new concert-master.

The Management has engaged as soloist for its concert on Thursday evening Miss Geraldine Farrar, and for its concert on Saturday afternoon Madame Melba, whose only appearance in New York on the concert stage during this year this will be.

Mr. Fiedler's programme for Thursday evening begins with the Second Symphony of Rachmaninoff. This has been heard but once in New York, having been performed a year ago by the Russian Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler placed it on his second programme in Boston and repeated it again on his fifth programme. The work was composed in Dresden and was played at a concert of the Imperial Russian Music Society at Moscow in the course of the season of 1908-09, under the direction of the composer. In November a year ago Nikisch played it with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, and the first performance in this country was in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia Orchestra on November 26 of last year.

The other orchestral numbers will be Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, in which Mr. Fiedler will make use of a harpsichord; and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Miss Farrar has found two arias which, although they belong to the eighteenth century, are quite unknown to the majority of music lovers The first is a charming tune from "Jeannot et Colin," an opera comique by Nicolus Isouard, which was produced in Paris in 1814. The other is an aria by Mozart, consisting of a recitative, andante, and allegro, the first words of which are, "Misero! O segno, O son desto?" It was written originally for tenor and is believed to have been sung for the first time at a concert of the Pensionsgesellschaft in Vienna in 1783. Dr. Muck has arranged it for Miss Farrar.

On Saturday afternoon the Symphony will be Brahms's No. 3 in F-Major, which will be preceded by Schumann's overture "Manfred." The other orchestral numbers will be Gustav Strube's Comedy Overture "Puck" and Sibelius's tone poem "Finlandia." Mr. Strube is one of the first violins of the orchestra.

Madame Melba will sing two numbers. the first the aria, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the second the Mad Scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet."

ss

Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who is to be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Nov. 11, has chosen as her numbers two very unusual works, both of them French, one of them representative of the older classical school, and the other representative of the greatest of modern Frenchmen in a period of his career that was more closely allied to the classics than to the innovations which have since characterized his works. The first will be a Hymn to Pallas Athene, by Saint-Saens. This was written by the great Frenchman for one of those out-door musical festivals which are held from time to time in the great Roman Theatres in the south of France. It was sung for the first time in Orange in 1895. Madame Jomelli's second number will be Azael's recitative and air from Claude Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodique." It was with this work that Debussy won the Prix de Rome. It is a cantata and this air was written originally for tenor, but it has been transposed for soprano. It is rather interesting that the Boston opera purposes to give this little work in dramatic form during the coming season.

From Daily Eagle,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 29 1910

The musical writers in Boston during the past month have been devoting considerable space in commemoration of the fact that the season of 1910-1911 will be the thirtieth of Boston's great orchestra. This will be the twentieth consecutive season in which the orchestra has given concerts in Brooklyn, and twenty-second season in which it has visited this city, and in the twenty-one seasons that have passed it has given here 117 concerts.

Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who is to be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on November 11, has chosen as her numbers two very unusual works, both of them French, one of them representative of the older classical school and the other representative of the modern Frenchmen. The second number will be Azael's recitative and air from Claude Deburry's "L'Enfant Prodique."

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York City.

Date OCT 30 1910

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Die beiden einleitenden Konzerte des Philharmonischen Orchesters unter Leitung von Gustav Mahler finden in Carnegie Hall kommenden Dinstag Abend und Freitag Nachmittag statt. Herr Mahler hat hiefür das folgende interessante Programm zusammengestellt: Schubert's große C-Dur-Symphonie, Richard Strauß „Also sprach Zarathustra", eine noch näher zu bestimmende Mozart-Nummer (Ballett-Musik) und auf Verlangen von zahlreichen Seiten die von Mahler zusammengestellte Bach'sche Suite, die sich im Vorjahr eines so durchschlagenden Erfolgs zu erfreuen hatte.

Für das erste Abendkonzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Donnerstag, 10. November, hat Dirigent Herr Max Fiedler als Hauptnummer Bach's drittes Brandenburg'sches Konzert für Streicher mit Begleitung eines wirklichen Harpsichords gewählt. Am Samstag Nachmittag wird als Novität Gustav Strube's Lustspiel-Ouverture „Puck" aufgeführt werden, welche soben bei Schirmer im Druck erschienen ist. Herr Strube ist ein Mitglied des Bostoner Orchesters und hat sich als Komponist schon wiederholt hervorgethan.

Das nächste, kommenden Sonntag Nachmittag stattfindende Konzert der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft unter Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch bringt zwei Novitäten, „Brigg Fair" von Delius und den Saint-Saëns'schen Marsch „Orient und Occident". Die Symphonie ist Goldmark's „Ländliche Hochzeit". Soliftin: Frau Louise Homer.

From STANDARD UNIO

Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date OCT 31 1910

World of Music

The musical writers in Boston during the past month have been devoting considerable space in commemoration of the fact that the season of 1910-1911 will be the thirtieth of Boston's great orchestra. This will be the twentieth consecutive season in which it has given concerts in Brooklyn and twenty-second season in which it has visited this city, and in the twenty-one seasons that have passed it has given here one hundred and seventeen concerts. As is generally known, the orchestra was organized in the fall of 1881 by Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, whose purpose was to provide that city with a competent band, which, up to that time, it had not possessed. It is doubtful that even Mr. Higginson realized at that time what a tremendous part the orchestra was to play in the musical development of this country, for, generally speaking, it may be considered the most potent factor that music has had to work in its favor. In the spring of 1887 three concerts were given in New York and in the following year the first concert, on Dec. 12, 1887, was given in the old Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Brooklyn was next visited on April 1, 1889, when the orchestra was on its way to the South and West, and it was not until the fall of 1891 that it began to come regularly to this city. In that year it succeeded the Thomas Orchestra in giving the Philharmonic concerts, and in 1891-92, 1892-93, 1893-94 and 1894-95 it gave ten concerts each season, in pairs usually, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. In the season of 1895-96 but five concerts were given, but in 1896-97 eight concerts were the allotment, one in November, one in December and three pairs respectively in January, February and March. Ten concerts also were given in 1897-98 and 1898-99, but in 1899-1900 the number was reduced to five on Friday evenings, which has held good since. Until the burning of the old Academy of Music in the season of 1903-04 all the concerts were given there, and in the years intervening betwen them and the opening of the new Academy of Music the concerts were given in the Baptist Temple. Mr. Fiedler has been at the head of the orchestra for two years and his contract runs for this season and next. When its thirtieth year is finished the orchestra will have given a total of 2,846 concerts, which is an average of nearly one hundred concerts a year and when it is considered that the orchestra's season runs but seven months, and that the time is devoted solely to serious symphony concerts, this is a record which can hardly be equalled the world over. In that time over nine hundred different titles or orchestral works have appeared on its programmes. This year it gives a total of one hundred and seventeen concerts, which is the largest number in its history.

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date NOV 5 1910

The first concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Max Fiedler will be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. In the place of Willy Hess will be a new concert master, Anton Witek, who has held this post with the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra for sixteen years.

Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist on Thursday evening, when she will sing an air from Nicolus Isouard's opera comique, "Jeannot et Colin," produced in Paris in 1814. Her second will be quite an unknown aria by Mozart, for which Dr. Muck wrote the accompaniment for concert use. The programme for Thursday will also include the Second symphony by Rachmaninoff, the "Egmont" overture by Beethoven and, with Mr. Fiedler at the harpischord, the third Brandenburg concerto by Bach will be given.

Saturday afternoon Mme. Melba will sing an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and the mad scene from Thomas's "Hamlet." This will be her only concert appearance, although she will sing four times at the Metropolitan. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms's F major symphony No. 3, Gustav Strube's comedy overture, "Puck," and the tone poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

From Daily Times,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 5 1910

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season is set for next Friday evening in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won notable favor in Brooklyn by her extraordinary voice and her finished art. Mme. Jomelli has foresworn the conventional works of the concert hall, and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the vast majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a Hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the outdoor festivals which are held from time to time in the old Roman theatres in the south of France. This particular festival was held in the theatre at Orange. Saint-Saens, among his other activities, has always taken keenest interest in these festivals, and has written two or three works of large dimensions purposely for them. The Hymn to Pallas Athene is in his best style, and should prove a most effective concert piece. Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Debussy wrote the lyric scene of "The Prodigal Son" in 1884, and with it won the Grand Prix de Rome. The text is by Edouard Guiand, and Debussy's setting was sung by Mme. Rosa Caron, Ernest Van Dyck and Taskin, and Debussy received twenty-two votes out of the twenty-eight when the prize was awarded. The principal orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms F major Symphony, No. 3; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From WORLD

Address New York City

Date

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, will give its first New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, and a second programme Saturday afternoon. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Geraldine Farrar, and on Saturday afternoon Mme. Melba will make her only concert appearance in the city during the present season. The two programmes are as follows: On Thursday Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E minor; Isouard's Air from "Jeannot et Colin" (1814), Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for strings; Mozart's aria, "Misero! O segno, O son desto!"; and Bethoven's overture "Egmont." On Saturday, Schumann's overture "Manfred," Brahms's Symphony No. 3 in F major; Mozart's aria "Dove sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro;" Strube's comedy overture "Puck;" Thomas's Mad Scene from "Hamlet," and Sibelius's "Finlandia."

The Rachmaninoff symphony which will be played on Thursday evening is two years old and had its first performance in America in New York eight months ago, when it was played by the Russian Symphony Society. Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck" was composed last winter and had its first performance in Boston last spring. In it Strube is said to show further development of his creative talent.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

Daily Citizen,

From Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date NOV 2 1910

The October meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at the Academy of Music recently. Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided, and Mrs. Charles F. Pray, in the absence of Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, acted as secretary. Mrs. Dike presented the following report:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its twenty-fourth year in Brooklyn on Nov. 11, the first concert in Brooklyn having been given by this orchestra on Dec. 12, 1887, during the first period of Mr. Gericke's services as conductor. The orchestra has been increased from 98 to 104 musicians, the largest number in its history, and will give altogether during the present season 117 concerts.

Anton Witek, heretofore concert meister of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, takes the place of Prof. Willy Hess, who has served as concert meister since the withdrawal of Franz Kneisel. Alwin Schroeder, who has been so much enjoyed as 'cellist, both in the orchestra and in the Kneisel String Quartet in years gone by, returns to the orchestra as first cellist this year. The soloists engaged are, for the November concert, Mme. Jomelli, and for the succeeding concerts, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Busoni and Alwin Schroeder. The programme for the opening concert is: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115 (Schumann); Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90 (Brahms); Hymn to Pallas Athene (Saint-Saens); tone poem "Don Juan," after N. Lenau, Op. 20 (Strauss); Azael's recitative, "These Joyous Airs" and aria, "O Time That Is No More," from the lyric scene in "The Prodigal Son" (Debussy); "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7 (Sibelius).

"The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society (John E. Leech, president) has arranged to have floral decorations and plants at the front of the stage, and has also arranged with the Institute to have lecture recitals on the programmes given on Thursday afternoons just preceding the concerts. These lecture recitals will be given by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred de Voto at the piano; Daniel Gregory Mason, Howard Brockway and Miss Mary Hallock. Tickets to these lecture recitals are issued to all the subscribers to the Philharmonic concerts."

Among those present, beside the officers, were the following: Mrs. Dwight P. Clapp, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. William S. Packer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. J. H. Recknagel, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. J. Elliott Langstaff, Mrs. George W. Wingate, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Miss Sallie A. Ingalls, Mrs. Merwin Rushmore and Mrs. William Tuttle.

About twenty new members of the Auxiliary Board were elected, and Mrs. Charles F. Pray was elected chairman of the Executive Committee in place of Mrs. Thomas Prosser, resigned.

From EVE. TELEGRAM

Address New York City.

Date

Recitals and Concerts of Coming Week

CONCERTS and recitals for the coming week include the following:—

Sousa and his band and three soloists, first concert of around the world tour, Metropolitan Opera House, Sunday night.

Francis MacMillan, violin recital, Carnegie Hall, Sunday evening.

New York Symphony, Walter Damrosch conducting, New Theatre, Sunday and Friday afternoons, Mme. Louise Homer, soloist.

People's Symphony Concert, F.X. Arens conducting, Sunday afternoon, Carnegie Hall.

Song recital by Irene Armstrong Funk, with Mrs. E. N. Latham at the piano, Mendelssohn Hall, Wednesday afternoon

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducting, Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Piano recital by Josef Hofmann, Carnegie Hall, Friday afternoon.

Piano recital by Adolphe Borchard, Mendelssohn Hall, Friday evening.

Morton Adkins' song recital, Mendelssohn Hall, Monday afternoon.

Mme. Marcella Sembrich in recital of songs by Schubert, Schumann and Brahms, Tuesday afternoon, Carnegie Hall.

Beebe-Dethier, violin and piano sonata recital, Wednesday evening, Mendelssohn Hall.

Josef Hofmann's piano recital, Carnegie Hall, Friday afternoon.

Mrs. Dore Lyon's morning of opera and comedy, Berkeley Theatre, Friday morning at eleven o'clock.

From

Address

Date OCT 29 1910

On Nov. 10 comes the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second Symphony in E minor by Rachmaninoff will be played. Saturday afternoon Nov. 12 at the first matinee concert Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony will be played.

From STANDARD UNION,

Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date NOV 1 1910

The October meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at the Academy of Music last Friday. Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided, and Mrs. Charles F. Pray, in the absence of Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, acted as secretary. Mrs. Dike presented a report which set forth among other things that the orchestra opens its twenty-fourth year in Brooklyn on Nov. 11, the first concert in Brooklyn having been given by this orchestra on Dec. 12, 1887. Anton Witek, heretofore concert-meister of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, takes the place of Prof. Willy Hess. Alwin Schroeder returns to the orchestra as first 'cellist this year. The soloists engaged are, for the November concert, Mme. Jomelli, and for the succeeding concerts Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman, Busoni and Alwin Schroeder. Max Fiedler will remain conductor during this and next season. The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, John E. Leech, president, has arranged to have floral decorations and plants at the front of the stage, and has also arranged with the Institute to have lecture recitals on the programmes given on Thursday afternoons just preceding the concerts. These lecture recitals will be given by Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred de Voto at the piano; Daniel Gregory Mason, Howard Brockway and Miss Mary Hallock. Among those present, besides the officers, were the following: Mrs. Dwight P. Clapp, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. William S. Packer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. J. H. Recknagel, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. J. Elliott Langstaff, Mrs. George W. Wingate, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Miss Sallie A. Ingalls, Mrs. Merwin Rushmore and Mrs. William Tuttle. About twenty new members of the Auxiliary Board were elected, and Mrs. Charles F. Pray was elected chairman of the Executive Committee in place of Mrs. Thomas Prosser, resigned.

From EVE. NEWS.

Address Buffalo, N. Y.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of this orchestra offered last night Brahms' F major symphony, Strube's comedy overture, "Puck" and Beethoven's violin concerto played by Anton Witek, the new concertmeister. Strube cannot complain of the lack of appreciation by his associates; his compositions have been played by the Boston Symphony a number of times and have always received the praise due them. The greatest interest and enthusiasm was aroused in Boston over the performance of Rachmanioff's E minor symphony, which took place at the second concert. This work was first played here last year in Philadelphia under the direction of the composer, who was then on his initial visit to this country. It is described as a masterly production, replete with originality and beauty of thought, and written with all the power that characterizes this eminent composer. The performance lasted an hour but there were no complaints of impatience on the part of the hearers, at least not from those favored ones who are able to express their impatience in print afterwards.

From PRESS

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will give the first two concerts of its New York season on next Thursday evening, November 10, and Saturday afternoon, November 12, in Carnegie Hall. Thursday evening's soloist will be Geraldine Farrar, Saturday afternoon's Mme. Melba, who on this occasion will make her only concert appearance in New York this season. Here are the two programmes: Thursday—Rachmaninoff, Symphony No. 2 in E minor; Isouard, air from "Jeannot et Colin" (1814); Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, for strings; Mozart, aria, "Misero! O segno, O son desto?" Beethoven, overture, "Egmont." Saturday—Schumann, overture, "Manfred"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major; Mozart, aria, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro"; Strube, comedy overture, "Puck"; Thomas, Mad Scene from "Hamlet"; Sibelius, "Finlandia."

The Rachmaninoff Symphony is two years old and had its first performance in America a year ago in Philadelphia. In New York it was introduced by the Russian Symphony Society. Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck" was composed last winter and had its first performance in Boston last spring. In it Strube shows further development of his creative talent and obtains a firmer place in the ranks of composers who count themselves as Americans.

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York City.

Date OCT 29 1910

Max Fiedler has [illegible] evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday evening, Nov. 10, at Carnegie Hall. Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, and he will use in the performance a genuine harpsichord. On Saturday afternoon he purposes playing Gustav Strube's comedy overture, "Puck." Mr. Strube, as is generally known, is a member of the [illegible] and is unusually gifted as a composer.

From Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 5 1910

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is set for next Friday evening, Nov. 11, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won notable favor in Brooklyn by her fine voice and her finished art. Madame Jomelli has forsworn the conventional works of the concert hall and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the vast majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the outdoor festivals which are held from time to time in the old Roman theatres in the south of France.

Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Debussy wrote the lyric scene of "The Prodigal Son" in 1884, and with it won the Grand Prix de Rome. The text is by Edouard Guinand and Debussy's setting was sung by Madame Rosa Caron, Ernest Van Dyck and Taskin, and Debussy received twenty-two votes out of the twenty-eight.

The principal orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms' F-Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 5 1910

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is set for next Friday evening, November 11, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won favor in Brooklyn. Mme. Jomelli has foresworn the conventional works of the concert hall and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a hymn to Pallas Athene, by Saint-Saens. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the outdoor festivals at Orange. Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son," with which Debussy won the Grand Prix de Rome.

The orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahm's F Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From EVE. JOURNAL
Address New York City.
Date NOV 7 1910

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of the season in New York will take place on Thursday evening with Miss Geraldine Farrar as the soloist. She will sing an air from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin," and an unfamiliar recitative and aria of Mozart. The orchestra will play Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, Bach's Third Brandenburg concerto, with a real harpsichord, and Beethoven's Egmont overture. On Saturday afternoon a different but quite as interesting programme will be given, with Nellie Melba as the soloist, in the Mad Scene from Thomas's "Hamlet," and the aria, "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Figaro."

Josef Hofmann, who is under the di-

From Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 5 1910

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto at the piano, will give the explanatory lecture recital on the programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening. This will be the first in a series, one of which is to precede each concert of the five which the orchestra will have here this season, concerts and lecture recitals being, as usual, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. Messrs. Elson and De Voto have been heard in explanatory studies on the concerts in previous seasons. This lecture recital is set for the lecture hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday at 4 p. m.

From AMERICAN
Address New York City. NOV 5 1910
Date

Boston Symphony.

At the first concert for the season of the Boston Symphony, which takes place Thursday evening, November 10, Miss Geraldine Farrar will make her first appearance for the Winter. Her [illegible] will consist of an aria from [illegible] opera comique, "Jeannot et Colin," and Mozart's "Misero, O Signo, o son Desto." A Bach concerto, in which a genuine harpsichord will be introduced is one of the features of the programme, and there is a probability that Rachmaninoff's second [illegible]

From STANDARD UNION, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 6 - 1910

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is set for next Friday evening, Nov. 11, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won notable favor in Brooklyn by her extraordinary voice and her finished art. Madame Jomelli has foresworn the conventional works of the concert halls and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the vast majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a "Hymn to Pallas Athene," by Saint-Saens. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the out-door festivals which are held from time to time in the old Roman theaters in the south of France. This particular festival was held in the theater at Orange. Saint-Saens, among his other activities, has always taken keenest interest in these festivals and has written two or three works of large dimensions purposely for them. The "Hymn to Pallas Athene" is in his best style and should prove a most effective concert-piece. Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Debussy wrote the lyric scene of "The Prodigal Son" in 1884, and with it won the Grand Prix de Rome. The text is by Edouard Guinand and Debussy's setting was sung by Madame Rosa Caron, Ernest Van Dyck and Taskin, and Debussy received twenty-two votes out of the twenty-eight. The scene of this cantata is a village near the Lake of Genesareth. Debussy rewrote and rescored this cantata for performance at the Sheffield Music Festival in Oct., 1908, and at that time the part of Azael was changed from tenor to soprano. The principal orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms' F Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From HERALD
Address New York City.
Date

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

MME. JEANNE JOMELLI, who is to be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert this season, at the Academy of Music, on November 11, has chosen as her numbers a song representative of the older classical school and one by a great modern Frenchman in a period of his career that was more closely allied to the classics than the innovations which have since characteried his work. The first will be "A Hymn to Pallas Athene" by Saint-Saens. This was written by the great Frenchman for one of those outdoor musical festivals which are held from time to time in the Roman theatres in the south of France. It was sung for the first time in Orange in 1895.

Mme. Jomelli's second number will be Azael's recitative and air from Claude Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." It was with this work that Debussy won the Prix de Rome. In its original cantata form the air was written for tenor, but it has been transposed for soprano.

From WORLD
Address New York City.
Date OCT 30 1910

Boston Symphony.

On the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday, Nov. 10, Max Fiedler has placed Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, and he will use a genuine harpsichord for the continuo. He tried this instrument in Boston last week with much success and found that it was infinitely better than a piano, and quite loud enough for the purpose, even in a large hall, against fifty-eight strings. On Saturday afternoon, Nov. 12, he proposes playing Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck." Mr. Strube is a member of the orchestra, and is unusually gifted as a composer. This overture is the last of his large works and was first played by the orchestra last spring, and has just been published by Schirmer. Mr. Fiedler thinks so well of it that he will play it at all of the concerts of the November trip of the orchestra.

From SUN
Address New York City.
Date NOV 6 1910

NOTES OF MUSIC EVENTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The soloist at the evening entertainment will be Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House. At the Saturday concert the singer will be Mme. Melba, who is also to be heard later in opera in both New York and Chicago. The programmes in full are as follows: Thursday evening, Rachmaninoff's second symphony, Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, together with Miss Farrar's selections, and air from Isouard's "Jeannet et Colin" and Mozart's concertaria "Misero! o segno, o son desto"; Saturday afternoon, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms's F major symphony, Strube's new comedy overture "Puck," and Sibelius's "Finlandia," together with Mme. Melba's numbers, Mozart's "Dove sono" (from "Nozze di Figaro") and the "mad" scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet."

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date OCT 30 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Max Fiedler has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday evening, November 10, Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings and he will use a genuine harpsichord for the continuo. He tried this in Boston last week with much success and found that it was infinitely better than a piano and quite loud enough for the purpose even in a large hall against fifty-eight strings.

On Saturday afternoon he purposes playing Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck." Mr. Strube, as is generally known, is a member of the orchestra and is unsually gifted as a composer. This overture is the last of his large works and was played first by the orchestra last spring and has just been published by Schirmer. Mr. Fiedler thinks so well of it that he plays it at all of the concerts of the November trip of the orchestra.

From PRESS
Address New York City.
Date OCT 30 1910

Max Fiedler has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday evening, November 10, Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, and he will use a genuine harpsichord for the continuo. He tried this in Boston last week with much success and found it was far better than a piano and quite loud enough for the purpose even against 58 strings, in a large hall. On Saturday afternoon he will present Gustav Strube's Comedy Overture "Puck." Strube is a member of the orchestra. The overture is the last of his large works and was played first by the orchestra last spring. It has just been published by Schirmer. Fiedler thinks so well of the work that he will play it at all of the concerts of the November trip.

From TOWN & COUNTRY.
Address New York City
Date NOV 5 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirtieth season in its history and the twenty-fifth in New York City on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November tenth and twelfth at Carnegie Hall. At these concerts with Max Fiedler, Conductor, the orchestra's new Concert-Master, Anton Witek, of Berlin, will be heard, and Geraldine Farrar and Mme. Melba, respectively, will be the soloists. The principal program numbers at the first concert will be Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E minor, already heard with much enthusiasm twice this season in Boston, and first played in this country under the baton of the composer himself last winter with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The symphony at the afternoon concert will probably be Schumann's "Rhenish."

From EVE. WORLD
Address New York City.
Date NOV 5 - 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town next Thursday evening for its first concert of the season. Max Fiedler, for a third year, remains its conductor, Anton Witek has succeeded Willy Hess as concertmeister. Rachmaninoff's second symphony will be played, and Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist, presenting some unfamiliar compositions. At the following Saturday afternoon concert Nellie Melba will make her reappearance in "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the symphony will be Brahms's third in F major.

From EVE. SUN
Address New York City.
Date OCT 29 1910

Max Fiedler has a "Bach Suite" which he has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, on Nov. 10.

It is the so-called Third Brandenburg concerto for strings, and, the secretary adds, "he will use a genuine harpsichord."

From WORLD
Address New York City.
Date

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given Nov. 11. Mme. Jeanne Jomelli will be the soloist. Mme. Jomelli expects to sing a work which will be heard for the first time in this country. It is a hymn to Pallas Athena by Saint Saens and was written for the musical festival given in the old Roman theatre in Orange, France, in 1894. This concert will be the one hundred and eighteenth given by the orchestra in this borough.

[61]

From Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date NOV 5 1910

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is set for next Friday evening, Nov. 11, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won notable favor in Brooklyn by her fine voice and her finished art. Madame Jomelli has forsworn the conventional works of the concert hall and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the vast majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saeus. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the outdoor festivals which are held from time to time in the old Roman theatres in the south of France.

Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Debussy wrote the lyric scene of "The Prodigal Son" in 1884, and with it won the Grand Prix de Rome. The text is by Edouard Guinand and Debussy's setting was sung by Madame Rosa Caron, Ernest Van Dyck and Taskin, and Debussy received twenty-two votes out of the twenty-eight.

The principal orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms' F-Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date NOV 5 1910

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is set for next Friday evening, November 11, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won favor in Brooklyn. Mme. Jomelli has foresworn the conventional works of the concert hall and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a hymn to Pallas Athene, by Saint-Saens. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the outdoor festivals at Orange. Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son," with which Debussy won the Grand Prix de Rome.

The orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahm's F Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of the season in New York will take place on Thursday evening, with Miss Geraldine Farrar as the soloist. She will sing an air from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin," and an unfamiliar recitative and aria of Mozart. The orchestra will play Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, Bach's Third Brandenburg concerto, with a real harpsichord, and Beethoven's Egmont overture. On Saturday afternoon a different but quite as interesting programme will be given, with Nellie Melba as the soloist, in the Mad Scene from Thomas's "Hamlet," and the aria, "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Figaro."

Josef Hofmann, who is under the di-

From Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date NOV 5 1910

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto at the piano, will give the explanatory lecture recital on the programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening. This will be the first in a series, one of which is to precede each concert of the five which the orchestra will have here this season, concerts and lecture recitals being, as usual, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. Messrs. Elson and De Voto have been heard in explanatory studies on the concerts in previous seasons. This lecture recital is set for the lecture hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday at 4 p. m.

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date

Boston Symphony.

At the first concert for the season of the Boston Symphony, which takes place Thursday evening, November 10, Miss Geraldine Farrar will make her initial apeparance for the Winter. Her solos will consist of an aria from Isouard's opera comique, "Jeannot et Colin," and Mozart's "Misero, O Signo, O son Desto." A Bach concerto in which a genuine harpsichord will be introduced is one of the features of the programme, and there is a probability that Rachmaninoff's second symphony will be heard.

From

Address

Date NOV 6 - 1910

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is set for next Friday evening, Nov. 11, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won notable favor in Brooklyn by her extraordinary voice and her finished art. Madame Jomelli has foresworn the conventional works of the concert halls and of her two numbers, one will be sung for the first time in America, so far as is known, and the other will be a novelty to the vast majority of those who hear her. Her first number will be a "Hymn to Pallas Athene," by Saint-Saens. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the out-door festivals which are held from time to time in the old Roman theaters in the south of France. This particular festival was held in the theater at Orange. Saint-Saens, among his other activities, has always taken keenest interest in these festivals and has written two or three works of large dimensions purposely for them. The "Hymn to Pallas Athene" is in his best style and should prove a most effective concert-piece. Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Debussy wrote the lyric scene of "The Prodigal Son" in 1884, and with it won the Grand Prix de Rome. The text is by Edouard Guinand and Debussy's setting was sung by Madame Rosa Caron, Ernest Van Dyck and Taskin, and Debussy received twenty-two votes out of the twenty-eight. The scene of this cantata is a village near the Lake of Genesareth. Debussy rewrote and rescored this cantata for performance at the Sheffield Music Festival in Oct., 1908, and at that time the part of Azael was changed from tenor to soprano. The principal orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms' F Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

MME. JEANNE JOMELLI, who is to be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert this season, at the Academy of Music, on November 11, has chosen as her numbers a song representative of the older classical school and one by a great modern Frenchman in a period of his career that was more closely allied to the classics than the innovations which have since characteried his work. The first will be "A Hymn to Pallas Athene" by Saint-Säens. This was written by the great Frenchman for one of those outdoor musical festivals which are held from time to time in the Roman theatres in the south of France. It was sung for the first time in Orange in 1895.

Mme. Jomelli's second number will be Azael's recitative and air from Claude Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." It was with this work that Debussy won the Prix de Rome. In its original cantata form the air was written for tenor, but it has been transposed for soprano.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

* * *

Boston Symphony.

On the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday, Nov. 10, Max Fiedler has placed Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, and he will use a genuine harpsichord for the continuo. He tried this instrument in Boston last week with much success and found that it was infinitely better than a piano, and quite loud enough for the purpose, even in a large hall, against fifty-eight strings. On Saturday afternoon, Nov. 12, he proposes playing Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck." Mr. Strube is a member of the orchestra, and is unusually gifted as a composer. This overture is the last of his large works and was first played by the orchestra last spring, and has just been published by Schirmer. Mr. Fiedler thinks so well of it that he will play it at all of the concerts of the November trip of the orchestra.

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date

NOTES OF MUSIC EVENTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The soloist at the evening entertainment will be Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House. At the Saturday concert the singer will be Mme. Melba, who is also to be heard later in opera in both New York and Chicago. The programmes in full are as follows: Thursday evening, Rachmaninoff's second symphony, Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, together with Miss Farrar's selections, and air from Isouard's "Jeannet et Colin" and Mozart's concert aria "Misero! o segno, o son desto"; Saturday afternoon, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms's F major symphony, Strube's new comedy overture "Puck," and Sibelius's "Finlandia," together with Mme. Melba's numbers, Mozart's "Dove sono" (from "Nozze di Figaro") and the "mad" scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet."

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date OCT 30 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Max Fiedler has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday evening, November 10, Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings and he will use a genuine harpsichord for the continuo. He tried this in Boston last week with much success and found that it was infinitely better than a piano and quite loud enough for the purpose even in a large hall against fifty-eight strings.

On Saturday afternoon he purposes playing Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck." Mr. Strube, as is generally known, is a member of the orchestra and is unsually gifted as a composer. This overture is the last of his large works and was played first by the orchestra last spring and has just been published by Schirmer. Mr. Fiedler thinks so well of it that he plays it at all of the concerts of the November trip of the orchestra.

From PRESS

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiedler has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday evening, November 10, Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, and he will use a genuine harpsichord for the continuo. He tried this in Boston last week with much success and found it was far better than a piano and quite loud enough for the purpose even against 58 strings, in a large hall. On Saturday afternoon he will present Gustav Strube's Comedy Overture "Puck." Strube is a member of the orchestra. The overture is the last of his large works and was played first by the orchestra last spring. It has just been published by Schirmer. Fiedler thinks so well of the work that he will play it at all of the concerts of the November trip.

From

Address

Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirtieth season in its history and the twenty-fifth in New York City on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November tenth and twelfth at Carnegie Hall. At these concerts with Max Fiedler, Conductor, the orchestra's new Concert-Master, Anton Witek, of Berlin, will be heard, and Geraldine Farrar and Mme. Melba, respectively, will be the soloists. The principal program numbers at the first concert will be Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E minor, already heard with much enthusiasm twice this season in Boston, and first played in this country under the baton of the composer himself last winter with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The symphony at the afternoon concert will probably be Schumann's "Rhenish."

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town next Thursday evening for its first concert of the season. Max Fiedler, for a third year, remains its conductor. Anton Witek has succeeded Willy Hess as concertmeister. Rachmaninoff's second symphony will be played, and Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist, presenting some unfamiliar compositions. At the following Saturday afternoon concert Nellie Melba will make her reappearance in "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the symphony will be Brahms's third in F major.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiedler has a "Bach Suite" which he has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, on Nov. 10.

It is the so-called Third Brandenburg concerto for strings, and, the secretary adds, "he will use a genuine harpsichord."

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given Nov. 11. Mme. Jeanne Jomelli will be the sololst. Mme. Jomelli expects to sing a work which will be heard for the first time in this country. It is a hymn to Pallas Athena by Saint Saens and was written for the musical festival given in the old Roman theatre in Orange, France, in 1894. This concert will be the one hunded and eighteenth given by the orchestra in this borough.

[61]

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

Date

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first Brooklyn concert next Friday Jeanne Jomelli will be the soloist. She will sing a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saëns and an air from Debussy's "L'enfant Prodigue." The principal orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms's Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius's symphonic poem "Finlandia."

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Orchestra will give its first afternoon concert of the season in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Mme. Melba will sing the "Dove Sono" aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." Brahms' third symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Mr. Strube's "Puck" overture and the Sibelius tone poem, "Finlandia" constitute the orchestral scheme of the concert.

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date

New Concert Master's Debut.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Mr. Anton Witek, the new concert meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist in America at the fourth public rehearsal this afternoon. In memory of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, the concert was prefaced by the second movement of Schubert's unfinished symphony. Mr. Witek played the Beethoven concerto, using a Stradivarius. His début was most successful.

From HERALD

Address New York City.

Date

Miss Farrar Sings in Boston.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Miss Geraldine Farrar, the Metropolitan Opera singer, was the soloist at the fifth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. It was the Boston girl's first appearance in America this season. She was frequently recalled and there was an ovation when she finally shook hands with Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, and bowed herself from the stage with girlish grace.

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date OCT 30 1910

Boston Symphony.

Max Fiedler has placed on the first evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Thursday evening, November 10, Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for strings, and he will use a genuine harpischord for the continuo. He tried this in Boston last week with much success. On Saturday afternoon he will give Gustav Strube's Comedy Overture, "Puck." Mr. Strube, as is generally known, is a member of the orchestra.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

TSCHAIKOWSKI-Pathétique

Melba To Sing With Orchestra.

Aside from the appearance here of Mme. Melba at the first Boston Symphony concert, November 9, Conductor Fiedler has arranged for the presentation of two orchestral works that will arouse much interest among patrons of the orchestra. The first is Rachmaninoff's second symphony. This was played in Boston two weeks ago for the first time and had such an extraordinary success that Mr. Fiedler will repeat it at the concerts on November 4 and 5. It is regarded as the most interesting novelty the orchestra has brought out in a number of years.

One of two other numbers will be an overture, entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, who is the possessor of unusual creative talent. This work was first played last spring and has just been published by Schirmer & Co. It has been announced for performance by the principal orchestras in Germany. The other will be Beethoven's overture "Egmont."

The sale of seats for this first concert will open at Albaugh's ticket office, Charles and Fayette streets, Wednesday.

Est

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 29 1910

FIEDLER TO CONDUCT TWO NEW NUMBERS

Melba Will Also Sing At The Opening Concert Of The Boston Symphony.

Aside from the appearances at the Lyric of Melba at the first Boston Symphony concert on November 9, which is quite sufficient to distinguish any affair of this kind, Mr. Fiedler has put on two orchestral works that unquestionably will arouse a great deal of interest among the patrons of the orchestra.

The first is Rachmaninoff's second symphony. This was played in Boston two weeks ago, for the first time, and had such an extraordinary success that Mr. Fiedler repeats it at the concerts on the 4th and 5th of November. It is by all odds the most interesting novelty that the orchestra has brought out in a number of years.

The other new number will be an overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, who is the possessor of a very unusual creative talent. This work was first played last spring, and has just been published by Schirmer & Co., and has been announced for performance by the principal orchestras in Germany. The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's overture, "Egmont."

The sale of seats for this first concert will open at Albaugh's ticket office, Charles and Fayette streets, on November 2.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Melba as soloist, will give the first of its annual series of concerts at the Lyric, November 9, under the direction of Mr. Fiedler. Willy Hess, the former concertmaster, having resigned, Herr Anton Witek has been secured to fill this vacancy. He comes well heralded and will be the soloist at one of these concerts. Clara Ascherfeld, pianist, will be assisted by Thaddeus Rich, violinist and concertmaster of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Melba at Boston Symphony.

Aside from the appearance of Melba at the first Boston Symphony Concert, on November 9, which is quite sufficient to distinguish any affair of this kind, Mr. Fiedler has put on two orchestral works that unquestionably will arouse a great deal of interest among the patrons. The first is Rachmaninoff's second symphony. This was played in Boston two weeks, the first time, and had such an extraordinary success that Mr. Fiedler repeats it at the concerts on November 4 and 5.

It is by all odds the most interesting novelty that the orchestra has brought out in a number of years. The other numbers will be an overture, entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra. This work was first played last spring, and has just been published, and has been announced for performance by the principal orchestras in Germany. The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's overture "Egmont."

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 29 1910

NEW ORCHESTRAL WORKS

To Be Played At First Local Concert Of Boston Symphony.

Aside from the appearance of Melba at the first Boston Symphony concert on November 9, Max Fiedler, conductor, has put on two interesting orchestral works. The first is Rachmaninoff's second symphony. This was played in Boston two weeks for the first time and met with success. It is said to be the most interesting novelty that the orchestra has brought out in a number of years.

The other number will be an overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra. This work was first played last spring and has just been published by Schirmer & Co. and has been announced for performance by the principal orchestras in Germany. The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's overture "Egmont."

Est 1884

[62]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aside from the appearance of Melba at the first Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric on November 9, which is quite sufficient to distinguish any affair of this kind, Mr. Fiedler has put on two orchestra works that unquestionably will arouse a great deal of interest among the patrons of the orchestra. The first is Rachmaninoff's second symphony. The other numbers will be an overture, entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra. The other orchestral number will be Beethoven's overture, "Egmont."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Established: 1884

MUSICAL TREAT OF THE HIGHEST ORDER

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights a Very Large Audience.

MME. MELBA IN EXCELLENT FORM

She Sang With Spirit and Won Most Hearty Applause.

To those who keep pace with contemporary music it were sufficient to print an evening's program, with the simple statement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played it, to assure them that a musical treat of the highest order had been enjoyed. But last evening's performance at the Lyric, when that splendid body of musicians opened the musical season in Baltimore with their first concert of the year in this city, was singularly happy in program and execution, and the very large and brilliant audience was amply satisfied, as was evidenced by the vast volume of spontaneous and oft-repeated applause.

The program was as follows:

Rachmaninoff—
Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.
(1) Largo.—Allegro moderato.
(2) Allegro molto.
(3) Adagio.
(4) Allegro vivace.

Mozart—
Recitative. "How Susanna Delays!" and Aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro."

Strube—
Comedy overture, "Puck."

Thomas—
Mad scene from "Hamlet."

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.

The symphony was made doubly enjoyable by its position as the opening number, which prevented its rather great length from becoming oppressive and enabled those who followed its really beautiful theme to do so with fresh minds and appreciation unfagged by previous efforts. The Rachmaninoff composition was presented for the first time in Baltimore, being the work of a young Russian who toured this country with the orchestra last winter. It is reminiscent of another earlier score, the identity of which at the moment evades the memory, but the treatment is entirely original and the theme essentially beautiful in conception and in its working out. It was played admirably by Mr. Fiedler's company, the recurrent plaintive strain which characterizes the work being emphasized with great artistic effect. The character of the composition requires the constant subordination of the heavier instruments to the strings and this was observed with excellent judgment. The solo work of the concert master, Mr. A. Wietek, was remarkable for its sustained prominence.

Mme. Nellie Melba was the vocalist, and she surprised many who, remembering her extended career on the operatic and concert stage, had been prepared to find her voice less excellent than when they had heard her first. In the Mozart number she sang with less spirit than could have been desired, but in perfect tonal and technical form. Her rendition of the more modern number from Thomas' "Hamlet" was a genuine surprise. It was sung in her best form and clearly showed that she has lost none of her early art. The selection gave fine opportunity for the display of her wonderful range and flexibility, and she realized it in a truly transcendant manner. The musical setting of the mad Ophelia's pathetic revealing of her secret is in itself one of the most beautiful of modern compositions, and it gained in its expression through the medium of Mme. Melba's voice. A word should be said also for the singular clearness of her French, not the easiest language to enunciate in music.

Of the orchestral numbers, perhaps the most pleasure was given by Mr. Strube's quaint and beautiful setting of a fairy woodland frolic, which was written only two years ago, and is yet in manuscript. In sonata form it combines exquisite imagery with dignified movement and a most modern style, and the melodic qualities are singularly attractive. Mr. Strube is a member of the orchestra and Mr. Fiedler, to whom the piece was dedicated, very properly designated him to the audience, which gave him a deserved ovation.

The beautiful Beethoven number completed a program of unusual effectiveness and concluded one of the most enjoyable evenings which a Baltimore audience has spent with the Boston players. J. C. P.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

MELBA SINGS HERE TONIGHT

Diva To Be Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Madame Melba will be the soloist at the first Baltimore concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight.

The present season, which will mark the twenty-sixth of that organization in Baltimore, bids fair to be one of the most successful in its history. Nearly the entire seating capacity for tonight's performance has been sold in advance. The symphony to be given is the work of Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff. It was composed at Dresden and was played at Moscow at a concert of the Imperial Russian Music Society in the course of the season of 1908 and 1909. The composer conducted the performance. The first performances in this country were by the Philadelphia Orchestra, in Philadelphia, November 26 and 27, 1909. The program for tonight will be:

Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.—Rachmaninoff
I—Largo-Allegro moderato.
II—Adagio.
III—Allegro molto.
IV—Allegro vivace.

How Susanna Delays, an Aria, Flown Forever, from The Marriage of Figaro.....Mozart.

Comedy overture—Puck (First time in Baltimore).....Strube.

Mad scene from Hamlet.....Thomas.

Overture to Goethe's Egmont, Op. 84.....Beethoven.

Est 1884

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Wonderful Development Of The Orchestra Since Olden Times.

MONTEVERDE PRIME MOVER

Emilio De Gogorza To Sing At The Peabody Next Friday—Mr. Armacost Moves To Washington.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra (which was here last week), with its immense volume of tone, its perfection of intonation, its wealth of tone color and its limitless possibilities, sets one to thinking of what a modern orchestra can do, as compared with the orchestra of olden times.

Composers make demands upon its resources today that in former times were beyond the wildest dreams of musicians. The growth and development of the orchestra has come in response to the call of modernity, and is the direct outcome of the change that has come over musical compositions and over the means of expression used by modern composers. In the olden days, when music was chiefly melodic, the orchestra was used as a support to the melodic lines, merely indicating the harmonic basis. But as time rolled on and harmony became the predominanting element, the necessity arose for something stronger—more capable of forming a support, and even acting co-ordinately with the fragmentary melodic line. Necessity, then, was the motive power that impelled the evolution of the orchestra, until it has attained is present proficiency and capability.

To trace the growth of the modern orchestra from its very incipiency would be an impossibility within limited space, but, nevertheless, the history of the development of musical tone is an interesting study.

Instruments Of The Savages.

As far as one can judge musical tone-quality was well-nigh wanting among savages. Their wind instruments and instruments of percussion, of which they were very fond, produced noise rather than musical sound. And even when instruments began to evince perception of musical quality they were weak in volume and in power. Many years ago two flutes were found by the side of an Egyptian mummy and, although the tone they produced was sweet, it was feeble. The string of old Indian and Japanese string instruments were too thin to produce any great amount of volume, and later, in mediæval times, the sounds produced from lutes and viols had but little carrying power.

The wind instruments differed in this respect, because the earlier specimens being natural horns, they possessed more or less resonance. The Zincken, the progenitor of the cornet, is said to have produced fearsome tones, while the early oboe, on account of the large size of its reeds, emitted a coarse tone. As manufacturers of wind instruments became more skillful, the tones became more refined, but the orchestra, even in Handel's time, would be exceedingly trying to modern ears.

How strange it seems to us moderns when we reflect upon it that two or three centuries ago the coarse and blatant tones of wind instruments were not only tolerated but enjoyed, while extreme softness of tone was demanded from string instruments. In fact, when the violin was evolved from the viol by reducing the number and thickening the substance of the strings and securing greater resonance by altering the form of the body of the instrument, the increased tone was regarded as vulgar. "The screeching violin," as it was sarcastically termed, was abhorred by the sensitive musician of the seventeenth century. But likes and dislikes change, with the result that the violin inaugurated a new era in musical tone, an era in which volume and power were worshiped. The past 50 years, however, have added richness of tone to the violin, to which addition Wagner contributed in a considerable measure by demanding from manufacturers instruments that would produce sensuous effects.

Monteverde Led Movement.

Monteverde, who died in 1643, was practically the founder of the modern orchestra. He was a prolific writer of dramatic works, and being strongly imbued with modern tendencies—modern, that is, for his time—found the necessity of enlarging the scope of the orchestra. His first step was taken by increasing the number of string instruments and relying less upon the harpsichord, which in his time and even until Handel's day occupied a place among orchestral instruments. In his writings he made many experiments in the selection and combination of instruments for accompanying the voices.

After him came others who worked along the same lines, some adding new instruments to those already in use. Mozart introduced the clarinet and the trombone into use in the orchestra with excellent effect, and since his time modern writers have invented instruments for specific purposes. Verdi, for instance, caused to be made the long trumpets for use in the great march in his opera "Aida." Paderewski also invented an instrument to imitate thunder, or the noise of guns or something excruciating to the ear. This seems, however, to be a reversion to the old idea of producing noise rather than musical sound, and is scarcely artistic.

Haydn's orchestra consisted of the violin, the viola, the violoncello, the small double bass, the oboe and flute, and for special effects trumpets and drums. When that skeleton of an orchestra is compared with the immense modern orchestra, as illustrated by the Boston Symphony organization, and the comparison be drawn between the demands made by Haydn and Richard Strauss, then the enormous advance stands revealed before us and causes us to wonder when, if ever, the limit will be reached.

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

BIG CROWD HEARS MME. MELBA SING

First Of Season's Concerts By Boston Symphony A Success.

DIVA IN CITY AFTER FIVE YEARS' ABSENCE

Excellent Program, Finely Rendered, Appreciated By Audience Of Baltimore Music-Lovers.

The crowd which thronged the Lyric last night at the opening of the season of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was declared by the management to be the largest which has ever assembled in the theater for an orchestral concert. Notwithstanding the fact that it was announced several days ago that the house was entirely sold out and that not a seat could be had for love nor money, the box office was besieged during the early evening hours, and a long line was soon formed. Everybody seemed anxious to hear Mr. Fiedler's first concert and the songs of Mme. Nellie Melba, who was the soloist of the occasion, and they refused to be disappointed just because they could not secure chairs, contentedly standing three and four deep in the back of the hall and almost filling the wide space reserved for promenade purposes.

The presence of Melba on the program evidently had much to do with such an unusual display of interest, and she was given the heartiest kind of a reception. In fact, up until the time she appeared for her first number, the recitative and aria, "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Figaro," the audience had been a shade colder than is generally the case at the symphony concerts, but the famous songstress' voice seemed to awake the dormant enthusiasm, and both the Mozart number and the "Mad Scene" from Thomas' "Hamlet," her other one, were vociferously applauded.

Not for five years had the Australian singer appeared in Baltimore, and as she crossed the stage for the Mozart song every glass in the house was turned upon her and every voice was hushed as Mr. Fiedler raised his baton for the opening bars. But for a slight increase in avoirdupois, it was the Melba of five, or even ten, years ago.

Melba's Only Appearance.

When seen in her dressing-room Mme. Melba expressed her gratitude for the pleasure she had given and said that it would be her only appearance in Baltimore this season. "I am going to New York and thence to Chicago, where I will join the Grand Opera Company, singing 'Mimi' on Tuesday night. I should like to return here with the company during the Baltimore season of opera, but I have so many European engagements booked that I will have to sail about Christmas-time."

While in Baltimore the singer was the guest of Ernest Hutcheson of the Peabody faculty and of Mrs. Hutcheson at their home, in Roland Park. She arrived here several hours before the concert and left this morning. Like Melba, Mr. Hutcheson is also a native of Australia, and the two artists knew each other a number of years ago in "the old country." During the course of her conversation the diva took occasion to express her high appreciation and opinion of Mr. Hutcheson's abilities as a piano virtuoso, which she described as "remarkable."

Composer Applauded.

Two of the orchestral offerings on the program—the Rachmaninoff symphony and the comedy overture, "Puck"—were new in this city. Gustav Strube, the composer of the latter, which is dedicated to Mr. Fiedler, is a member of the orchestra, and at the continued applause which followed the close of the number Mr. Fiedler made a sign toward the first violins, whereupon a modest-appearing little man arose from the first chair of the top row and bowed his acknowledgments; three times was he forced to repeat the action; it was Mr. Strube.

As is usual at the Symphony concerts, the audience was an extremely fashionable one, and much beautiful dressing and jewelry were in evidence. Among those who occupied boxes was a party including Joseph Pache, director of the Oratorio Society and of the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, and Mrs. Pache; Mr. and Mrs. Charles T. Crane, Mrs. Charles Morton, Mrs. Henry Clay Browning of Washington, Mrs. Max Fiedler and Dr. Nellie V. Marks. Mrs. Browning was one of the soloists at the concert of the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus Tuesday night, having remained in Baltimore for the concert. A luncheon was given in her honor and that of Mrs. Fiedler by Dr. Marks yesterday afternoon.

From AMERICAN BALTIMORE, MD. NOV 10 1910

Address

Date

MELBA'S TRIUMPH WITH SYMPHONY

MAGNIFICENT MUSICAL TREAT AT THE LYRIC.

SOCIETY WELL REPRESENTED

Opening Concert of the Season by the Boston Orchestra an Event Long to Be Remembered—Selections From Rachmaninoff, Mozart, Strube, Beethoven and Thomas Furnished the Excellent Program Rendered.

The highly conservative musical taste of this city was well demonstrated last evening by the large and cultured audience which attended the opening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric. The people needed no begging to assemble for hearing such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony, or such a soloist as Madame Melba. The following was the excellent program:

Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.....Rachmaninoff
(1) Largo.—Allegro moderato.
(2) Allegro molto.
(3) Adagio.
(4) Allegro vivace.
Recitative, "How Susanna Delays!" and Aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Comedy Overture, "Puck," First time in Baltimore.....Strube
Mad scene from "Hamlet".....Thomas
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.....Beethoven

The concert was a typical symphony performance, the principal number being given to the auditors at the beginning when the musical attention is always at its best. This important place on the program last evening was taken by the twenty-seventh work of Rachmaninoff, the young Russian composer, who played his own piano concerto with the Boston Orchestra at the Lyric last season with immense success. There was intense interest among Baltimore music lovers to hear one of this composer's best works for orchestra alone. It is written in classic form with modern treatment. The work is particularly rich in its modern woodwind scoring, with three flutes, three oboes and an English horn, two clarinets, besides a bass clarinet, two bassoons, full quartet of horns, three trumpets and three trombones, with the usual orchestral furniture.

After a short introduction (largo) the cellos and bassos begin the work, which is quickly made plain by the violins uttering the musical purpose of the symphony with a directness that makes the work plain and satisfactory at the outset, as Beethoven was in the habit of doing. The second movement has plenty of strong, bold melody. The third, however, does most of the singing, while the fourth is jubilant and triumphant, as befits a work of complete success. The symphony was as enthusiastically received by the audience as when the composer was present, playing the solo part in his own concerto. In fact, Rachmaninoff has completely won the music-loving public, and everything that bears his name is now anticipated with pleasure.

Melba's Triumph.

According to the old style in symphony concerts the singer was introduced after the symphony had been heard and assimilated. And Melba's selection was a return to the beautiful old classic form of operatic scene and aria. Mozart's "Dove Sono" is as fine and fresh today as it was when it was written in 1785, in the libretto by Lorenzo Da Ponte, at one time a leader and musical writer in America. The opening recitative has the fine old satisfactory dramatic style that prepares the ear for the beautiful aria to follow. Melba fits the character in appearance, as a countess, not as young as she was, but still charming.

Mme. Melba gave a splendid interpretation of the tender and melancholy air, dreamily dwelling on its opening phrases in well-sustained mezzo-voce tones that were a pleasure to the ear, and ending with the quickened pace inspired by the hope of the returning love well pictured in the song. The whole scene is like a touch of nature and a chapter out of life. Melba's triumph was enthusiastically recognized. She was also very successful in her second number—Ophelia's song in "Hamlet" by Ambroise Thomas. But the scene is less effective than the beautiful musical setting of Goethe's song, "Know'st Thou the Land?" in Thomas' opera "Mignon."

In the Ophelia scene in "Hamlet," Thomas took a Swedish folk-song bodily for its tender sentiment, but it sounded very differently when Jenny Lind sang it as "I've Left the Snow-Clad Hills," from what it did last evening as given by Melba, as the maddened Ophelia.

The audience paid a well-deserved compliment to Mr. Strube, the composer of the comedy overture "Puck," who is a member of the Boston orchestra, and Mr. Strube gracefully acknowledged its recognition by a bow from his seat in the fifth row of first violins.

Melba's two diverse numbers were properly well separated by the bit of orchestral comedy by Strube. The concert was triumphantly closed by Beethoven's well-known overture to Goethe's powerful tragedy, "Egmont."

Madame Melba

Soloist at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S CONCERT

First Of Season Will Take Place At The Lyric Wednesday.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the year is scheduled for the Lyric Theatre on next Wednesday evening, November 9, with Melba as the soloist. It will be her only appearance this year in Baltimore. The orchestra returns with comparatively few changes in its personnel, the one of great moment being at the first desk of the first violins, where Anton Witek, for 16 years the concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, has taken the place of Willy Hess.

Madame Melba will sing two numbers, the familiar "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." The concert will begin with the symphony in E-Minor No. 2, by Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist, who was the soloist with the Boston Symphony here last season. This is the last of Rachmanioff orchestral works, and by many it is regarded not only as the best, but the most important contribution of symphonic literature since Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic."

The other two orchestral numbers will be a light overture, entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the very talented members of the orchestra, and the "Egmont" overture by Beethoven. The program, in the order in which it will be played, is as follows: Rachmaninoff, Symphony No. 2 in E-Minor; Mozart, Aria, "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro;" Strube, comedy overture "Puck;" Thomas, mad scene from "Hamlet," and Beethoven, overture to "Egmont."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World

From AMERICAN

Address

Date NOV 6

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the year is scheduled for the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, November 9. With Melba as the soloist—her only appearance this year in Baltimore— and with the largest subscription the orchestra has ever had in this city, it is certain that the Lyric Theater will be crowded to its utmost capacity. The orchestra returns with comparatively few changes in its personnel, but the one of great moment will be at the first desk of the first violins, where Anton Witek, for 16 years the concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, has taken the place of Willy Hess. Witek, from all accounts, is a great violinist and great musician, and seems bound to make a name for himself in this country equal to that which he had made in Germany.

Madame Melba will sing two numbers, the familiar "Dove Song" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the Mad Scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." In the Mozart aria she will be able to exhibit her marvelous art in bel canto, as all of Mozart's music demands. Thomas' scene, strongly contrasted with it, enables her to display her entire reportoire of coloratura. The concert will begin with the symphony in E minor, No. 2, by Sergi Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist, who was the soloist with the Boston Symphony here last season. The other two orchestral numbers will be "Puck," by Gustave Strube, one of the talented members of the orchestra, and the "Egmont" overture, by Beethoven.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 10 1910

SOCIETY AT THE CONCERT

Fashionable Audience Hears Melba And Boston Symphony.

Mme. Melba and the Boston Symphony Orchestra proved an irresistible attraction to Baltimore society last evening and the Lyric was filled with a most fashionable and appreciative audience.

MME. NELLIE MELBA

Among those present were:

Mrs. S. Taggart Steele—Embroidered violet chiffon over violet satin.

Miss Margaret Griffis—Gown of light blue embroidered crepe de chine, trimmed with silver.

Mrs. Wesley A. Tucker—Black satin combined with velvet brocade.

Mrs. G. H. Martin—Black satin gown with point lace and jet.

Miss Bessie K. Baker—Light blue chiffon, trimmed with crystals.

Mrs. J. Paul Baker—Black embroidered crepe de chine.

Mrs. H. Clay Browning, of Washington—White lace over satin, with diamond ornaments.

Mrs. George Reuling—Black satin with jetted lace.

Miss Ella Kremelberg—Violet satin, embroidered in gold.

Miss Katharine Kremelberg—Gray chiffon, embroidered in rose color.

Mrs. Yates Pennington—Black satin with jetted garniture.

Mrs. Charles Morton—White embroidered silk with gold and topaz ornaments.

Mrs. Robinson Boykin—Gray satin veiled in light blue chiffon.

Mrs. Frank P. Clark—White lace veiled in black embroidered chiffon.

Miss Sara Gibson—White messaline with point lace.

Mrs. Robert B. Morison—Black satin with jetted tulle.

Miss Mary Kilpatrick—Pale gray net with silver trimming.

Mrs. Allan McLane—Black chiffon over white brocade.

Mrs. Henry Wood—White lace with diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Thomas Ireland Elliott—White satin brocade with crystals.

Mrs. William Ewing—Black velvet combined with chiffon.

Miss Lilian Dorsey Farnandis—Pink chiffon over silk with pearl ornaments.

Mrs. Walter R. Crabb, of Virginia—Black silk over black chiffon.

Miss Rosalie Tunstall Smith—White satin with pearl trimming.

Miss Elizabeth Mitchell — Embroidered black chiffon and pearls.

Mrs. William P. Harvey—Black chiffon over white lace and satin.

Mrs. Henry Bowdoin—Black satin with jet and embroidery.

Miss Mary G. Bowdoin—Violet crepe satin with hand embroidery in violet and gold.

Miss Rosalie Robinson—White marquisette over flowered satin.

Miss Mary Randall, of Annapolis—White lingerie gown.

Miss Elizabeth Stokes—White satin veiled in black chiffon and lace.

Mrs. Harry Seckel Jenkins—Black satin embroidered and trimmed with gold.

Mrs. W. T. Helm—Peacock blue satin with gold and blue trimming.

Mrs. Bruce Cotten—Jetted chiffon over black satin, with touches of blue.

Miss Mabel Vickery—White satin with crystal and gold trimming.

Miss Elizabeth E. Starr—White lace combined with chiffon and satin.

Mrs. Charles T. Crane—Black satin with gold embroidery.

Mrs. Harvey Inglis—Embroidered black marquisette over white.

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OV 10 1910

O. B. B. ON SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its First Concert Of The Season At The Lyric, With Mme. Nellie Melba As Soloist.

Of the less intimate agencies for making music, a large, perfectly balanced and finely schooled choir like the Mendelssohn of Toronto is the noblest. Then comes such an orchestra as the Boston organization, which is entirely composed of players of distinguished ability. A perfect choir appeals so incomparably, because its members use no mechanical intermediates between conception and expression, and the voice is endowed with a limitless emotional vocabulary. When a mass of voices have learned to respond to the inspired behest of a Vogt it is overwhelming in its graphic power. The orchestra is easily second as a potent factor in musical expression, for it is an immense box of primal colors, with which such men as Hector Berlioz produced an almost infinite variety of complex shades, with dynamics ranging from faint whisperings to clangorous thunders. The most crucial task of the baton wielder is to produce the composer's desired tonal colors, through securing proper adjustments — regulating the proportionate contribution of instruments to successive color schemes. Gericke's masterfulness was unique in this field. All other conductors approach his standard—some closely, and others less so. Because of the exceeding skill of its wind instrument players, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has more clearly defined and more beautiful primal colors than has any other similar body, and we cannot overestimate the advantages to be derived from its visits. Last evening's concert was the first of its twenty-sixth series in Baltimore, and the house was well filled.

Mr. Fiedler presented the following program:

Rachmaninoff—Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.
- I. Largo. Allegro moderato.
- II. Allegro molto.
- III. Adagio.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

Mozart—Recitative, "How Susanna Delays!" and Aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro."

Strube—Comedy Overture, "Puck." (First time in Baltimore.)

Thomas—Mad Scene from "Hamlet."

Beethoven—Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.

Raclmaninoff played one of his pianoforte concerti with the Boston orchestra at the Lyric last year and failed in making a strongly favorable impression, partly because the composition was not markedly pianistic and still more because of his performance, which lacked virile authority. In this E minor symphony Rachmaninoff has much to say, and he leans little on memory and still less on any recognized school in his diction. It's two most noticeable weaknesses are too great length and the lack of satisfactory emotional contrasts. The happenings are bewilderingly profuse, and there are few reposeful moments in the hour's duration. The work is so full of interesting action that one would like to hear it a second time before expressing an opinion as to its art value. Mr. Rachmaninoff certainly shows great contrafuntal and instrumental ingenuity in this symphony, but it furnishes less evidence that he possesses great initial invention. Some of its more intense episodes verge closely on the melodramatic, and there are many which would gain significance through judicious pruning, for his material and devices are often so profuse as to engender turgidity. Its performance afforded the orchestra a strenuous hour, but there was no faltering.

Mme. Melba has been highly esteemed by the musical world for many years, and Baltimore last evening added one more to her long list of triumphs. But one must recognize that those wonderful vocal chords are beginning to show weariness. This slight decadence is more serious in Melba's case than it would be were she a strongly emotional singer, like Gadski, Fremstad or Destinn; for she has built upon pure vocal perfection, eliding emotional warmth, whereas they employ their voices as vehicles for the conveyance of sentiment and passionate feeling.

Mr. Strube's Comedy Overture did not sustain the reputation which Boston has given its composer as a creator. One naturally expects an experienced orchestral player, because of intimate associations, to develop novel instrumental effects in his writings. Such were not present in Mr. Strube's overture; his employment of the orchestra was, indeed, not especially skillful, and his thematic material was in no degree remarkable. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was effectively played and intensely enjoyed.

O. B. B.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

MELBA SINGS TOMORROW

She Will Be Soloist At The Boston Symphony Concert.

The initial concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric tomorrow evening. This season make the twenty-sixth in Baltimore, and nearly the entire seating capacity of the Lyric has been sold in advance. The soloist of tomorrow's concert is to be Madame Melba.

Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff's wonderful symphony in E minor for full orchestra, No. 2, Op. 27, will be given. Rachmaninoff was born in Novgorod April 1, 1873, and is now living in Dresden. He made his first appearance in the United States as a pianist, giving a recital at Smith College, Northampton, November 4, 1909. He played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the trip that began November 8, 1909. He has written several operas, among which are "Aleko," "The Miser Knight" and "Francesca da Rimini" all of which have been performed in Moscow and St. Petersburg.

The symphony which is to be given tomorrow evening was composed at Dresden and was played at Moscow at a concert of the Imperial Russian Music Society in the course of the season of 1908-1909. The composer conducted. It was performed in Berlin by the Philharmonic Orchestra November, 1909. The first performances in this country were by the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia, November 26 and 27, 1909, when Mr. Rachmaninoff conducted his work.

The symphony is dedicated to S. Taneieff.

The entire program is to be as follows:

Rachmaninoff.....
Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.
- I.—Largo-Allegro moderato.
- II.—Allegro molto.
- III.—Adagio.
- IV.—Allegro vivance.

Mozart.....
Recative, "How Susanna Delays," and Aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro."

Strube.....
Comedy Overture, "Puck." (First time in Baltimore.)

Thomas.....Mad scene from "Hamlet."

Beethoven.....

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Society

Last evening a large attendance of fashionable personages was seen at the Lyric to hear the Boston Symphony and Madame Melba.

Among those who enjoyed the concert were Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Cotten, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Gittings, Doctor and Mrs. Henry Wood, Judge and Mrs. Thomas Ireland Elliott, Mr. and Mrs. Allan McLane, Mr. George T. M. Gibson and the Misses Gibson, Mrs. Robert B. Morrison, Miss Sidney Morrison, Miss Kilpatrick; Miss Mary Randall, of Annapolis; Captain and Mrs. Frank P. Clark, Mr. and Mrs. W. Champlin Robinson, Mrs. Taggart Steele, Mrs. Yates Pennington, Mrs. W. T. Helm, Mrs. William Ewing, Mrs. John Phelps, Mrs. Robinson Boykin, Misses Kremelberg; Mrs. H. Clay Browning, of Washington; Doctor and Mrs. George R. Reuling, Mrs. J. Paul Baker, Miss Bessie K. Baker, Miss Margaret Griffiss, Miss Mary Graham Bowdoin, Mrs. Henry Bowdoin, Mrs. G. H. Martin, Dr. John Fiske; Mr. and Mrs. John Martin Cates, of Denver; Mr. William F. Lucas, Mr. Daniel E. Dorsey, Mr. J. Alan Haughton and Mr. A. S. A. Brady.

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Concert.

The first appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season is a magnet which will attract all music lovers to the Parsons Theater next Monday evening. Of the concert little need be said or written. Patrons of former years have experienced the pleasure of these occasions until the size of the audience is limited only by the size of the theater. The management will hold tickets reserved until Friday night only, in order that all patrons may be accommodated equally. Subscribers' season tickets should be called for before the day of the concert. Seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s, No. 201 Asylum street.

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT HERE ON WEDNESDAY

Boston Players Coming, With Melba As Soloist—Few Changes.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the year is scheduled for the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening. With Melba as the soloist—her only appearance this year in Baltimore—and with the largest subscription the Orchestra has ever had in this city, the Orchestra returns with comparatively few changes in its personnel, one of great moment being at the first desk of the first violins, where Anton Witek, for 16 years the concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, has taken the place of Willy Hess. Witek from all accounts is a very great violinist and very great musician, and seems bound to make a name for himself in this country equal to that which he had made in Germany.

Madame Melba will sing two numbers, the familiar "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." In the Mozart aria she will be able to exhibit her marvelous art in belcanto, as all of Mozart's music demands. Thomas' scene, strongly contrasted with it, enables her to display her entire repertoire of coloratura. The concert will begin with the Symphony in E Minor No. 2, by Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist, who was the soloist with the Boston Symphony here last season. This is the last of Rachmaninoff orchestral works, and by many it is regarded not only as the best, but the most important contribution of symphonic literature since Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic."

The other two orchestral numbers will be a light, brilliant and fascinating overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the very talented members of the Orchestra, and the "Egmont" overture by Beethoven. The program in the order in which it will be played is as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in E minor.....Rachmaninoff
Aria, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Comedy Overture, "Puck".....Strube
Mad Scene from "Hamlet".....Thomas
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Soloist—Madame Melba.

From STAR

Address

Date

Melba With First Symphony.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the year is scheduled for the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, November 9, with Melba as the soloist, and with the largest subscription the orchestra has ever had in this city. The orchestra returns with comparatively few changes in its personnel, but one of importance is at first desk of the first violin, where Anton Witek, for 16 years the concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, has taken the place of Willy Hess.

Madame Melba will sing two numbers, the familiar "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Mad Scene," from Thomas' "Hamlet." In the Mozart aria she will be able to exhibit her marvelous art in bel canto, as all of Mozart's music demands. Thomas' scene strongly contrasted with it enables her to display her entire repertoire of coloratura. The concert will begin with the symphony in E-Minor, No. 2, by Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist. This is by many regarded as the most important contribution of symphonic literature since Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." Rachmaninoff belongs to the so-called "conservative school." He is a modern, in that he is a master of instrumentation and understands the art of mixing the orchestral colors, but he is a conservative in that he clings to the classical forms and does not indulge in the vagaries of dissonances, which characterize so many of his contemporaries. In other words, he is more a follower of Tschaikowsky than of Richard Strauss.

The other two orchestral numbers will be a light, brilliant and fascinating overture, entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, and the "Egmont" overture by Beethoven. The program in the order in which it will be played is as follows:

[64]

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

WOMAN'S CHORUS WILL SING FIEDLER'S SONGS

First Rendition Of Works Tonight At Philharmonic Concert.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DIRECTOR IS AUTHOR

Splendidly Selected Program Feature Of Premiere Performance Of Compositions.

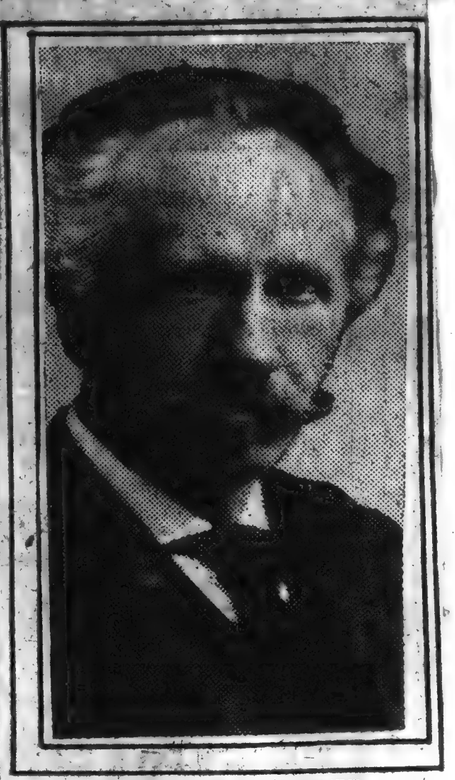
One of the principal features of the concert to be given by the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus in Lehmann's Hall tonight will be the premiere performance in this country of several compositions by Max Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Two of these, "Mainacht" and "Elfen," were written for women's voices, and will be sung by the entire chorus of 40 ladies, and the third, a soprano solo with cello obbligato, "In the Cloudy May Night," will be sung by Mrs. Henry Clay Browning of Washington. Mrs. Browning will also be heard in two other numbers—the beautiful romance, "Dost Thou Know That Sweet Land?" from Thomas' "Mignon," and Taubert's "Nightingale."

Alwin Schroeder, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the other soloist, and the ladies who constitute the chorus are congratulating themselves upon the assistance of so distinguished an artist. Mr. Schroeder is ranked with the greatest virtuosi of the cello, and his presence at any concert is considered in itself to lend particular prestige. Besides the obbligato to the Fiedler song, Mr. Schroeder will play six solos.

The choral part of the evening will consist for the most part of compositions which are new to Baltimore audiences, chief among which, in addition to the Fiedler works, are three songs by Brahms, scored with harp and English horn parts. The instruments will be played by the following members of the Boston Symphony: H. Schuecker, harpist, and A. Hachbarth and H. Lorber, horns. The fact that the Orchestra will appear in the Lyric on Wednesday night made it possible to draw upon its personnel. It plays in Washington this afternoon, and the men who have been engaged will come to Baltimore directly after the performance there.

Mr. Fiedler, who from the organization of the chorus last year has expressed his hearty interest in its affairs, in addition to giving the efforts it has thus far made his support and unqualified praise, is expected to be present tonight with Mrs. Fiedler. The opening number of the program will be the "Angel Trio," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," followed by a "Serenade" for chorus with alto solo, by Schubert; this part Mrs. Charles T. Crane of this city will sing. Joseph Pache, director of the Oratorio Society, and organizer of the chorus, will lead.

Mrs. Charles Morton, president of the organization, is sufficiently recovered from the bad fall on the street last week to be in her usual place. Mrs. Morton, who possesses a beautiful high soprano voice, is one of the best known and most popular society matrons in the city.



ALWYN SCHROEDER

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 9 - 1910.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 10 1910

Melba Sings

If a census of Baltimore music lovers had been taken at the Lyric last night it would have been seen that but few persons were missing, for the hall was taxed to its seating and standing capacity with an audience eager to welcome the return of Mr. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Judging by the hearty reception accorded to this admirable body of musicians as they appeared on the stage, and the enthusiasm at the conclusion of each number, the audience had been keenly anticipating the concert, and the musical offerings of the evening were thoroughly enjoyed.

The program was as follows:

Rachmaninoff.....
Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.
I. Largo.—Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Mozart—Recitative, "How Susana delays!" and Aria, "Flown forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Strube.....Comedy Overture, "Puck." (First time in Baltimore.)
Thomas.....Mad Scene from "Hamlet."
Beethoven.....
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.

Sergei Vassilievitch Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, appeared here last season as soloist with the Boston Orchestra, but last night saw the initial performance in Baltimore of his second symphony. The symphony shows the composer to be master of himself as well as of his material. His themes are strongly individual and tinged with the spirit of his nationality, but their musical handling is according to the classic strictures of symphonic form. The spontaneity of his thoughts, the coherence of his ideas, the logical development of a phrase to its strongest emotional climax, are some of the things which show him to be a most ingenious composer. The richness of his instrumentation, with its wealth of tone qualities having various shades and striking contrasts, indicates an endless palette, and proves Rachmaninoff to be an orchestral colorist of inexhaustible invention.

The first movement of the symphony, owing to its length, was rather tiresome. However, the allegro molto, which is a scherzo full of spirited rhythm, soon added greater interest to the work. Throughout this and the following movements the symphony rose in significance, reaching a telling climax at the close of the allegro vivace. The mood and atmosphere of the adagio, and the beauty of its melodies, gave special prominence to this movement. The vivace, containing clever handling of the various themes of the preceding movements, made an effective close to the entire work.

Mr. Fiedler gave an intelligent reading of the score, and the orchestra, especially the strings, did splendid work.

There was a spontaneous ovation given to Mme. Melba as she appeared on the stage. This enthusiastic greeting of the audience must have been very gratifying and inspiring to the singer. Her voice again displayed the same qualities which earned praise, success and fame for her in the past, namely: A youthful freshness of tone, smooth and full in bel-canto and having ease, lightness and vocal grace in coloratura. The Mozart aria "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," was exceedingly well sung. The simplicity of the melody was expressed with lyrical purity and beauty of tone, while the ornamental phrases therein were rendered with a perfect legato. The Mad Scene from "Hamlet," by Thomas, gave the singer an opportunity to display the dramatic powers of her voice, and her interpretation of this difficult number was characterized by brilliance of tone. The vocal agility and technical assurance of the singer in the coloratura passages of the aria were really remarkable. Mme. Melba's artistic presentations were both rewarded with tremendous applause, and she was recalled again and again in acknowledgment of the genuine appreciation of the audience.

Mr. Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra, contributed an interesting novelty to the program, namely, the comedy overture "Puck." This composition is quite sylvan in nature and the themes are merry and prankish. It is well written, and the orchestration shows expert knowledge of the different instruments employed. Mr. Fiedler entered into the spirit of the overture, giving a sparkling interpretation, and the members of the orchestra added their best efforts to help produce a successful rendition of their confrere's composition. The audience applauded enthusiastically. In recognition of their hearty approval Mr. Strube arose and gracefully bowed his thanks.

The program was ideal in its arrangement and selection of numbers, offering as it did a modern symphony of one of the foremost Russian writers of the day, two splendid arias, a novel overture and closing with the Beethoven masterpiece.

Though the commanding figure of the former concertmaster, Willy Hess, is missing, his successor, Anton Witek, shows himself to be well equipped and able to fill this exacting position with credit. F. C. B.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 8 - 1910

First Boston Symphony Concert.

The concert at the Parsons Theater next Monday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will serve to introduce to our musical public two artists of renown, Anton Witek, who succeeds Willy Hess as concertmeister, and Mme. Berta Morena, now one of the leading dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. Alwin Schroeder, with whom Hartford feels somewhat acquainted, after several seasons of Kneisel Quartet appearances, will also be recognized at his old desk among the 'cellists. With slight changes the orchestra is the same body of brilliant performers who gave patrons so much delight last winter, and, most important of all, Mr. Fiedler will conduct. The audience is certain to tax the capacity of the theater. Seats are on sale at Gallup's & Co. music store.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Mme. Berta Morena, accompanied by Caruso, Bonci, Slezak, Emma Destinn and other notable singers of the Metropolitan Opera company, landed in New York yesterday, on board the Kronprinzessin Cecile.

Mme. Morena will begin her season's work with an appearance at Parsons's theater in conjunction with the famous Boston orchestra next Monday evening. She will sing the role of "Elizabeth" in a performance of "Tannhauser" Wednesday and Brunhilde in "Walkure" Friday of the same week at the Metropolitan Opera house. Hartford seldom hears the leading opera singers, especially in the prime of voice and youthful beauty, both possessed by Mme. Morena in high degree.

The coming concert gives so much promise and the demand for reserved seats is so great, that seats cannot be held later than Friday night. Subscribers for season tickets are likewise urged to secure reservations before the day of the concert.

Reserved seats are on sale at Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The selection of a program to please the taste of all patrons of music has become a difficult task. To provide for the lover of the classics and for the admirer of the modern and more brilliant school, thus affording equal pleasure to all patrons, Mr. Fiedler has chosen Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," which takes rank with the immortal Fifth of Beethoven in point of popularity.

Richard Strauss, the musical giant of the present, will be represented by his tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form," performed first at Cologne in 1895, but new to our public. Modern music will be further exemplified in a Symphonic Poem by Sibelius, "Finlandia," composed before the loss of Finland's identity as a nation, but so national in sentiment that it has aroused great popular enthusiasm in the composer's native land.

With all, the concert of next Monday night at Parsons's theater will prove pleasurable in the highest degree. Seats at Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The first concert of the season by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Parsons Theater next Monday night. The present conductor of the orchestra, Max Fiedler, has for two seasons provided the Hartford public with remarkable entertainments. He has chosen well in program making and has presented the works in a manner captivating beyond description. A body of virtuoso performers in constant rehearsal has made it possible for Mr. Fiedler to obtain such satisfactory results, and for the audience to experience a high degree of pleasure. The concert at the Parsons Theater next Monday night, it is promised, will excel any previous effort of the orchestra in Hartford and a brilliant program will be offered. The soloist, Mme. Morena, takes rank among the great dramatic sopranos of the day, and will doubtless share with the orchestra, the plaudits of a great audience, already assured. Reserved seats are on sale at Gallup & Co.'s music store.

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date

THIS little screed is going to be written not only for the more than 5,000 men and women who attended the three symphony concerts given during the twenty-four hours ended on Sunday afternoon at about 5 o'clock, but also for those who didn't go—who never go to a symphony concert.

Certainly, it means a good deal when 5,000 persons in this town will see their pleasure in spending part of a Saturday or a Sunday afternoon in listening to this sort of music.

It means, for one thing, that there must be a good deal of pleasure in it.

Perhaps you who do not go to symphony concerts believe that there is a bit of pose among the 5,000; perhaps you think it is a bit the fashion to go, for instance, to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts; perhaps you think that it was Nellie Melba, the soloist at one of the concerts, and not the symphonic music that drew a crowd that packed Carnegie Hall to balcony standing room.

Granted.

There is, here and there, something of pose and much babbling of serious nonsense about the music that has been heard.

Fashion and fad, here and there, also may be observed beneath the surface of motive.

And the attraction of the opera singer, even at the symphony concert, is a many-volted electro magnet, possessing indubitable power for drawing the crowd.

But all this explains away only a small fraction of the 5,000.

Why is it that YOU never go to a symphony concert?

Perhaps you just never tried it, for

JEANNE JOMELI.

no certain, valid or tangible reason.

Perhaps you have heard much of the terrors of "heavy" music.

Perhaps there are other more or less peculiar "perhapses."

But don't believe that music is dispensed by weight.

And surely you wouldn't forego the possibility of acquiring a source of intense and lasting pleasure merely through the lack of courage to try it, to test it.

Why, a friend of the writer, who acknowledges that he can't even whistle correctly throughout the tune of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," heard Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and remained intensely interested by virtue of the sheer force of its melodic expression.

You like melody, do you not?

Well, there is a plenitude of melody in the usual symphony concert—enough to arouse your attention and your interest; after that much has become accomplished within you you cannot fail to want to learn more of what you have heard and to want to hear more of the same thing.

This week there are symphony concerts of the Philharmonic Orchestra on Tuesday evening and Friday afternoon, another concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra next Sunday afternoon, and one of the Russian Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening.

The musical fare that was provided for the 5,000 concertgoers on Saturday and Sunday afternoons was of the calibre that you may expect any time—the best music of both quite modern and older composers.

The Boston Orchestra gave Brahms and Schumann, and Mme. Melba sang something of Mozart and Ambroise Thomas. It was achievement of the highest kind.

The Philharmonic gave Tschaikowsky and Berlioz and Liszt, and its performance was stamped with the dominant individuality of the orchestra's conductor, Gustav Mahler—an individuality that is a potent force in music to-day.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under the discriminating abilities of Walter Damrosch, gave a delightful afternoon of Gluck and Mozart.

om EVE. POST.

dress New York City.

te

Melba and the Boston Orchestra.

A special attraction at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon was the appearance of Madame Melba; an overflowing audience was the inevitable consequence. She sang the "Dove sono" aria from Mozart's "Figaro" and the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet." She was in gorgeous voice, and sang with much more feeling than of yore, but, oh the other hand, her colorature seemed to have lost some of its bird-like brilliancy. As one hearer tersely put it, "Her voice is better, but her ornaments not so good as formerly." As colorature singing is not as high an art as emotional singing, Madame Melba may be said to be, on the whole, a greater artist than ever. Her singing of the mad scene, especially, was more noteworthy than formerly, from the emotional standpoint—it recalled Calvé's wonderful management of the colorature, in making it the vehicle of emotion.

The orchestral numbers were the "Manfred" overture, one of Schumann's most characteristic works, and better orchestrated than was his wont—and played in a masterly manner; the Brahms Symphony No. 3; a new overture by Gustav Strube, entitled "Puck," and Sibelius's now well-known "Finlandia" tone poem.

Mr. Strube's overture is playful, pleasing, and well worked out musically, the orchestration full of variety, but without much originality. The mutes on the brass instruments are worked so hard nowadays that they often fail of their proper effect. The Boston composer, who is a member of this orchestra, was called out several times to bow his acknowledgments to the audience.

The performance of the Brahms symphony was fully in accord with its contents, austere and unemotional. The middle movements do possess a certain charm—what a pity we cannot have those two by themselves once in a while, without having to listen to the interminable first and fourth movements! To make matters worse, Mr. Fiedler made the repeat of the exposition of the first movement, a custom more honored in the breach than the observance, as Hans von Bülow once remarked, or words to that effect.

NELLIE MELBA.

om EVE. WORLD

m

ress

e

"FINLANDIA" STIRS BROOKLYN AUDIENCE

By HARRY CHAPIN PLUMMER.

For the success of the opening season concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, presented in the New Academy of Music in that boro, last night, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the conductor of the visiting organization, Max Fielder, depended not upon a "sensation" to be created by the extraordinary mannerisms and unusual attire of a popularly idolized prima donna, but upon the artistic strength of a program of both quality and quantity, which found indorsement in the plaudits of an audience that well nigh crowded the handsome auditorium. Incidentally, a soprano soloist very well known to the metropolitan public, Mme. James Jomelli, achieved a decided triumph by the exercise of the first principles of her art, simplicity and truth, in the presentation of two examples of modern French lyric composition. And quite without recourse to the theatrical as figured in Miss Geraldine Farrar's appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Manhattan concert in Carnegie Music Hall Thursday night.

To conclude a lengthy but highly edifying program, Director Fielder chose the symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, which, to quote Phillip Hale, "records the impression of an exile's return home after a long absence." Needless to say, the work, which has attained to great popularity in this country since its introduction five years ago, was given as fit a performance as might be desired. And needless, also, to say, the stirring tonal depiction of the inherent protest of the Finland patriot against alien persecution awakened a quick responsive echo in the hearts and minds of the Brooklyn concert-goers who heard it. In few latter day symphonic studies which it has undertaken to present, has the Boston orchestra attained to such brilliancy of expression as was realized in the performance of the Sibelius poem; there were contrasts, masterfully effected; mood, Faithfully suggested; temperament, the temperment of a nation, of a race, skillfully defined. The plaint of that despairing patriot, promptly drowned in the frenzied allegro of—not joy, but delirium—will ring in my ears and recur in my memory for a long time to come.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture (opus 115), Brahms' Third symphony in F major (opus 90), and the Strauss tone-poem, "Don Juan" (opus 20), were the other symphonic offerings of the evening. In each the unified expression and finished delivery of the foremost American band were again and again demonstrated.

Mme. Jomelli was heard in two soli—the "Hymn to Pallas Athene," by Saint-Saens, and Azael's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son." Widely different as are these lyrics, the soprano contrived so to render them that they impressed deeply and convincingly the large audience. Pleasing and interesting was the Debussy aria and its accompaniment, but it would be difficult to conceive of anything more complete in true art suggestion than the amazingly vivid illustration conveyed in the stanzas of the Saint-Saens invocation:

"Nos vierges ont charme pareil
Aux vierges des Parathenees,"

—and the brilliant orchestral support thereof.

m idress New York City.

ate

188

Melba Returns and Sings With Boston Orchestra

Charms a Record-Breaking Audience at Carnegie Hall—Mr. Fiedler and His Men Excel Themselves.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

NELLIE MELBA came back to us on Saturday at Carnegie Hall as soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee of the season. If ever there were a doubt of the place she holds in the esteem of the music-going public the size of the audience would have dissipated it. All records were broken. Every seat was taken and the standees, crowding every inch of space at the back of the auditorium, were permitted to spread themselves down the side aisles to the very foot of the stage. She was warmly greeted when she appeared, her figure trim and youthful looking, but her face kept in shadow by a big hat. What a pity she did not follow the examples set recently by Louise Homer and Marcella Sembrich and let us see her hatless.

Mme. Melba's first aria, the "Dove Sona" from "The Marriage of Figaro," was a bit disappointing. Something was lacking both of the illusive Mozart manner and of the voice coloring that the Australian prima donna has taught us to expect. But, later, in the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," all the lusciousness and brilliancy of her remarkable voice were disclosed. Not, at least, in recent years has she sung with such power and skill and effectiveness. Small wonder that she was recalled half a dozen times. Nevertheless one may protest without being called churlish against the inclusion of any singer in a symphony programme by an orchestra of such excellence.

It is rarely given to hear such playing as the Boston Orchestra furnishes. The beautiful third symphony of Brahms's, Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred" and Sibelius's symphony poem, "Finlandia," which were on Saturday afternoon's programme, were superlatively well done. Never, the writer believes, in the history of this remarkable band of musicians was anything finer. Max Fiedler, the conductor, takes his place rightfully with the most illustrious of his predecessors. And it is for the exploitation of such things that the orchestra was formed and is supported. There would not have been the great overflow if Melba's name had not been advertised, but the subscription would have filled the house. The same is true of Thursday night's concert, when Geraldine Farrar was the soloist. These artists we may hear in opera or in their individual recitals and be delighted to hear them, but everything at the proper time and in the proper place.

A separate word for Strube's comedy overture, "Puck," which was played on Saturday for the first time in New York. Mr. Strube is one of the first violins of the orchestra. The work is a fine concert, dainty, humorous and richly orchestrated. No need to cavil because it contains reminiscences of Richard Strauss and Charpentier. It is a pleasure to hear it.

Anton Witek, the new concert master, has made an excellent impression at these two concerts, and it is good that Alwyn Schroeder again heads the 'cellists, although we did give him such a loving farewell a few seasons ago when he returned to Germany to spend the rest of his life.

[66]

MORN. TELEGRAPH

s New York City.

NOV 11 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Bach's Brandenburg Concerto Nobly Played by Celebrated Orchestra, With Max Fiedler Conducting.

GERALDINE FARRAR AS SOLOIST

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The two most pretentious elements of the programme given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall were M. Rachmaninoff and Miss Geraldine Farrar. We studied both those superstructures earnestly, and prayerfully, because they are typical of modern movements in music, because they are of our age. Yet we must shake our heads and admit freely that our hearts went out fully to Mr. Bach and Mr. Beethoven, who occupied modest places on the programme beneath Mr. Rachmaninoff and Miss Farrar.

Mr. Max Fiedler and his band of truly incomparable musicians played Mr. Rachmininoff as probably he has never been played before, so the young Russian composer can never advance the plea that he has been misinterpreted. His symphony was indeed very, very long. It is a rule of modern symphonies that they should be long. The old masters could say more in a much less space of time. Pernaps—and we only hesitate this as an explanation—the reason of their comparative conciseness is that they were masters.

Tried for Poetry.

Mr. Rachmaninoff then is prolix, but prolix in what? In concentrated musical idea? In passages that reach the spirit and remind us that music is a thing of the soul? Not at all. He is prolix in a sort of magnificent and varied rhetoric, a dazzling and often extravagant color, in a kind of picturesqueness trying hard to be poetry. He reminds one of nothing so much as St. Mark's Cathedral at Venice—that supreme type of architectural failure.

Shortly after him came Miss Geraldine Farrar. She was not dressed. She was caparisoned. She was a field of cloth of gold. Her hair was bound about with a vast glitter. The seven musicians, the Brahmsites in the audience, the intellectualists, applauded frantically. Suddenly all became aware the gold dress was attached to a voice which began to sing in open tones that needed the stern revision of a singing teacher, an air by Isouard, who scarcely deserved the affecting ceremony resurrection.

Miss Farrar Recalled.

Later in the concert Miss Farrar redeemed herself from the paltry impression that this performance left upon her hearers by a version of the aria, "Aura che interno" of Mozart's, that was at once fluent, sweetly voiced and musicianly. She was recalled many times, and subsequently departed in peace and put the golden dress in the safe.

Then the real enjoyment of the evening began with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto.

Its sincerity, its honesty, its genuine freedom, its noble simplicity after much of that which had gone before, seemed like the Alps after the exotic atmosphere of the hot house. It was the success of the evening. Well might it be! It was splendidly given forth.

The concert closed with Beethoven's Egmont Overture, again an example of real splendor in orchestral diction.

Bach and Beethoven, with all your faults, we love ye still! We cannot help it.

From MORN. TELEGRAPH

Address New York City.

Date NOV 14 1910

Madame Nellie Melba's singing at the Boston Symphony concert on Friday re-established the truth of that which the writer of these lines has always contended, namely that she is the first singer of the age.

She is the first singer of the age in spite of the fact that she has not been made the grateful and reciprocating object of an artificial and disingenuous boom, and that her position in the opera has not been maintained by incessant personal intrigue and never-ending gnawing and rat-work. She is not a local celebrity. Wherever she has gone there was an opera. She herself constituted one. Where the Douglas was there was the head of the table. She possesses certain claims upon our attentive admiration.

She possesses a voice of silvery and virginal beauty, a ripe and inclusive scholarship and an unlimited knowledge of vocal resource and device. Nor does she date from the Eocene period.

From EVE. MAIL — AMERICAN

Address New York City. — New York City.

NOV 1 1 1910

BRILLIANT OPENING FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Twenty-Fifth Season Here Begun with a Fine Performance of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony—Geraldine Farrar the Soloist—Francis Rogers's Recital.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

With last night's concert the Boston Symphony orchestra entered its twenty-fifth season in New York, where it has always been regarded as the standard of all that was great and finished in orchestral playing. New York audiences have watched it grow as have the Bostonians, nor have we lavished less enthusiasm and appreciation upon it than has the city which proudly may claim it.

There was a round of applause for Anton Witek, the new concert master, and there was a hearty greeting for Max Fiedler, who never deserved it more than last night. There was another in the orchestra that awakened delight among the old-time subscribers, but he crept so quietly to his post that there was no chance to make this pleasure manifest. This was Alwin Schroeder, the great 'cellist, who left this organization to remain with the Kneisel quartet when it withdrew for the purpose of giving chamber music concerts only.

He is again in the first 'cellist's chair, and the orchestra is the bigger for his connection therewith. The soloist was Geraldine Farrar, who elicited a storm of applause upon her appearance.

The programme would have been all sufficient had there only been the Rachmaninoff Second symphony with which it opened, and which lasted one hour exactly. Philip Hale in his highly interesting descriptive notes was in error concerning the history of this symphony, which he states was produced for the first time in America last season under direction of the composer.

The fact is that Modest Altschuler gave the Rachmaninoff symphony two seasons ago when it had been but three weeks out of the publisher's hands. At that time the work occupied much more than an hour, due as Mr. Altschuler states to Rachmaninoff's altered viewpoint of his own composition. It is true that last night it seemed much brighter and more brilliant than when it was heard two years ago, and this bears out the statement of the conductor of the Russian Symphony orchestra that when Rachmaninoff was here he spent many evenings with him in study of this score, and the interpretation he indicated was so different from the original markings that Mr. Altschuler asked his reasons for the radical changes.

Rachmaninoff replied that the work as it now appeared to him took on renewed life and color through a more brilliant interpretation. As presented last night the symphony took its place beside the most brilliant, the most effective and the most sincere works of great importance that the orchestra has presented in years.

With a mastery of technic in the treatment of each instrument that is nothing short of dazzling, and contrasts as legitimate as they are sweeping, Rachmaninoff proved himself undeniably a heroic figure among the very few composers who have created standards to-day. His logic is perhaps as admirable as his wonderful imagination, his color and his thematic invention are unique and appealing, and he seems to be past-master of the smallest possibility of each instrument.

One uses the term "perfection" guardedly, yet it would seem as though this word only could describe the height attained by the orchestra, which for tone, virtuosity and finish seemed greater last night than ever—in fact, seemed to go beyond what might be expected of an orchestra. Mr. Fiedler never showed greater mastery and greater powers in all directions.

One must always question the right of a singer on a symphony programme. In the first place few singers fit, and if they do their selections usually do not. Miss Farrar is not of the heroic mold to fit into a position like the one in which she was placed last night, and while she may always be sure of appreciation and her hearers of pleasure, it is not the sort which is consistent with the ideals of an organization like the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Her second song, an old Mozart recitative and air was much more in place and enjoyable than the first air from an old operetta by Isouard, however charmingly they may have been sung. Mr. Fiedler also included the Brandenburg concerto by Bach, and although he used two harpsichords, he did not reduce the orchestra sufficiently to allow the instruments to be heard distinctly throughout.

* * *

n Daily Times,

ess Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 12 1910

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Twenty-third Brooklyn Season With Fine Concert.

A departure from the custom in programme making for its first appearance of the season marked the introductory concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-third season in Brooklyn at the Academy last night. There was unusual musical diversity, and there was a soloist. For some seasons the opening concert has been made exclusively orchestral, and the Boston organization has done much to encourage the idea that an orchestra may be thoroughly worth while for itself alone, on occasion, independent of solo assistance; and the modern sense of good taste supports this view, without, however, any prejudice to solo artists. For the present season at least the management seems disposed to make concessions to the long-established popular notion that the lack of a soloist is a drawback, and has decided to provide them for the series of concerts opened last night.

That a singer can fit nicely into an orchestral concert scheme and add much to the pleasure of the occasion was evidenced by the presence of Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, the soprano, who was heard in two solo numbers—an unusual thing for such a concert; and the luscious beauty of her voice and finished art of interpretation were a genuine delight. Her first solo was a novelty, a number from Saint-Saens' "Pallas Athene," written for a local French festival in 1894. This solo is of a serious musical value. A more favorable opportunity for the singer was in the rendering of Azael's recitative and aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

Not often does a programme for one of these concerts include, besides two vocal solos, a symphony and three other orchestral pieces as it did last night. This is possible because the symphony was not very long. It was Brahms' No. 3 in F, and in the interest of its musical thought as well as in craftsmanship does much to justify his reputation. Another hearing of Strauss' "Don Juan" tone-poem also was given, and a less known symphonic poem by Sibelius, "Finland," into which the composer has put effectively good workmanship as well as patriotic sentiment.

There could be no doubt of the very favorable impression of the concert upon a crowded house. Mr. Fiedler conducted with the executive authority that has won the confidence of the public, and his men responded with a beautifully balanced tone volume. The series has made a good start for the season with the largest subscription in the history of the orchestra's appearance in Brooklyn.

1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Miss Farrar Dazzles Audience as Soloist with Visiting Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the 1910-1911 season at Carnegie Hall last night. This is the fourth of the great orchestral organizations which annually add their harmonies to what is known as the "music season" of New York. There are still two others to fall into line—the Volpe Symphony and the Russian, making a total of six large orchestras, each of which arranges a dozen or more concerts during the Winter. From which may be gathered some idea of the tremendous importance to which orchestral music has arrived in the annals and entertainment of this city.

Following their custom the Boston orchestra did not rely solely upon their instrumental work, but introduced a soloist. Last night it was Miss Geraldine Farrar, who then made her first New York appearance since she uttered her historical valuation of dukes as matrimonial adventurers.

Mr. Fiedler followed the precedent of Mr. Mahler, of the Philharmonic, and arranged a programme of such length that the audience had fully thirty minutes more music than usual.

The concert opened with Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, and although the work has had no previous performance here its rendition last night brought forth unsuspected beauty both in the composition and in its reading. It is full of extremes, the heavy, groaning of the basses suddenly giving way to the essence of buoyancy and light-heartedness played by violins and the smaller wind choirs. The musicians were compelled to rise twice and acknowledge the enthusiastic appreciation.

When Miss Farrar appeared the audience forgot its dignity and gasped. She might have just arrived from singing Amneris in Aida. Her costume was extremely oriental—cloth of gold and cloth of silver and gilt spangles and metal fringes, all topped by a head-dress that might have been worn by Cleopatra.

She sang two charming numbers, one an excerpt from Isouard's opera, "Jeannot et Colin," and the other a recitative and air, "Aura, che Intorno," by Mozart. Her voice was, as usual, sweet, true and of remarkable power and flexibility.

For the second time during the evening a Mahler example was followed. This was the introduction of the harpsichord in the Bach number. Mr. Fiedler, however, had a real and not an improvised, instrument. After the Concerto in G major (of the Brandenburg set) was finished some one in the audience was heard to say, "The accompaniment was delightfully played, but where was the harpsichord?"

TRIBUNE

ss New York City.

1910

MUSIC

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A fine whiff of fresh, invigorating air went out from the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, such a whiff as seemed necessary to the health of our musical season, young as it is. The voice of the orchestra was stimulating and refreshing in its euphony and peculiarly gracious because it was ear filling and not ear splitting, stimulating and not nerve racking. There was a special delight to the many in an audience phenomenal in numbers, in the singing of Mme. Melba, but a greater to the organization's normal clientele in the soundly and sweetly eloquent performances given to Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Brahms's symphony in F under the direction of Mr. Fiedler, who is content to let great geniuses speak their own tongue without sophistication. How much his reverential attitude is appreciated the audience testified by its attention and its applause. Mme. Melba was naturally the focus of a special interest. An artist of her marvellous gifts and attainments ought to be. She sang "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," with a voice which was beautiful, yes, thrice beautiful, though with little appreciation of the classic style which the music calls for, and the mad scene from "Hamlet" with the same beauty of tone and much more effectiveness because it called for less distinction or classicism in delivery. Neither of the airs was dramatically colored, a lack for which the concert room may crave pardon, but both disclosed a lovely opulence of tone which was in the highest degree ravishing. Of the two orchestral numbers of the programme which have not been mentioned one was a novelty—a comedy overture entitled "Puck," by Gustave Strube, the other Sibelius's "Finlandia." Mr. Strube is a member of the orchestra, and was called to the front several times to acknowledge the enthusiastic plaudits which his work evoked. It is a fine composition, more than ingenious in orchestration, consistent and unconstrained idea, characteristic, expressive and charming.

H. E. K.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date NOV 1 3 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mme. Melba Appears as the Soloist to an Enormous Audience.

The very large audience at the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was probably not drawn to Carnegie Hall yesterday entirely by love of orchestral music. The occasion was the reappearance as soloist of Mme. Melba, after an absence of some two years. The opportunities to hear her in concert are rare nowadays, in opera non-existent, apparently, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra we have with us ten times a year. So it can scarcely be a matter of surprise that to many people the concert had an unusual potency of attraction. And yet it might properly be maintained that the appearance of no soloist can add distinction to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance under Mr. Fiedler of well-known works, as Schumann's overture to "Manfred" and Brahms's third symphony in F, had many superlatively fine qualities. It is always a renewed delight to hear the marvelously fine tone of this orchestra, the beauty and richness of its several choirs in themselves, and the perfection of their blending. Mr. Fiedler elaborates his performances with painstaking care, and there is no doubt that they exactly reflect the conception of them he has formed in his mind. There is sometimes question as to the validity of this conception, especially as to some of his tempi. There are phrases in his reading of the "Manfred" overture that seem to be treated with some violence, and there is a dissection of the structure of the first movement of Brahms's symphony that is too obvious and that detracts from the splendidly passionate flow of the music. The Boston Orchestra has played the work here with a freer and more convincing utterance. Yet this performance had many beauties, and it gave the audience much pleasure.

Mr. Fiedler played a new work by Mr. Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, who has composed much and has had a number of his compositions played here by the organization. This is a "comedy overture," entitled "Puck." There is no more definite statement than the title of any programme in the composer's mind; and this title is enough to explain the character of the music, which is mirthful, frolicsome, in its spirit. There is brilliancy in the orchestration, and large demands are made upon the orchestra's dexterity and lightness of hand. It cannot be said that Mr. Strube's thematic material has of itself great distinction or great charm; but he has shown much skill in his use of it and in making it count for the utmost. The composition scintillates, and it pleased the audience greatly, who applauded Mr. Strube in his post among the first violins, and then at the front of the platform. Another piece not new to New York, but probably not known to many of the audience, was Sibelius's "Finland," a vigorously written and effective work.

Mme. Melba comes again still in the plenitude of her voice, which has not perceptibly lost any of its most beautiful quality, its lusciousness, its spontaneity of utterance. In its uppermost notes it may not be produced with quite the freedom of past years, but her singing is as it always was, a marvel of purity and finish. The recitative and air "Dove sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," is a model of legato singing such as is becoming more and more of a rarity. Her second number was the long recitative and air known as the "Mad Scene" of Ophelia from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," and in this she sang with splendid brilliancy and élan. The flowery passages were delivered with a perfection almost, if not quite, such as is remembered from Mme. Melba's days at the opera. This achievement made a deeper impression upon the audience than the other and was rapturously applauded. The singer was many times recalled to acknowledge her acclamation.

EVE. SUN

s New York City.

1910

NELLY MELBA.
Star of First Boston Symphony Matinee Here.

[67]

From MORN. TELEGRAPH

Address New York City.

Date NOV 12 1910

MASKS, FACES AND FARRARIZATION

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are always a study. There are but twelve of them in New York in all the year. Would that there were many more. Mr. Higginson's foundation has achieved perfection. Even those avaricious of the highest standards cannot ask for more than that. Other characteristics of this series of concerts is the seriousness and the stateliness of their audiences. Now audiences have physiognomies. Audiences have attitudes, and the attitude and the physiognomy of Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences differ from those of all other. The Boston Symphony auditor is not sophisticated. Nor on the other hand is he Chautauquan.

The explanation is not far to seek. All the New Englanders in New York are there. Your New Englander is a distinctive and a distinguishing creature. His music is to him a study. If he uses an opera glass it is not to look at a hat in a box, but to look at the first oboe player and judge his intellectual and artistic girth. We have known these audiences to refuse to look even at Andrew Carnegie.

There are no concerts so singularly devoid of parade in the audience or of humbug on the stage. There is nothing in a word so far removed from opera and its musical lying and insincerity. The faces of the critics are also a matter for remark. Their look is one both of pleasure and of pain, like that on the faces of the Merry Andrews of our youth, who used to portray laughter on one side of their face and tearful suffering on the other.

The critics are glad because they are enjoying the music and sad because they can't find any fault with it. As you approach Carnegie Hall on your way to one of these concerts you are handed a neatly printed volume in buff covers. This volume contains sometimes as many as eighty pages. Consultation of the book reveals that it is by Philip Hale, who is an encyclopedia in trousers. It is a complete guide to the concert. It is also very useful as a means of distracting your attention, or indeed of anesthetizing you during a prolonged operation by the Rackman, or the surgical Scriabine, or other of the prevailing school of Cossack and Siege of Sebastopol composers.

Furthermore it is a well written, richly informed piece of musical scholarship, invaluable as a record, invaluable as an explanation, a history and a discription of the music to be played.

The range of subjects that it treats is almost Himalayan. And still the wonder grows, how one small head can carry all that Philip knows.

The programme of Thursday's and today's concert contains, for instance, references to Francesca da Rimini, Market Day at Melrose, Mass.; Mrs. Hall McAllister's morning musicale, Voltaire, the sister of Frederic the Great, the Duke of Alva, Byron, Potesch (!) Edwin Booth, Hudibras, the Anatomy of Melancholy, Shakespeare, Sarmatia, a man called by Mozart Ochelly, at whose nationality you are permitted three guesses, and Howard Malcolm Ticknor. A mighty maze, but not without a plan.

And in this heavy fire of multitudious knowledge and cross references, we found one fearful error; more than that, a giddy old solecism. Philip Hale—even he writes: Nellie Melba, born Helen Porter Armstrong," as if she had been born with her baptismal names.

Such an error in such a one!

We weep.

Let that pass. Enough has been said, we think, to convey to our readers the serene and almost scholastic bearing of these symphony audiences. One carries away from Carnegie Hall, or Boston, the memory of well-bred women, and men of high understanding, gathered together for a well-defined artistic purpose, for the cultivation of good music. They are not there to educate themselves. They are already educated.

It was into this Athenian—we had almost said Areopagite—atmosphere that of all people on earth Miss Geraldine Farrar was injected, or rather hurtled, on Thursday night. Never will it be forgotten. A painter should have been there to paint a series of pictures, as Hogarth did. One might be "Geraldine Farrar on the Areopagus;" another, "Geraldine Farrar Felicitating Fiedler;" another, "Geraldine Farrar Romanticizing a Classical Concert;" another, "Geraldine Farrar Annihilating Academicism," and so on, and finally "Repentance of Geraldine Farrar."

In the first place, Miss Farrar disturbed all Boston Symphonic concert etiquette by coming on the stage unaccompanied by the conductor. She desired to be original, and alone she did it. She made an entrance. The entrance was all gold, and—Geraldine; nor was it in the spirit of Beethoven and of Bach. It was in the spirit of Spontini. As she was going to sing she wore no gloves. Gloves impede the action of the vocal chords. The dress, however, was sublime, tremendous, volcanic. What could the plaintive notes of Mozart avail against such competition? No! We are not hinting that it was loud. It was just a good, strong murmur, like Niagara in the distance.

The Athenian audience was slightly surprised. They had come to a concert and not to "Aida" or "The Queen of Sheba," for it was the spectacular acts of those operas that Miss Farrar closely resembled.

Hitherto it was the incomparable orchestra that had been starred. Now it was Miss Farrar.

Did she mind—she, the handsome, spoiled, overindulged young iconoclast? Never a bit. As she entered her carriage she was noticed clasping a piece of paper containing several pieces of broken material.

The keen eye of an observer saw that they were bits of another tradition shattered by the operatic Reign of Terror.

But even she will not turn it into the "Farrar Symphony Orchestra. Soloist, Miss Boston." For a critical, analytic, accustomed and well-versed audience showed far more enthusiasm in a Bach that was not quite so decollete.

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

NOV 11 1910

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Miss Farrar and the Boston Orchestra

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-fifth season in New York, given last night in Carnegie Hall, afforded one more illustration of the fact that a first-class body of players, with a great conductor, can perform a mediocre composition in such a brilliant manner that most of the hearers, dazed by the tonal splendors, lose their faculty of discrimination, and attribute to the composer merits which belong principally to the orchestra. A preacher or political orator who has mastered the elocutionary art will make more impression on the masses, though he has little to say that is worth hearing, than a less expert speaker who has many interesting things to relate.

The application of these remarks is to Rachmaninoff's second symphony. This composition was played here last season, during the visit of its composer, and made little impression. Last night it was so vigorously applauded that had its author been present he might have easily persuaded himself that he had created a masterwork. But he hasn't. Three-fourths of that applause may be safely credited to Mr. Fiedler and his men. There are interesting spots in this overlong symphony—it lasts an hour and five minutes—but only spots. Mr. Rachmaninoff had material enough for one good movement, but he had set out to write a symphony, so, of course, his pen had to be forced, willy-nilly, to write four movements in accordance with all the antiquated, artificial, and ridiculous symphonic rules for slowly torturing a musical idea to death. A symphony is an orchestral sonata, and some good friend of this gifted Russian—who has written some admirable preludes and other pieces—ought to call his attention to the dangers of the sonata form. Ernest Newman has written on them amusingly in his little book on Richard Strauss, published by the John Lane Company. He ends his remarks with this witty sentence which every young composer in every country ought to paste in his hat:

And when one sees how many capable and promising musicians have been stunted in their growth by this system of Chinese compression, one wishes that somebody would write an exhaustive book on "Sonata Form, its Cause and Cure," and present a copy to every student who is in danger of catching the disease.

Besides this Russian symphony, the orchestra played the third of Bach's Brandenburg concertos and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The Bach concerto disproved the notion which seems to be held by some conductors that in order to show off their orchestras they must play Strauss or Reger. Bach died in 1750, yet this concerto made one realize that he calls for as great orchestral skill as any of the modern writers. It was played with superb virtuosity and virility, and Mr. Fiedler made it clear that Mahler is not the only conductor who knows how to win demonstrative applause for Bach.

There was also demonstrative applause, as a matter of course, for Geraldine Farrar, who, returning from European triumphs, made her first appearance of the season in this city. Arrayed in a wondrous gown, she looked in perfect health, and this improvement was shown also in her voice, which never had seemed so spontaneous and under such perfect control. Lilli Lehmann, at Salzburg, last summer, and in Berlin was delighted with the progress made by her pupil, especially in the art of singing Mozart, which is much more difficult than the art of singing Puccini. Miss Farrar sang last night a Mozart air for tenor, "Aura, che intorno," preceded by a recitative, "Misero! o sogno," edited for her concert performance by Dr. Karl Muck; and it was a delight to hear those pure, limpid tones, the smooth, legato style, and to note how the dramatic impulses of this American soprano enable her to make even a concert recitative impressive by coloring and accenting the music in agreement with the lines of the text. In such music, as in a string quartet, every slight flaw stands out conspicuously. There were but a few such flaws in the Mozart air, and none at all in her singing of another antique number, "Ah! pour moi quelle peine extrême," from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin" (1814). This opera, Philip Hale states, has been revived in Paris at least twenty times, and certainly this air was worth bringing forward. Miss Farrar was recalled four times after singing it, but the rules of the organization forbade a repetition. It is needless to say that Carnegie Hall was crowded. Crowded it will also be to-morrow afternoon, when Mme. Melba will be the soloist. Mr. Ellis knows not only how to manage an orchestra, but also how to select the singers the public most desires to hear.

EVE. TELEGRAM

ess New York City.

11 1910

ONE of the most distinguished musical audiences of the year greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at its first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall, giving an especially enthusiastic greeting to Mr. Max Fiedler, the conductor, and to Mr. A. Witek, the new concert master.

At the conclusion of the Rachmaninoff Symphony in E minor, which opened the programme, a veritable ovation was given to the players and the conductor. Although the work has been heard here before, its beauties had not been revealed until the big band from Boston, playing with power, unanimity and variety such as is shown by no other orchestral body in this country, gave to this Titanic work its adequate interpretation.

GERALDINE FARRAR.

The remaining numbers on the programe were the famous overture to Egmont played admirably, and Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, in which Mr. Fiedler introduced two harpsichords played in unison, where the composer in the days of more limited instrumentation found one adequate. The quaint tinkling music of the two old instruments sounded, when it could be heard, like rain on a tin roof.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, plump as a partridge, and gowned "like Solomon in all his glory," sang two delightful old operatic arias, one by Isouard and the other by Mozart.

HERALD

New York City.

Miss Farrar, Gloveless, Is Soloist

She Sets New Fashion as She Sings with the Boston Orchestra.

With Carnegie Hall's big auditorium crowded to its utmost the first series of Boston Symphony concerts began last night. Miss Geraldine Farrar was the soloist, and although she is well known and much admired by frequenters of the Metropolitan Opera House she made new friends.

Her appearance was very attractive. At first glance it seemed as though she were attired for the second act of "Tosca." Whatever the period of the costume, it was striking. And what caused surprised comment was that she wore no gloves. The women in the audience took it to mean that no gloves is the latest concert stage fashion.

She sang two arias, one from Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin" and the other a Mozart aria, "Misero, O Segno!" Her voice rang full and clear and the close of each song was marked by instant applause. Again and again she was called out and had to bow her thanks.

The orchestral part of the programme, conducted by Mr. Max Fiedler, consisted of Mr. Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Bach's Third Brandenberg Concerto. Two harpsichords were used in the latter, but the volume of the orchestra quite drowned them out. The full beauty of tone of the famous orchestra was displayed in the symphony, which was wonderfully played. The Beethoven overture received a dramatic interpretation.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

Daily Citizen,

rom Brooklyn, N. Y

ddress NOV 10 1910

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season comes to-morrow evening in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who has already won notable favor in Brooklyn by her fine voice and her finished art. Her first number will be a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens. It was written fifteen years ago for one of the outdoor festivals which are held from time to time in the old Roman theatres in the south of France.

Her second number will be Azael's aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Debussy wrote the lyric scene of "The Prodigal Son" in 1884, and with it won the Grand Prix de Rome. The text is by Edouard Guinand and Debussy's setting was sung by Madame Rosa Caron, Ernest Van Dyck and Taskin, and Debussy received twenty-two votes out of the twenty-eight.

The principal orchestral works will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms' F-Major Symphony No. 3, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

EVE. MAIL

ess New York City.

The Boston Symphony season opens to-night at Carnegie hall with Geraldine Farrar as soloist, and the principal orchestral number will be the second symphony by Rachmaninoff.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

STANDARD UNION,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

ess NOV 10 1910

George Whitefield Chadwick, director of the New England Conservatory of Music, who is writing the music to be used in connection with "Everywoman," is the best known American symphonic composer. He has several times led the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra in the rendition of his own works.

rom PRESS

Address New York City.

Date NOV 11 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY WARMLY GREETED AT FIRST CONCERT

Orchestra Gives Fine Programme in Carnegie Hall.

GERALDINE FARRAR SOLOIST

Large Audience Also Welcomes Popular Artiste—Melba Will Sing at Matinee To-morrow.

So delighted were New York music lovers last night to welcome back in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its first concert of the new season, that even Geraldine Farrar, the soloist of the evening, had a cold reception in comparison. Charles A. Ellis, manager, had decided to favor his first New York audiences with two of the most popular "stars" he could procure—Miss Farrar on Thursday evening, Nellie Melba on Saturday afternoon. And it may well be that the attractions of these two singers were responsible in part for two sold-out houses. Not a seat could be procured last night immediately before the beginning of the concert, except from speculators, who appeared to be carrying on a profitable business on the sidewalk. Nevertheless, it remains true that only a limited number of persons clapped their hands for Miss Farrar, whereas, to judge from the sound, the whole audience applauded Max Fiedler and his men whenever occasion offered.

Miss Farrar made two appearances. Her first contribution was the air of Theseus, "Ah! pour moi quelle peine extreme," from the opera "Jeannot et Colin," by Niccolo Isouard, an eighteenth century composer born in Malta; her second, Mozart's recitative "Misero! o sogno," and air, "Aura, che intorno," written originally for tenor.

Clad in a gold and yellow gown of modern Parisian design, there was something almost Oriental in Miss Farrar's appearance—an effect that was heightened by the broad band of gilded material, studded with stones, which encircled her high black coiffure, close to the temples. A striking garb this, if not altogether becoming, but somehow the crowd refused to show any particular surprise as Miss Farrar walked slowly to the middle of the stage, and even after the first aria, which she sang charmingly, there were no tumultuous demonstrations of enthusiasm. Three or four times the soprano came back to bow her thanks, but the invitation to return was by no means unanimous.

Except for a tendency to sing a little sharp, the second aria, sung in Italian, showed Miss Farrar to even better advantage. In fact, our American soprano appears to have returned from her European triumphs not only with a supply of new gowns but in excellent vocal condition. Such legato singing as she put to her credit last night not every singer nowadays can command.

Max Fiedler elected to open the evening with Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, opus 27, which the Philadelphia Orchestra, Pohlig conducter, first introduced to Americans about a year ago. As far as the first movement is concerned, with its beautiful Largo and stirring Allegro, the choice was a happy one. But the three following movements are inconsequential in comparison and certainly were not worth three-quarters of an hour's time of listening. The whole work occupied more than an hour.

It was a delight to hear once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with all its euphony and mellowness of tone, all its familiar smoothness of execution.

It must be confessed, however, that one noted an unusual amount of rythmical wavering, particularly in Bach's concerto No. 3, in G major, which Fiedler performed with full string orchestra and a "continuo" accompaniment played on two harpsichords. This beautiful music, augmented to a power far beyond the composer's intentions, certainly exposed to advantage the tone of the Boston strings. In other respects, however, it made no flattering revelations.

The evening closed with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

EVE. SUN

ss New York City.

NOV 9 1910

There's a war among orchestras for the honor of giving the truest rendering of Rachmaninoff's Second symphony, in which the Boston Orchestra won a triumph this week in three cities. The slower-moving Philadelphia Orchestra played it earlier, when the composer conducted his own music last November. The active Russian Symphony Orchestra had it first of all nearly two years ago, and is going to repeat it next Thursday. There's a reason.

The local Russian conductor, Modest Altschuler, declares that his next interpretation will be wholly different from his reading of the score when it was first played.

EVE. POST.

New York City.

NOV 12 1910

Philip Hale announces that an exhaustive catalogue of the programmes of all the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra outside of Boston, as well as in that city, is now being prepared. The catalogue is so made that any one looking, for instance, at "Beethoven: Symphony No. 1," will see at a glance how often and where this symphony has been played, with the date of performance.

rom SUN

ress New York City.

NOV 11 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

RACHMANINOV'S SECOND SYMPHONY HEARD.

Composition Sounded Much Better Than When First Heard Here—Miss Farrar, Gorgeous as an Egyptian Princess, Sang Two Unfamiliar Numbers.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night called out a splendid audience representative of New York's best musical culture. The house was completely filled and the applause which followed the brilliant performance of the first number on the programme was a tribute to the noble playing of the orchestra and to the admirable conducting of Max Fiedler.

The composition referred to was the second symphony of Sergei Rachmaninov, the distinguished Russian composer. This work was heard for the first time in the United States at a concert of the Russian Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall on the evening of January 14, 1909. At that time the composition failed to make any very definite impression. The present reviewer was unable to discern in it the noteworthy qualities which Mr. Fiedler brought clearly to the surface last night.

The symphony, which is in the incisive tonality of E minor, begins with a slow introduction, leading to the first allegro, which is long and elaborately developed. The cantabile melody of this movement, in G major, introduced by the violins, is particularly captivating and is withal dignified and broad in character. The movement as a whole is sombre in mood, indeed at times passionate, and is written in the largest tones of the whole orchestra. It is perhaps not quite as compact as it might be, but the subject matter is well worthy of development and the general effect is one of intense virility.

The second movement, marked allegro molto, serves as the scherzo of the composition. It speaks of the dance of elemental people. There is abandon, and even savagery in it, but there is not a moment that is not musical. Indeed some of the devices smack of the schools of old, and there is a very inspiring bit of fugato which paints the very confusion of the dance run to riot. The trio is chanted out as a sort of song contrasting with the dance, which returns with a new vigor.

The third movement, in the shape called by some theoreticians the cavatina form, contains three principal melodies. The chief theme of the work reappears incidentally in this movement and with telling effect. The finale, an allegro vivace, has not only its own melodic matter but utilizes some of that heard before. It is admirably built up and instrumented in a masterly manner.

This is the record of a very different hearing from that of the first performance. The new impression must be accredited to the scholarly and illuminative reading of Mr. Fiedler and to the splendid performance of the artists from Boston. It is a pity that Mr. Rachmaninov could not have been present to witness the reception which the audience gave to his music.

The other instrumental numbers on the programme were the third major Brandenburg concerto of Bach and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The Bach composition is an old friend of local concertgoers (as is the "Egmont"), and it requires no extended comment at this time. Mr. Fiedler, having in mind the powerful body of strings in his orchestra, endeavored to attain some balance by doubling the harpsichord part, but the result was not satisfactory. The harpsichords were heard only here and there, but when heard their tone added character to the music.

The soloist was Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House. After the symphony Miss Farrar sang "Ah, pour moi quelle peine extréme," from Isouard's opera comique "Jeannot et Colin," and after the concerto Mozart's recitative and air beginning "Misero, O sogno." This latter is a concert air composed by Mozart probably in 1783 and first sung by the tenor Adamberger in Vienna in December of that year. Dr Muck abridged the music and revised the instrumentation for Miss Farrar.

The aged novelty proved worth resuscitation and was received with manifest pleasure by an audience quite capable of appreciating the beauty of Mozart's style. It will interest operagoers to know that Miss Farrar made her first appearance of the season in a costume which would have graced Amneris in the halls of Verdi's Pharaoh, that she has acquired a buxom beauty that makes Juliets and Cherubinos questionable and that she was in excellent voice.

hed: Le

WORLD

New York City.

NOV 13 1910

MELBA QUEEN OF SONG AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

As Soloist of Boston Orchestra's First Matinee She Receives Ovation.

By Reginald de Koven.

I am quite sure I do not like vocal selections at symphony concerts, because the break such numbers, especially when operatic, make in the symphonic context is too abrupt. I am equally certain that the audience at the Boston Orchestra's first matinee concert yesterday did not agree with me, for Mme. Melba for her first appearance in two years drew a house which packed Carnegie Hall to the doors and aroused applause by her selections—the aria "Dove Sohg" from Mozart's "Figaro" and the "Mad Song" from Thomas's "Hamlet"—which amounted to an ovation. Verily there is much in a name for the American public.

But Melba is not yet only a name. That exquisite, crystal pure voice, like a silver trumpet, is still undimmed in beauty and her finished art in its use still unimpaired. Indeed, I thought her voice in far better condition than when she sang here last. Truly, great art does not grow old.

While Mr. Fiedler gave us no number to spur and onimate the programme like the Rachmaninoff symphony, which I want to hear again, and soon, the concert was altogether enjoyable. The inwardness of Brahms's third or "Eroica" symphony for me is so subtle that the music does not "get over," beautiful work as it is, and admirably as it was given yesterday by Mr. Fiedler and this orchestra, who, however, hardly played with the musical finish of Thursday evening. A new overture, "Puck," a title conveying the suggestion of mood and atmosphere rather than of set programme, proved a joyous and melodious bit of descriptive music, cleverly written and cleverly scored in due modern fashion, though some of the effects were rather banal, which pleased the audience mightily. The composer, Mr. Strube, a member of the orchestra, who has also written a symphony played with success in Boston last season, was compelled to bow several times in acknowledgment of the hearty applause which greeted his work.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture, carefully rendered, and Sibelius's symphonic poem "Finlandia" completed the programme. Both Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra are to be congratulated for their work at these first concerts. It is certainly a comfort to hear a real orchestra once in a while.

John Donahue Dies in Willimantic.

EVE. TELEGRAM

is New York City.

Saturday afternoon Carnegie Hall was filled to overflowing at the first matinee of the season by the Boston Symphony. Doubtless the presence of Mme. Melba as soloist helped, but the concerts by the visiting Bostonians are usually well attended. Mme. Melba's singing of an aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet" were two pleasant incidents of the afternoon.

The principal offering, however, was Brahms' Third Symphony, played with all the smoothness which this worthy body of players reveal when at their best. Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Sibelius' superbly sombre "Finlandia" overture and a merry little overture, "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the violinists in the orchestra, contributed to the delight of the listeners.

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York City.

te

Widow Gets All Jourdan Riches.

Gen. James Jourdan in his will, filed yesterday in the Surrogate's Court in Brooklyn, left his estate of more than $2,000,000 to his widow. The sons, James M., Franklin B., William B. and Edward R. Jourdan, waived the issuance of a citation, which means the will is to stand without contest.

Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

ess

NOV 14 1910

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

Usual Lecture Preliminary to It Given by Louis C. Elson of Boston.

The usual lecture recital, preparatory to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon, with the programme of to-night's Philharmonic Concert in the opera house, Academy of Music, as its subject. Like the concert, it is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. It was set in the lecture hall of the Academy and the place was crowded. Louis C. Elson of Boston was the lecturer, using one piano for the themes and in aid of his explanatory information, and Alfred De Vote was the assisting artist, playing on another piano and giving great enjoyment by his beautiful interpretation of the music. The programmes had not arrived from Boston in time for the lecture, but Mr. Elson's full description of the music made their absence but little felt. Only the orchestral music was taken up, though Mr. Elson assured the audience that they would admire the "Hymn to Pallas Athene," by Saint-Saens, which Mme. Jeanne Jomelli is to contribute to to-night's programme, and which will then be heard for the first time in this country. The other numbers will be the overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115, Schumann; the Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90, by Brahms; Tone Poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, Strauss; Recititive and Aria from the lyric scene, "The Prodigal Son," "Debussy" and "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7, by Sibelius. Mr. Elson said much about the symphony form and the changes introduced during his interesting discussion of the Brahm's Symphony, and he took up each selection in detail, pointing out the contrasting color of the themes, and, in the Brahm's, the contrast between the masculine or dominant theme and the feminine or subordinate theme. He spoke also of the melodic quality present in this composition by "the third great B in German music"—the others being Bach and Beethoven.

Geraldine Farrar Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert

Sings Some Almost Forgotten Arias at a Crowded Carnegie Hall —Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony Superbly Played by This Premier Band.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

GERALDINE FARRAR, grown bigger, handsomer than ever and wearing a startling gown—half Tosca and half Salome—was the soloist at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. She sang a well nigh forgotten aria, "Ah! Pour moi quelle peine extreme," from "Jeannot et Colin," an opera comique by Niccolo Isouard, first produced at the Opera Comique, Paris, in 1814, and the recitative "Misero! O Sogno" and aria "Aura che intorno," by Mozart, little better known, abridged and revised for her use by Dr. Karl Muck. She was cordially received and warmly applauded by a crowded house, and she sang in what is now become her characteristic manner, her voice often sounding sharp.

Rachmaninoff's second symphony in E minor was the opening number. It was first played in Moscow two years ago and in America a year later. Its virtues become more manifest with every hearing. The composition is richly orchestrated and full of beauty. In each of its four movements there is sensuous charm, lovely melody, poetic feeling and uplifting suggestion. And how splendidly it was played last night! Mr. Fiedler and his men were as one voice in the proclamation of the work. The very best traditions of this exceptional band were maintained in the exposition of it. The applause did not cease until the whole orchestra had risen to acknowledge it.

In Bach's concerto in G major, the third of the Brandenburg set, two harpsichords were used, but they prevailed only slightly against the weight of the orchestra. The work, well worth doing and finely done, helped to round out a most attractive programme which came to an end with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

At the matinee on Saturday Nellie Melba will be the soloist and Brahms's third symphony in F major will be played.

[69]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the UNION.
STANDARD UNION,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
NOV 12 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY.

With its artistic supremacy never more assertive, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its series of Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music last night before an audience that represented a very large portion of the music-loving public in this borough. The reputation achieved by these musicians in the past years for their remarkable proficiency in symphonic performance is an asset in itself, especially in view of the noteworthy efforts of other large orchestras and other conductors to attain to the same degree of excellence. But the Bostonians still forge ahead of their nearest rivals, demonstrating even more wonderfully than ever before the creative and controlling powers which underlie the superb quality of their work.

Of course, the conductor should always come in for a certain share of the praise as well as the censure which is often too severely showered on this one individual for little fault of his own. It must be said, therefore, that Max Fiedler has always commended himself most highly to critical taste ever since he undertook the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is a man of modern musical tendencies, but not without a firm reverence for the classics and their surrounding traditions, and his readings of the masterpieces, whether it be a symphony by Beethoven or a tonal effusion by Richard Strauss, have always been found illuminative and interesting. There have been and there are greater conductors than Fiedler, but his ability stands out more prominently because he has under him an orchestra so thoroughly schooled and developed as to render even the best leader merely useful rather than absolutely necessary.

Whether it is due to Fiedler or to the instinctive musicianship of his men is not a very material question to the music loving public. It is certain, however, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has acquired model standards of tone production which are unfailingly and rigidly observed during the course of a performance. The formulation by which the most expressive results of a musical movement is obtained finds its origin not in the temperamental impulses of the conductor, but in established scientific principles. On the other hand, Fiedler has much to do with the subsequent embellishments and they are not of minor importance. Indeed these finishing touches, as it were, are the very things that bring about the exquisite transparency of tone, flexibility of color, fluency and breadth of expression, for which the Bostonians are famous.

The programme of the evening commenced with Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred." While somewhat suggestive in character the music could hardly be said to sound either the heights or the depths of the poet's emotional hero. Even though moved by the decided romanticism of his school, Schumann had not the technical tools to accomplish as much for the realistic presentation of his subject as did Liszt with "Mazeppa," or Richard Strauss with "Zarathustra." Judging the overture purely on a musical basis, however, regardless of its possible descriptive purpose, it must be admitted that the music in many parts is of rare beauty and always well conceived.

For the big number of the evening Fiedler chose to give Brahms' Symphony No. 3 in F. major. Considered by some to be the greatest of Brahms' symphonies, this work certainly has many qualities which justify such a belief. Its construction is as perfect as that of the great Symphony No. 2 in D. major and if anything its appeal is far more definite. The realization of the fact that "Brahms' appeal is to art and not to men," and that his music is, therefore, to be admired, but not felt, could be calculated to arouse but little interest in the intellectual composer as far as the ordinary listener is concerned. Music should be felt and in all the four movements of the F major symphony as performed last night the music was felt.

In fact while the architectural details of the symphony, over which the more fastidious delight, are not forgotten, they are generally overlooked by the listener, the attention being attracted rather by the outpouring of beautifully written melodies in which each of the four movements abound. The heroic vigor of the first movement, allegro con brio, is most persuasive in its emotional appeal and it is only during the second movement, andante, that one ceases to "feel" the music. With the exposition accomplished, in a masterly manner without doubt, the work passes on to a third movement, poco allegretto, in which the melody is crystalized from the purest essence of tone. The fourth movement, allegro, revives the romantic fervor of the first section and leaves the listener convinced of the true greatness of the composer's achievement.

An orchestral programme without Richard Strauss is rare nowadays. Last night the audience heard his "Don Juan" and applauded the performance. Fiedler delivered himself of his usual reading, which is not very satisfactory, for in many parts his Don Juan lacks the spontaneity with which Strauss originally endowed him. The love duet, however, was played splendidly and the ending of the symphonic poem was likewise rendered very effective. "Finlandia," a symphonic poem by Sibelius, was the concluding number. The music is interesting and melodious, its sentiment being in the character of a patriotic tribute to the oppressed of Finland.

Mme. Jeanne Jomelli was the soloist. She sang Saint Saens' Hymn to Pallas Athene, and Azael's recitative "These Joyous Airs," and aria, "O Time That Is No More" from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." All three numbers were sung with a fine display of dramatic intelligence, as well as vocal power.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 11 1910

LECTURE-RECITAL

Given Preparatory to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The usual lecture recital preparatory to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon, with the programme of to-night's Philharmonic concert in the Opera House, Academy of Music, as its subject. Like the concert, it is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. It was set in the lecture hall of the Academy and the place was crowded. Louis C. Elson, of Boston, was the lecturer, using one piano for the themes and in aid of his explanatory information, and Alfred De Voto was the assisting artist, playing on another piano and giving great enjoyment by his beautiful interpretation of the music. The programmes had not arrived from Boston in time for the lecture, but Mr. Elson's full description of the music made their absence but little felt. Only the orchestral music was taken up though Mr. Elson assured the audience that they would admire the "Hymn to Pallas Athene," by Saint Saens, which Mme. Jeanne Jomelli is to contribute to to-night's programme, and which will then be heard for the first time in this country. The other numbers will be the overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115, Schumann; the Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90, by Brahms; Tone Poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, Strauss; recitative and aria from the lyric scene, "The Prodigal Son," Debussy, and "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7, by Sibelius. Mr. Elson said much about the symphony form and the changes introduced during his interesting discussion of the Brahms Symphony, and he took up each selection in detail, pointing out the contrasting color of the themes, and in the Brahms the contrast between the masculine or dominant theme and the feminine or subordinate theme. He spoke also of the melodic quality present in this composition by "the third great B in German music—the [illegible] Bach and Beethoven."

WORLD
New York City
NOV

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Miss Farrar and Rachmaninoff Work the Features of Enjoyable Programme.

By Reginald de Koven.

The concerts of the Boston Orchestra, of which the first of the season was given at Carnegie Hall last night, are always a delight. Always also a critical relief, because if one may not always indorse any particular way of interpretation, one may be certain that in its way the interpretation becomes merely an expression of personal preference—never a difficult matter.

If the Rachmaninoff symphony No. 2, op. 29, was played here previously—I think the Russian Symphonists essayed it once—it was heard practically for the first time last night, and superbly played made a profound impression. For me it ranks among the greatest of modern symphonies. The composer has supplied no programme to this highly characteristic and suggestive work, and none is needed; for it is pure symphonic music, full of beautiful melodic thought nobly expressed and wrought with consummate art and skill—music throughout that is sane, healthy and intelligible.

The mood of the first of the usual four movements, largo allegro moderato, is patently introspective and strikes an intensely human note, now plaintive, now passionate, now defiant. The abandon of the vigorous dance of the second movement—allegro molto—which replaces the usual scherzo, is almost savage in intensity; and the way this rhythmic measure is interrupted by first a chorale and then an irrepressible fugue makes this movement the most individual and striking of the work. The adagio is subtly and fragrantly melodious, the whole orchestra singing a passionate love song, while the brilliant finale stirringly worked out ends the whole with a majestic climax of joyous sound. The Boston Orchestra never played better in New York.

Miss Farrar, astonishingly headgeared, sang charmingly an opera comique aria by Isouard (1814), which sounded wobbly thin and trite after the rich color of the symphony, and Mozart's aria "Misero, a segno, o son destor" to rapturous applause. Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3 for strings and two harpsichord, played with rare finish, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture completed a most enjoyable programme.

om STAATS ZEITUNG
dress New York City.
ate NOV 11 1910

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Warmer Beifall empfing Herrn Max Fiedler, als er gestern Abend auf dem Podium erschien, um das erste diesjährige Konzert der Bostoner zu dirigiren. Ein Zeichen, wie stark er sich im Vorjahr in die Achtung des New Yorker Publikums eingearbeitet hat. Das Programm versprach die in Boston und Philadelphia schon im Vorjahre gespielte, für New York jedoch neue Zweite Symphonie von Sergei Rachmaninoff, das dritte Brandenburgsche Concert Bach's, die „Egmont"-Ouverture und enthielt überdies als Geschenk zwei Vorträge von Geraldine Farrar.

Die Rachmaninoff'sche Symphonie fängt vielversprechend genug an. Der erste Satz ist interessant, vor allem schon, weil der Komponist offenbar den ehrlichen Versuch macht, seine Heimathsmusik mit der Form der Symphonie in Einklang zu bringen, sie ihr zu assimiliren. Schwermüthig umfängt uns die Einleitung. Die gedämpften Klänge wirken anziehend, und der Uebergang zur erregten Stimmung ist trefflich entwickelt. Die Themen sind allerdings kurzathmig und wenig eindringlich, aber in der Musik kommt es ja gar so oft weniger auf das „Was", denn auf das „Wie" an. Rachmaninoff hat unstreitig das Talent zur symphonischen Entwicklung der Themen. Der erste Satz schließt unter allgemeiner Theilnahme, und der Beifall ist stark und überzeugungstreu.

Leider hielt das Folgende nicht, was der Anfang versprochen hatte. Das Scherzo ist rythmisch zwar pikant und enthält in kleineren Episoden gut kontrastirende lyrische Ruhepunkte, aber der Humor fehlt. Immerhin ist es ein gelungener Satz. Der Beifall ist stark, aber es scheint, daß er mehr der überaus glänzenden Wiedergabe gelte, als dem Werk. Von bleierner Schwere ist das Adagio, plump und unbelebt. Die Instrumentation ist dick und massig; der Gesang wird von klagenden Stimmen unterbrochen, mit denen man nichts Rechtes anzufangen weiß. Man verspürt Langeweile, denn jetzt merkt man schon: die matte Farbe der Instrumentation, die im ersten Satz so wirkungsvoll war, wird nunmehr zur bleiernen Monotonie. Es fehlt der Glanz der Orchesterfarben, die Phantasie des Klanges.

Der Schlußsatz bringt zwar viel Lärm, aber auch keinen Glanz. Sarmatisch wild rauscht der Satz dahin. Viel Temperament, aber keine rechte Oekonomie und Kontrastwirkung. Der Beifall des Publikums wird stürmisch, aber es ist klar: er gilt zum größten Theil dem Dirigenten und der wackeren Künstlerschaar, die mit der Wiedergabe dieses schweren Werkes eine bewunderungswürdige Leistung geliefert haben. Nie sind die Bostoner größer, als wenn es gilt, mit ihrer Kunst für ein schwächeres oder ungleiches Werk einzutreten, die Schäden und Lücken zuzudecken. In unsagbarer Virtuosität konnte sich das Orchester gestern nicht genug thun.

Das dritte Brandenburg'sche Konzert für Streichorchester mit der Begleitung von zwei Harpsichords (Originalen, nicht Maskirung) wirkte nach der schweren russischen Kost gar leicht und gefällig. Es ist ein heiteres, neckisches Tonspiel, das uns der ernste Meister Bach da giebt, Unterhaltungsmusik ergötzlichster Art, dem höfischen Geschmack jener Zeit mit Bravour angepaßt. Wie zierlich und spielend nahm Herr Fiedler die verschlungene Polyphonie, wie klar wurde das kunstvoll Gewebe da vor uns auseinandergelegt, wie feinnervig und stilgerecht griff da eins ins andere. Nur die Harpsichords kamen zu kurz, denn man hörte sie in den kraftvollen Tutti nicht.

Frl. Farrar erschien in einer pompösen Toilette aus Goldatlas mit diademartigem Kopfputz wie die Jugend und Schönheit selbst. Sie ist voller, frauenhafter geworden, was ihr gar nicht übel steht. Halb Tosca, halb Salome (leider vor dem Tanz der sieben Schleier) trat sie vor das Publikum, das seinen Liebling herzlich empfing. Sie sang eine Arie aus Isouard's Oper „Jeannot et Collin" (1814) und die Mozart-Arie "Misero, sogno, o son desta", die ursprünglich für Tenor geschrieben wurde.

STAATS ZEITUNG
New York City.

Aus dem Konzertsaale.

Das erste Konzert der neuen Saison des Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften giebt heute Abend das rühmlichst bekannte Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester im Opernsaale der Academy of Music unter der Leitung von Max Fiedler. Das Programm enthält Schumann's „Manfred"-Ouverture und Tonwerke von Brahms, Richard Strauß und Sibelius. Als Solistin tritt Madame Jeanne Jomelli auf, die sich eines hohen künstlerischen Rufes erfreut.

EVE. SUN
New York City.
NOV 11 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMES A-STARRING.

'Twas Farrar Yesterday and Melba 'Twill Be To-morrow—Rachmaninoff Ovation for Fiedler and His Men—Songs of Old and Double Harpsichord Bach Through Gold-Rimmed Spectacles.

When Geraldine Farrar made her first appearance in New York this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, it was after the big and splendid Second Rachmaninoff [illegible]mphony had set Fiedler and all his [illegible]ndred men bowing to applause for the Russian and for themselves, and also after the subsequent intermission, that sent an audience in grand opera clothes promenading through the breezy lobbies and corridors. It was, in fact, 9:30 o'clock before ever the opera star appeared. She looked sturdier, almost robust. She wore a hood of pearls and a gown that set old Boston's Symphony Hall agog a few nights before. It might be described as "Tosca" to the waist and "Thais" to the ankles. That was hardly accounting for a Maud Allan back.

Now, with all the fuss and lack of feathers, the popular singer of these five years past showed the artist she is by wrapping herself, as in a garment, in that atmosphere of antique art which made all the programme's latter half. An air of some poor Thérèse from forgotten Isouard's "Jeannot et Colin," was simple in richness, rich in simplicity. You might have been at one of those pretty little pre-Revolutionary bucolic entertainments in Marie Antoinette's dairy.

Later yet came a recitative and air of another poor lady. But no, it was a "tenor." For just as Massenet himself has done with "Jongleur," so Mozart's little show piece, with oddly modern turns of rhythm, was condensed by Karl Muck of the Berlin Royal Opera for Miss Farrar over there. She was in full voice last night, though some vowel sounds had a touch of east wind or else the echoes in the hall sharpened an occasional note. She was many times recalled by an audience that never breaks the "no encore" rules.

Between songs came the diversion of the evening in the shape of two harpsichords in a double concerto of Bach. For five thousand ears to hear, of course it needed a twenty-mule team instead. But the fifty-eight string players were as one man in unison, and when Fiedler hushed them here and there, the two men at the bright-shining, gold-bordered harpsichords added the strumming sounds of bird quills plucking gently at celestial harp strings. It was to modern ears a decoration, not an effect of fundamental counterpoint. The little instruments should have been raised high up at front of stage, instead of half concealed in the heart of the orchestra.

The two harpsichord players not named in the programme page of the "programme book," were down in the orchestra list elsewhere as the regular assisting organist, J. P. Marshall, and Ernest Regestein of the bassoons. The attentive cherub-heads of the entire wind choir, Longy, Maquarre and the rest, were good to see in the silence of Bach.

The silver-crowned Alwyn Schroeder at Warnke's right among the 'cellos was a welcome sight among returning veterans. There was no mistaking when the house discovered him. A new bass fiddler was Wendler, fourth from end man, with a poet's hair worthy of the hero of Miss Fothergill's "First Violin."

Major Higginson thought enough of his premier bandsmen to come over with Manager C. A. Ellis and his phalanx of Athenian assistants on this first tour of their thirtieth season. The general look of health, good humor and highbrow sanity among these bean-fed artists was emphasized by big Anton Witek, the new first violin in spare Willy Hess's chair.

Debussy's air of Azrael from "The Prodigal Son" and Saint Saens's "Hymn to Pallas Athene" are interesting solos of Jeanne Jomelli, soprano, at the Boston Orchestra concert in Brooklyn to-night. The Academy programme has Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Brahms's Third symphony, Sibelius's "Finlandia" and also Strauss's "Don Juan."

To-morrow Melba sings at the Carnegie Hall matinée. She has Mozart's air, "Dove Sono," and Thomas's mad scene from "Hamlet." To Schumann, Brahms and the Finn, the orchestra adds a new comedy overture, "Puck," by Gustav Strube.

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date NOV 13 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Opening of the New Season Drew a Great Audience to the Academy.

It was inspiring to see the great audience drawn to the Academy of Music last night to welcome the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its new season. Not a seat in the Academy was left vacant, the boxes being filled even to the third tier, and the enthusiasm of the audience matched its numbers.

When one remembers the long period during which the old Academy was only partially filled to hear this matchless band, and recalls that its matinees in Brooklyn were abandoned for lack of patronage, the growth of the musical spirit in the town and the executive skill and resource of the Brooklyn Institute, which has built up this overflowing public, will be appreciated. And the programme which roused this enthusiasm was of the new music—Brahms, Strauss, Debussy and Sibelius. Just imagine offering those men to the audiences at the old Academy, when uneasy spirits used to complain of "too much Beethoven," and beg for the symphonies of Schumann.

The musical insurgents of those days and the reactionaries, too, could have agreed on Mr. Fiedler's opening selection last night. It was the overture to Schumann's "Manfred," the one familiar composition on the list, and one of the most grateful things that Schumann wrote, with its happy blending of romantic fervor with Byronic tenderness. And its playing served to show that the orchestra remains the same monument of tonal perfection to which we have grown accustomed. The heavenly smoothness and richness of the strings, the liquid beauty of the wood winds and the fact that these brasses know how to comport themselves in gentle company, were all in evidence in the overture.

Then came the instructive contrast of the evening. Will somebody write a monograph called "The Artist and the Scene Painter" and illustrate it with the Third Brahms Symphony and the Strauss "Don Juan" tone poem, played last night? Of course, in that contrast Brahms stands for the artist and Strauss for the scene painter, but readers who would jump to the conclusion that the Strauss music was inferior, under the existing conditions, would be altogether too hasty. The scene painter is an artist in his own way, adapting his art to produce its effect upon the multitude rather than the individual. And so expert has he become that any well-painted and cunningly lighted stage "set" is almost certain of applause when the curtain goes up before the actors appear. Now, the conditions in which modern orchestral music is heard are practically theatrical. You have your multitude in front, divided into the three grades of financial prosperity which are commonly supposed to connote a wide range of intelligence, and the appeal must be made to those individuals as a mass, the "mob feeling" being widely recognized as something very different from the mental attitude of the separate men and women who compose it.

No musician ever understood and met those conditions so perfectly as Richard Strauss. His music flames with color and with surprises. The nerves tingle under his assaults upon the ear, the mind recoils from his dissonances and then suddenly is led captive by a strain of haunting melody so colored with unusual combinations of instruments as to seem a thousand times more vital than would the same theme drummed out upon a piano in an expository lecture on the score. Whether it is great or not we are too close to Strauss to determine. But, at least, it is alive, every bar of it, with precisely the same spirit which stirs an audience when a wave of emotion passes over it. If it is not great, at least it seems great when you hear it, which may give just as much satisfaction to the listener as the judgment of posterity.

But for the contrast. How much chance of recognition would there be for a Corot or even one of Millet's peasant tragedies, hung in the center of the stage of great theaters. A connoisseur here and there, armed with powerful glasses, might be able to detect the beauties, but the bulk of the audience would pass it over indifferently. That is the scene painter's field, and the scene painter would win. The comparison does not stand squarely on all fours in the field of music, because vital emotion can be conveyed in music on the scene painter's scale, but it serves to indicate the effect of the Brahms symphony on an audience. The andante, to be sure, has a lovely melody which transports one far away and makes him forget the harmonic learning and skill with which its beauty is reinforced, but for long stretches the music seemed dull and dry. Harmonically sound and well made it undoubtedly is and it may be heroic, as Richter said it was, but it lacks the quality which imparts the heroic thrill to an audience.

Whatever lack of emotional warmth there might have been to the Brahms, there was none in the concluding number, the Finlandia" of Sibelius, whose music is almost unknown to our audiences. His is a new and welcome voice from that Northern province which has recently felt the heavy hand of the great black czar. First cousin to other Russian music this symphonic poem seems in its underlying note of tragedy, and own brother in its splendid vitality. But its melodic felicity marks Sibelius as a composer whose work is likely to grow, both in intrinsic value and in popularity. There is one melody in this piece which sounds like a folk song, even if it isn't, which church organists should make haste to sieze. The audience congregation which would not sing that air, fitted to familiar words, would be merely dumb, driven cattle.

There was a soloist last night, soloists being the fashion, and a good one, Jeanne Jomelli. She sang a "Hymn to Pallas Anthene," Saint-Saens, written for one of the celebrations in the old theater at Orange and unknown in this country, and a recatitive and aria from Debussy's "Prodigal Son." Both were workmanlike examples of the modern school, with nothing about either to haunt the memory or enable the hearer who runs across it again to remember where he heard it before. Mme. Jomelli sang them very well indeed. She is a singer who "hits the high places" with unerring skill and plentiful zeal. Now, when her voice is fresh and unworn, those ringing held notes are inspiring and they insure the popularity of the singer on the concert platform until that unhappy time when she will be forced to learn discretion.

From PRESS

Address New York City.

Date NOV 13 1910

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Melba Sings with Boston Band.

An even greater audience than that which heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first evening concert on last Thursday thronged Carnegie Hall yesterday at the first matinee this season of the famous band. To the average observer attending the opening performance it would have seemed wellnigh impossible to pack any more persons into the big auditorium. Still, a little standing room was left along the side aisles, and there, back against the wall, stood the enthusiasts—two strings of human beings reaching down almost to the stage. They were better off, in reality, than the standees in the open space behind the last row of the parquet. Those poor sufferers were huddled so close together that there was no way of moving arm or limb without seriously inconveniencing one's neighbors.

This time the stellar attraction was Mme. Nellie Melba, instead of Geraldine Farrar, and it must be said she evoked noisier expressions of approval after her second number than her American sister artist did at any time during Thursday's concert. Yet on her entrance the audience did not see fit to offer a big demonstration and even after her first contribution the applause seemed cool.

Melba sang first the recitative and aria, "E Susanna non vien?" and "Dove Son" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her voice rang out with that peculiar clarity which has made it famous the world over. Shortness of breath was not nearly as noticeable as when she last sang in opera here, and her legato caused envy among many younger singers who heard her.

Not so successful was the great soprano with the coloratura of the mad scene from Thomas's "Hamlet," although these tonal flights brought tumultuous applause. It can hardly be denied that time has affected Melba's upper register, a part of the voice which often retains its brilliancy longest. Her medium retains surprising beauty and freshness of timbre, but her head tones have acquired a slight rasp which one cannot recall in the past, and in rapid passages they often are a little pinched. How glorious were Melba's high trills in days gone by! Now, judging from yesterday's experience, her coloratura is not equal to that of Lilli Lehmann, who can boast of several years seniority.

The novelty of the afternoon was a comedy overture, "Puck," by G. Strube, one of the violinists in the Boston orchestra. This work, written in 1908 and dedicated to Max Fiedler, had its first performance on March 19, 1910, in Boston. No programme is attached to it, but, as the composer himself tells in a note, the music portrays in sonata form a sylvan picture and some frolic, with Puck as the main figure.

Though Strube's comedy overture can hardly lay claim to great originality, leaning, as it does, on Debussy, Strauss, Dvorak and others, it is an effective and pleasing piece of music, cleverly scored, vivid, interesting. A pity, though, that the composer should not have devised some less conventional ending. At the conclusion Max Fiedler called Strube away from his desk among the first violins to bow his thanks.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture, used as a sort of curtain raiser to open the concert, ushered in the symphony of the afternoon—Brahms's beautiful third. It is now a commonplace to speak of the excellence of the Boston orchestra, of its wonderful euphony, its precision and so forth. Many of those qualities were much in evidence yesterday, and yet it cannot be maintained that Brahms's symphony received adequate treatment. The fault lay, no doubt, with Fiedler, who took most of the tempos too slowly, adding to the sluggish effect by failing to command sufficient rhythmical emphasis from his men and making only slight effort to produce dynamic contrasts.

The matinee closed with a sonorous performance of Sibelius's "Finlandia" tone poem, a work that has more sound than substance.

From Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N. Y.

ess

NOV 12 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD AT ACADEMY OF MUSIC

181

First Concert Here of Its Thirtieth Season.

MME. JOMELLI AS SOLOIST.

Brahms' F Major Symphony and Works by Straus, Sibelius and Schumann Given.

A large audience, an interesting programme and its usual beautiful tone and fine playing made notable last evening the first concert of the Boston Symphony Society's thirtieth season, which was given in the Academy of Music. Max Fiedler, the conductor, was greeted enthusiastically as the programme opened with Schumann's overture to "Manfred." The soloist was Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, who was heard to advantage in a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens, which dates back to fifteen years ago, when it was written for an out-of-doors festival in the south of France, and in Azael's recitative, "These Joyous Airs" and aria, "O, Time that is No More," from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." She was at her best in Debussy's music, and was applauded long and loud.

Besides the Schumann overture, the orchestral programme included Brahms' F major symphony, No. 3, Op. 90; Strauss' tone poem, "Dun Juan" and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

Whenever the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in a programme, there is assurance of tone, tone rich and warm, tone true and colorful. It is also certain that the orchestra and Mr. Fiedler will unite in a reading that is not only full of interest from a purely technical standpoint, but is also instinct with artistry. The orchestra is a finely knit, exactly tempered musical instrument ready to Mr. Fiedler's hand, and he uses it with skill and discretion, at times with effects almost of genius, for all that he is not the greatest conductor of all. Both orchestra and Mr. Fiedler were in full accord last evening, and they had no mediocre moments.

The Brahms symphony was given a superb reading, the work of the orchestra in the third movement being especially fine. There were lovely tonal effects, stirring climaxes, beautiful contrast and shading. Throughout, the interpretation was carried through on a high plane, with no stopping to achieve mere superficial brilliancy.

The performance of "Don Juan" cannot be praised so highly, for it was not always that the reading seemed in thorough sympathy with the ideas of the composer. In fact at times, it was a bit dry. The Sibelius work has in it much melody and richness of scoring, together with marked atmospheric effects. It is decidedly individual, and, as played last evening, of marked interest. The overture to "Manfred," although well played, proved of less interest than the other numbers.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date NOV

PHILHARMONIC PLAYS FIRST SUNDAY CONCERT

Programme of Twice-Told Musical Tales Pleasing if Not Notable.

By Reginald de Koven.

Mr. Mahler did not worry himself to procure either a soloist or an orchestral novelty for the first Sunday concert of the Philharmonic Society at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme, consisting of numbers all heard previously and often, like Weber's "Freischuetz" overture, Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, the usual excerpts from the Berlioz "Faust" music and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, while interesting enough, and generally effectively performed, was hardly noteworthy.

After hearing the Boston Orchestra one realizes how indifferent much of the Philharmonic material is, and how rough and explosive their playing often is—as in the "Freischuetz" overture—while the compact, mellow sonority which distinguishes Mr. Fiedler's organization is noticeably absent. This is not Mr. Mahler's fault; for my part I think he works wonders with the material at his command. Still it always irks me to have to admit that orchestrally New York must take a back seat to Boston, and I wonder if it would not be possible—even with the union regulations as they are—to improve the present personnel of the Philharmonic Orchestra. There is surely enough wealth among its guarantors to effect this desirable end, if only money be needed.

With his usual eye to dramatic effect whenever possible, Mahler read the symphony with much appreciation, great lucidity, fire and animation, though with a certain lack of subtlety and poetry. But the hearty applause given him was deserved. The wood wind and horns, the best section of the orchestra, were excellent, and the strings in spite of their rather acrid tone did creditable work; but the timpani and heavy brass were too often coarse and obtrusive.

Probably the best work of the orchestra yesterday in point of finish and ensemble feeling and effect was done in the minuet and "Dance of Sylphes" from the "Damnation of Faust," as it then more nearly gave the desired effect of a great single instrument rather than a body of players more or less together in tune and time. Numbers like this give one hopes for a future of greater excellence for the Philharmonic.

TRIBUNE

s New York City.

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA PLAYS

Rachmaninoff Symphony and Miss Farrar Draw Big Throng.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. Boston Symphony audiences generally mean standing room only nowadays, and last night there was the added attraction of a popular operatic prima donna, Miss Geraldine Farrar.

Mr. Fiedler had chosen for the first part of his programme Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, which was given first in Moscow in 1908, and which was played last season by both the Russian and Philadelphia Symphony orchestras.

In this work the composer has shown a far different attitude than in his "The Island of the Dead," which was played last season by the Russian Symphony Orchestra. In this latter composition Mr. Rachmaninoff showed himself one of the moderns, while in his symphony he is following in the paths laid out by the older masters.

Architecturally the symphony is well knit, the themes are melodious, some very beautiful; there is much rich coloring and often a splendid sonority. The work is not in the least sensational, but in it the composer reveals an emotional intensity that he has not often shown before.

The first two movements seem at a first hearing the most interesting. The third is rather long and perhaps a trifle sentimental. The length of the symphony is considerable, but the audience appeared to be interested throughout.

Mr. Fiedler led his orchestra with admirable feeling for the score and with gratifying spirit and decision, while the splendid band quite outdid itself.

To some in the audience possibly the appearance of Miss Farrar was a fact to be remembered unto countless generations. Miss Farrar was as charming as ever—a pearl from the Orient. Or rather a yellow orchid, for her dress was of a yellow and of an Oriental cut, with strange and mysterious tassels dangling as she walked, that made all the ladies in the audience gasp and the gentlemen rub their eyes.

Her hair was bound in a silver filet à la Floria Tosca, but her smile was fresh from her own Melrose.

Miss Farrar sang a charming aria from Isouard's opera comique "Jeannot et Colin," and Mozart's aria, "Misero: O sogno, O son desto," arranged for her by Dr. Muck.

She was in strong voice, and her singing pleased the audience greatly.

The remainder of the programme included Bach's Brandenberg Concerto No. 3 and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York City.

Theater und Musik.

Die Melba und die Bostoner.

Jawohl: zuerst die Melba und dann die Bostoner. Die Primadonna war beim gestrigen ersten Matinee-Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters die Hauptsache, und die berühmte Künstlerschaar war in zweite Linie gedrängt worden. Geradeso wie es am Donnerstag anläßlich des Eröffnungs-Konzertes mit Frl. Farrar der Fall gewesen war.

Wie sich doch die Zeiten und die Gepflogenheiten ändern! Früher setzte jedes hochstehende Symphonie-Orchester seinen Stolz darein, die „erste Violine" zu spielen, die vom Publikum nun einmal verhätschelten Solisten nur in Aufgaben zu verwenden, welche den edlen Rahmen der Veranstaltung nicht sprengten, jedes sensationelle Beiwerk zu vermeiden, ja, so oft als möglich der „assistirenden Künstler" ganz zu entrathen. Mit Stolz verkündete das Bostoner Orchester noch vor wenigen Jahren, daß die ersten Konzerte in New York ganz aus eigenen Kräften bestritten werden würden. Und jetzt? Die beiden ersten Veranstaltungen der hervorragenden Körperschaften standen im Sensationszeichen der Stars!

Mit Erstaunen haben wir anläßlich des Donnerstag-Konzerts die Spitzmarken der kritisirenden Kollegen gesehen. Fast Alle schrieben sie da: „Frl. Farrar und die Bostoner". Sie hatten das richtige Gefühl: die beiden berühmten Solistinnen waren die Hauptanziehungskraft, und die Bostoner steuerten einige Nummern bei, um die Lücken zu füllen!

Carnegie Hall war beidemale, namentlich aber gestern Nachmittag, in geradezu unheimlicher Weise gefüllt. Fünf Reihen tief standen im „Stehparterre" diejenigen, die kein Plätzchen mehr erhalten konnten, und es waren fast durchweg elegante Damen, die sich sonst mit Leichtigkeit den besten Sitz gönnen können. Ein Sensationspublikum! Viele kamen so spät als möglich, wohl um dem „langweiligen" Schumann und dem „unausstehlichen" Brahms aus dem Wege zu gehen, und als es nach dem zwölften Hervorruf von Frau Melba endlich klar geworden war, daß die eiserne „No Encore"-Regel nicht gebrochen werden würde, da verließ ein auffallend großer Theil der Anwesenden den Saal, der für sie keine Anziehungskraft mehr besaß. Und gar Viele mögen dem Programmmacher gezürn haben, daß er den bösen Brahms nicht zum Schluß angesetzt hatte. Dann hätte man sich noch mehr Langeweile erspart. Herr Fiedler hat uns bei beiden Veranstaltungen leid gethan, denn er mußte das Demüthigende der Situation als feinfühlender Künstler wohl gespürt haben. Brahms Dritte Symphonie, die vornehme, philosophisch-tiefe, als eine Art lever du rideau! Und auch dem wackeren Strube, dem Violinisten des Orchesters, dessen Lustspiel-Ouverture „Puck" gestern zum erstenmal in New York gespielt wurde, hat man keinen guten Dienst erwiesen, indem man das verdienstvolle, aber wenig glänzende Werk mitten zwischen die Kantilene und das Brillantfeuerwerk der Melba „eingesandwiched" hatte!

Natürlich soll mit diesen Bemerkungen nichts Abfälliges gegen die Kunst der beiden glänzenden Sängerinnen gesagt werden. Wir schätzen und lieben Frl. Farrar als eine der apartesten und interessantesten Künstlerinnen der Opernbühne, wir bewundern Frau Melba als eine der größten Sängerinnen aller Zeiten (namentlich stimmlich und technisch betrachtet), aber ihr Platz ist auf der Opernbühne oder im mondainen Rezital, nicht auf dem Podium neben der strengen, keuschen Kunst der Bostoner, welche jeden weltlichen Glanz fernhalten sollte. Assistirende Künstler sollen zur Erweiterung des Wirkungskreises dienen, gelegentlich auch, um dem großen Publikum etwas Abwechslung zu gewähren, aber das Orchester muß dabei stets die Hauptsache bleiben, nicht den ernsten Hintergrund abgeben, von der sich die Sensationsroben der Primadonnen umso glänzender abheben sollen.

Also um beim Star zu bleiben. Frau Melba erschien in einem eleganten schwarzen Atlaskleid mit reichen Perlenschnüren um Hals und Taille und einer einsamen weißen Kamelie am Gürtel. Den unwahrscheinlich großen Lastwagenrad-Hut haben wir lieber auf ihrem Haupt gesehen als auf dem der vor uns sitzenden Dame. Die Diva sieht erheblich schlanker geworden, „blühend" aus, wie es von den Königinnen der alten Welt immer heißt und hat sich in der Bewegung ihren Elan voll erhalten. Ein freundlicher Beifall empfängt sie. Sie singt das Rezitativ aus Mozart's „Hochzeit des Figaro" "E Susanna non vien" mit starker Stimmentfaltung, aber etwas unruhig, erfreut aber schon in den ersten Takten der darauffolgenden Arie "Dove sono i bei momenti" durch den alten Zauberfluß ihres himmlischen Legatos. Kein Laut regt sich im weiten Auditorium. Die Stimme der Künstlerin hat sich ihren eigenartigen Schmelz, der an das Blau des echten Diamants erinnert, unversehrt erhalten, die tiefen Töne entfalten noch immer den satten Sammtglanz. Ihre Technik ist die alte, bewunderungswürdig, namentlich in dem an eine Magnesiumfackel gemahnenden Aufleuchten der Töne und in dem perfekten Abschwellen. Die Höhe spricht allerdings nicht mehr so leicht an, namentlich bei frei angeschlagenen Tönen, die Athemführung macht ihr mitunter Beschwerden; auch die Intonation läßt in der Höhe mitunter zu wünschen übrig. Die Koloratur der Diva ist noch immer staunenswerth, wenn auch nicht mehr so merkwürdig sicher wie früher. Manche der Zierrathen sind etwas verwischt, andere werden mit Anstrengung genommen, manches bleibt dem Zufall überlassen. Aber der Triller ist noch immer von bezaubernder Gleichheit und Brillanz, die Staktato und Flautati gewöhnlich von hinreißender Verve.

Das Publikum, das schon die Mozart'sche Arie höchlichst bewundert hatte, wurde nach dem von Frau Melba virtuos auf Koloraturen gesungenen Wahnsinn der Ophelia aus Thomas' „Hamlet" ganz wild und rief die blendende Künstlerin über ein Dutzendmal hervor.

Und nun zu den „assistirenden" Künstlern. Brahms 3. Symphonie wurde lichtvoll und mit hinreißendem Wohlklang gespielt. In der „Manfred"-Ouverture vermißten wir die entschiedene Betonung des unbeugsamen Trotzes Manfred's, dessen Doppelnatur dadurch nicht überzeugend genug zum Ausdruck kam. Mehr rührend als erschütternd, und das hat Schubert doch wohl nicht gewollt. Sibelius' „Finlandia" brachte ein mit nobler Diskretion gezeichnetes Stimmungsbild.

Die Novität der Veranstaltung, Strube's „Puck"-Ouverture, ist die talentirte Arbeit eines fleißigen und geschmackvollen Musikers. Wenn auch einem bestimmten Programm ausweichend, zeichnet die Musik die losen, boshaften Streiche Puck's doch sehr anschaulich, und zwar mit den einfachsten Mitteln. Das an sich nicht hervorragende Material ist solid durchgearbeitet. Die Instrumentation hätten wir mitunter glänzender, farbenreicher gewünscht, doch ist die Schlußsteigerung wirkungsvoll gelungen. Herr Strube konnte dreimal für den aufrichtigen Beifall des Publikums danken.

H.

From TIMES

Address New York City

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Geraldine Farrar Is Soloist with the Boston Players at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its twenty-fifth season in New York last night at Carnegie Hall, a concert which was given under the most brilliant auspices. The audience was the usual large assemblage which greets this Boston body of players. When Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, appeared he was applauded; Max Fiedler was greeted even more effusively: and the appearance of Miss Geraldine Farrar, the soloist of the occasion, was the signal for another storm of applause.

The mainstay of the programme was Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony in E minor, which received its first American performances just a year ago by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Later it was played in Carnegie Hall by the Russian Symphony Society. Mr. Fiedler took it up this year, and he has already played it at two pairs of concerts in Boston in consequence of its success there.

Last night the audience applauded with the utmost enthusiasm after the several movements, and both Mr. Fiedler and his players were forced to bow their acknowledgments many times at the close. Taking the merit of the work for granted, still it must be observed that a great deal of this applause was intended in recognition of the very brilliant playing of the orchestra.

The symphony occupied all the first part of the programme, and it should be recorded that its length is formidable. Immediately after the intermission Miss Farrar made her appearance—her first in New York this season—and sang an air from Isouard's opera comique, "Jeannot et Colin."

The song is an ingenuous one, and Miss Farrar succeeded to a large extent in retaining its naïve air through the color of her tones. However, a certain pinched quality and faulty intonation, which have marred her upper tones before now, were in evidence occasionally.

The other air on the programme which fell to Miss Farrar was a recitative and air of Mozart, written for a tenor and abridged and revised by Dr. Muck especially for this singer.

Between the two airs Mr. Fiedler had placed Bach's concerto in G major, the third of the Brandenburg set. There have been many attempts of late to resuscitate the figured bass accompaniments which used to be improvised by the conductor on the harpsichord. Mr. Mahler has had a piano arranged for the purpose, and this he plays when he conducts his arrangement of two Bach suites.

That method having not proved altogether successful in bringing about a return of the original atmosphere, Mr. Fiedler decided to try a real harpsichord—at least one of the modern ones which are being manufactured in Boston to imitate the old instruments.

As Bach wrote these concertos for only three violins, three violas, three violincellos with bass, and as Mr. Fiedler used his full complement of strings, he decided to have two harpsichords play in unison. It is doubtful, however, if three or four would have been enough. The two made little or no effect against the army of strings. The programme closed with a performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

EVE. MAIL

ss New York City.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given on Saturday afternoon before what was probably the largest audience that Carnegie hall ever held. Over one thousand people were unable to get into the house, and there was a line of standees around the entire hall, beginning at the right and extending to the left of the stage, including those who were about six rows deep in the back of the house. It is no discourtesy to that wonderful orchestra to say that the excitement was due greatly to the presence of Mme. Melba as soloist.

further demonstrated from the nature of the applause, as had the interest been evenly divided the applause to greet the Brahms third symphony would have been simply deafening. New York has seldom heard such a performance of this rarely beautiful and melodious symphony, which brought vividly to the writer's mind the fact that Richard Wagner, the great devotee to Beetroven, once wrote: "There are naive people who continue to write symphonies without realizing or even suspecting that the last symphony was written long ago."

But Brahms was no more ready to believe himself the genius upon whose shoulders the Beethoven mantle was to fall as symphonic writer than was Wagner, and he was slow to take the place accorded him by the broader minded musicians. It was as late as 1870 when, urged to write a symphony, he replied: "I shall never write one. You have no idea how we composers feel when we hear a giant like Beethoven marching along behind us."

The orchestral numbers included Schumann's overture to "Manfred," "Finlandia," by Sibelius, and a comedy overture entitled "Puck," by Gustave Strube, a member of the orchestra, played for the first time here, and played for the first time in Boston in March of this year. It is admirably written, the orchestration being clear, decisive, with a thorough facility of technical treatment.

Much enthusiasm was manifested for this number, and Mr. Strube was forced to leave his desk among the first violins to acknowledge several recalls. Mme. Melba, who should be heard in the opera four or five times a week, was in her most superb voice, in which she retains a remarkable degree of purity, flexibility and tonal beauty. She formed a dignified, almost austere figure, simply gowned in black, and all the color and brilliancy lay in the marvelous singing that she did. Her selections were "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Ophelia's aria from "Hamlet," known as the mad scene. She had well-deserved ova-tions.

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date NOV 3

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MUSIC

MME. MELBA SOLOIST AT AFTERNOON CONCERT.

Gustave Strube's New "Puck" Overture Played for the First Time Here—The Audience One of Extraordinary Size—The Performance Was Excellent.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday at Carnegie Hall, was attended by an audience of extraordinary size. Every seat was occupied, the box holders crowded all the friends they could into their space, the standing room at the rear was uncomfortably packed and people also stood in the side aisles. The programme consisted of Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Brahms's F major symphony, Mozart's "Dove sono" air from the "Marriage of Figaro," a new overture called "Puck" by Strube, the "mad" scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" and Sibelius's tone poem "Finlandia."

It would be futile to seek in this array of musical delights for the secret of the unusual crowd. One thing more must be added, the name of the soloist, the magic name of Melba. That explains everything. Of course there is a large subscription for these afternoon concerts, and there would have been a "good house" in any case, but the addition of those who went merely to hear Melba made the difference between that and what is popularly christened a "record breaker."

Mme. Melba was in splendid voice. Perhaps that single statement is all that is essential to an account of her contribution to the afternoon's proceedings, but the passing comment may be added that her delivery of the Mozart air was not one to give profound satisfaction to those who place a higher estimate on the composer than on a popular singer, nor was her singing of M. Thomas's setting of the fair Ophelia's illusions flawless in its colorature or its style. But these are matters which have never concerned Mme. Melba's admirers. She has frequently sung much better than she did yesterday without arousing any more enthusiasm. Her adorers appear to be content just to hear the sound of her voice and they thus often do her art injustice.

Gustave Strube, the composer of the new "Puck" overture, is, as some music lovers know, one of the first violinists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which estate has already graduated that other distinguished Boston maker of tone poems, Charles Martin Loeffler. New York has already heard several of Mr. Strube's compositions, one of the most notable of them being a fine concert piece for violin beautifully played here by that same Loeffler.

The new "Puck" overture was composed in the winter of 1908 and is dedicated to Conductor Max Fiedler. It is not an attempt to furnish a new prelude to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," but as the composer has said is only an endeavor to portray in tones some sylvan moods, with Puck as a frolic figure. The composition is in what is technically called the "first movement" form, the first movement here being that of the classic sonata. It is therefore prepared to satisfy the requirements of the orthodox who expect certain fashions to accompany the title "overture."

This is not a pretentious work and is therefore not profound. It is unaffectedly tuneful in thematic matter, clearly and agreeably developed and scored with a firm grasp of the idiom of the orchestra. It is an ingratiating composition in a small genre and will serve to please other audiences than that which received it with so many evidences of favor yesterday. Mr. Strube was liberally applauded and several times obliged to acknowledge the approval of his hearers.

The performance of the Schumann overture was one of the most artistic that have been heard in this town. It was entirely free from straining after foreign effects, from that eagerness to thrust upon Schumann's music a manner of expression which in the circumstances must always be abnormal. Schumann is not Strauss and there is no use trying to read him as if he were, yet this city has heard the effort made and has even seemed to think that it was wise.

The performance of the Brahms symphony was very beautiful. It was so clear, so rich in tonal quality, so natural in its treatment of the phrases and so exquisitely balanced that it must have brought the keenest pleasure to all thoughtful hearers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in excellent condition this season. The new concertmeister, Anton Witek, seems to be the man for the place and it is a comfort to see that consummate artist Alwyn Schroeder once more at the head of the 'cellos.

[72]

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York City.

Date NOV 14 1910

Mme Melba Returns.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is as the good old wine that needs no bush, but when Mme Melba after an absence of nearly two years returns as its soloist, then place aux dames!—the day is Melba's. Boston Symphony concerts are never given in this town but that you can be sure every seat in Carnegie Hall is filled, and more or less of the standing room. It was Melba, though, that brought the throng that stood close packed ehind the seats Saturday afternoon and straggled out along the side walls, and it was Melba that made the house echo with cheers after she had soared among the peaks of sound in the "Mad Scene" from Thomas's "Hamlet."

Doubtless there were those present who heard her when like a dazzling star she rose first above the American horizon. That was all but seventeen years ago. More still must have heard her when at the golden moment of her prime she came to the Hammerstein stage in "La Traviata." It wants little of four years since that unforgettable night. Then two more years elapsed before she returned to the same stage in "La Bohème." Naturally when the famous singer, black-robed beneath a great black hat, emerged on Saturday, curiosity was rife as to the incomparable voice.

It may be said at once that the voice is still of marvellous beauty. If the highest notes are inevitably tinged with time, the medium seems richer and fuller than ever, and there is an alto depth as the voice descends. For her first solo Mme Melba sang the Countess's recitative and air from "The Marriage of Figaro" ("E Susanna non vien?" and "Dove sono"). There was once talk at the Manhattan of Mme Melba's assuming the rôle of the Countess, as there had been at the Metropolitan of her undertaking Susanna. As a matter of fact, she has never appeared in a Mozart opera, and she is not familiar here in this excerpt. No doubt she found the occasion a trying ordeal, for she was not herself in the first number. The "Dove sono" she sang in a dry, almost businesslike manner, with a certain competence, of course, but scarcely a hint of the real Mozartean spirit.

Ophelia's "Mad Scene," on the other hand, is one of Mme Melba's war horses. Here she sang with a freedom and buoyancy absent from the Mozart air. It is true her coloratura was not invariably impeccable. Her singing of the scene as a whole, however, was exceedingly brilliant, and, with the voluptuous beauty of her voice, deserved the immense enthusiasm it evoked.

Even apart from the participation of Mme Melba, the concert was one of extraordinary interest. But for the singer the performance of Brahms's third symphony might well have been the feature. It was a glorious performance. Seldom is the heroic opening attacked with such irresistible swing. There were also fine performances of Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck." The latter, a recent work, was played for the first time here. The programme explained that the composer's aim is to portray some sylvan frolic with Puck as the main figure. He has done so very pleasantly indeed. The orchestration is spicily modern (how "Till Eultnspiegel" has set the goblins frolicking), and so, to a sufficient degree, are the harmonies. Mr. Strube, who is one of the first violins of the orchestra, bowed his acknowledgments in response to the applause.

After so much that was exhilarating Sibelius's "Finlandia," concise in form and stirring in its onward tramp, was just the piece to keep the pegs up and send the audience out into the bracing air exultant.

HERALD

New York City.

MME. MELBA SINGS TO GREAT AUDIENCE

Enthusiastic Welcome for the Prima Donna Who Is Soloist of Boston Orchestra Concert.

For the first time this season Mme. Melba, the Australian prima donna, sang to a New York audience yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. If she ever had any doubts about her standing with the music loving public of this city—which she probably never had—they must have been set at rest by the warmth and enthusiasm of her reception.

Mme. Melba appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was giving its first matinee concert of the season, and the audience filed every inch of space in the big auditorium. When she first came on the stage, wearing a striking black gown with black hat and white ostrich plumes, there was great applause. And after she had sung her first number, from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," she was recalled again and again.

But that was mild compared with the demonstration that came after her second number, the mad scene from "Hamlet." The applause would not stop and the prima donna was recalled at least a dozen times. There is a "no encore" rule which prevails at these concerts—that alone prevented her from singing many more numbers.

The Boston orchestra, ably conducted by Mr. Max Fiedler, played a delightful programme in its usual finished and satisfying manner. Chief in importance was a novelty, a comedy overture called "Puck," composed by Mr. G. Strube, one of the violin players. It is a very interesting composition, heard here for the first time, and outlines in tones a sylvan picture of a frolic, with Puck as the central figure. At its conclusion the composer had to bow his thanks.

The rest of the orchestral part of the programme was devoted to Brahms, Schumann and Mr. Sibelius.

The spectres of Sing Sing are always wandering the gloomy corridors. In the next SUNDAY HERALD there will be a story about them.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World.

From

Address New York City

Date NOV 12 1910

MUSIC

"FINLANDIA" STIRS BROOKLYN AUDIENCE

By HARRY CHAPIN PLUMMER.

For the success of the opening con concert of the Boston Symp Orchestra in Brooklyn, present the New Academy of Music in boro, last night, under the auspi of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the conductor of the visiting organization, Max Fielder, depended not upon a "sensation" to be created by the extraordinary mannerisms and unusual attire of a popularly idolized prima donna, but upon the artistic strength of a program of both quality and quantity, which found indoresement in the plaudits of an audience that well night crowded the handsome auditorium. Incidentally, a soprano soloist very well known to the metropolitan public, Mme. James Jomelli, achieved a decided triumph by the exercise of the first principles of her art, simplicity and truth, in the presentatiion of two examples of modern French lyric composition. And quite without recourse to the theatrical as figured in Miss Geraldine Farrar's appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Manhattan concert in Carnegie Music Hall Thursday night.

To conclude, a lengthy, but highly edifying program, Director Fielder chose the symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, which, to quote Phillip Hale, "records the impression of an exile's return home after a long absence." Needless to say, the work, which has attained to great popularity in this country since it introduction five years ago, was given as fit a performance as might be desired. And needless also, to say, the stirring tonal depiction of the inherent protest of the Finland patriot against alien persecution awakened a quick responsive echo in th hearts and minds of the Brooklyn concert-goers who heard it. In few latter day symphonic studies which it has undertaken to present, has the Boston orchestra attained to such brilliancy of expression as was realized in the performance of the Sibelius poem; there were contrasts, masterfully effected; mood, Faithfully suggested; temperament, the temperment of a nation, of a race, skillfully defined. The plaint of that despairing patriot, promptly dwoned in the frenzied allegro of—not joy, but delirium—will ring in my ears and recur in my memory for a long time to come.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture (opus 115), Brahms' Third symphony in F major (opus 90), and the Strauss tone-poem "Don Juan," (opus 20) were the other symphonic offerings of the evening. In each the unified expression and finished delivery of the foremost American band were again and again demonstrated.

Mme. Jomelli was heard in two soli—the "Hymn to Pallas Athene," by Saint-Saens, and Azael's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son." Widely digerent as are these lyrics the soprano contrived so to render them that they impressed de and convincingly the large audienc Pleasing and interesting was the Debussy aria and its accompaniment, but it would be difficult to conceive of anything more complete in true art suggestion than the amazingly vivid illustration conveyed in the stanzas of the Saint-Saens invocation:

"Nos vierges ont charme pareil
Aux vierges des Parathenees,"

—and the brilliant orchestral support thereof.

EVE. GLOBE

New York City.

NOV 11 1910

The Boston Symphony.

THERE were several reasons why Carnegie Hall should be crowded last evening (and crowded it was) for the first local concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the first place Mr. Fiedler led off his programme with the Rachmaninoff E minor symphony, which has just been stirring up a summer storm in November Boston. Then the infallibly interesting Miss Farrar was down for two unfamiliar airs, one by a certain Isouard, of whom it is safe to say half the audience had never heard before, and one by none other than Mozart. There was also the exciting rumor that two harpischords were to be on the stage at once to cope with the string band in Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto. Perhaps even a few dropped in for the purpose of hearing Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, which proved not an anticlimax, even after the thrilling procession that went before.

Boston has taken this Rachmaninoff symphony in E minor more deeply to heart than any symphony introduced there since Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique." Already two public rehearsals and two concerts of its symphony orchestra have made it their main offering this autumn. To New York it was not altogether new last night. The Russian Symphony Society played it here last January. But the performance yesterday, a superb example of orchestral virtuosity, presented it in a new light. Hardly any music so played could fail to impress an audience, and this particular music lends itself well to a brilliant performance. It is uncommonly melodious for these days, and it adheres closely enough to tradition formulas to be easily followed at a first hearing. The first two movements, particularly the second allegro—which is really the scherzo—are the strongest of the work, though beauty and power are also in the finale. The adagio seemed somewhat banal and unconscionably long. It was enthusiastically applauded, however. At the close of the symphony Mr. Fielder was recalled repeatedly, until finally he motioned the orchestra to stand and share with him the approval of the audience. In the passages for solo violin Mr. Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, who had a round of applause on his entrance, was heard here for the first time.

Miss Farrar, the slim Juliet of yore, returns to us a Juno, but a Juno clad like Amneris or Thais, or, rather, a little of each. Isouard, who flourished a century ago and is scarce remembered now, provided her with her first solo, "Ah! pour moi quelle peine extrême" from "Jeannot et Colin." Miss Farrar sang it in charming style, but some overanxious friend must have warned her that singers have been singing flat here this year. After she had departed for the time being two harpsichords that had been lurking at opposite sides of the stage were wheeled together, two performers seated themselves at the two keyboards, and Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto went its vigorous way. In fact, so vigorous were the united strings that the tinkle of the harpsichords emerged only semi-occasionally. In Boston a single harpsichord was found no match for the string orchestra. Here two seemed not appreciably better. Mr. Mahler's harpsichord-piano may be scarcely pleasant to listen to, but at least it can be heard.

Miss Farrar returned for the Mozart solo—a recitative and air probably sung first by the tenor Adamberger, which Miss Farrar dug out and Dr. Muck edited for her use last summer. It is beautiful music—what music by Mozart is not?—and in it Miss Farrar's voice was of better quality than in her previous solo. A fine performance of the "Egmont" overture closed a concert that was decidedly sensational—that is, for a concert from Boston.

EVE. BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its series of five concerts at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, still with Max Fiedler as conductor, and Madame Melba, who, it is announced, is to make her only appearance in Philadelphia this season, as soloist. For this concert Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of unusual interest, opening with Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," the symphony being the No. 3 of Brahms, in F-major, Op. 90. The instrumental novelty of the program will be the comedy overture, "Puck," by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, whose music is frequently played in Europe, it is said, and whom Mr. Fiedler is introducing to this country, the "Puck" overture having been played in Boston with marked success. The program concludes with the "Tannhauser" overture. Melba will appear twice, singing first the aria "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, and, as the fifth ad next to the last number, the florid Mad Scene from Thomas's "Hamlet."

[73]

STANDARD UNION,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
NOV 11 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO-NIGHT

Louis C. Elson Gives Preparatory Lecture Recital at Academy of Music.

ARCHITECTURE OF HOME.

First of Series of Five Lectures By Prof. Warren.

The usual lecture recital preparatory to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon with the programme of to-night's Philharmonic Concert in the opera house, Academy of Music, as its subject. Like the concert, it is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. It was in the lecture hall of the Academy and the place was crowded. Louis C. Elson, of Boston, was the lecturer, using one piano for the themes and in aid of his explanatory information, and Alfred De Voto was the assisting artist, playing on another piano and giving great enjoyment by his beautiful interpretation of the music.

The programmes had not arrived from Boston in time for the lecture, but Mr. Elson's full description of the music made their absence but little felt. Only the orchestral music was taken up, though Mr. Elson assured the audience they would admire the "Hymn to Pallas Athene," by Saint Saens, which Mme. Jeanne Jomelli is to contribute to to-night's programme and which will then be heard for the first time in this country. The other numbers will be the overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115, Schumann; the Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90, by Brahms; tone poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, Strauss; recitative and aria from the lyric scene, "The Prodigal Son," Debussy, and "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7, by Sibelius.

Mr. Elson said much about the symphony form and the changes introduced during his interesting discussion of the Brahms Symphony, and he took up each selection in detail, pointing out the contrasting color of the themes, and in the Brahms the contrast between the masculine or dominant theme and the feminine or subordinate theme. He spoke also of the melodic quality present in this composition by "the third great B in German music," the others being Bach and Beethoven.

n AMERICAN
ress New York City.

MELBA DELIGHTS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

A Concert Glorified by Great Music and Noble Singing.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Every seat was filled and a hundred or more stood unmurmuringly at the first afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It took place yesterday, at Carnegie Halls, and will be marked with a white stone in many memories. Great music—besides some less great, though enjoyable—had been provided for the occasion. It was greatly played.

Nor was that all. To fill the measure of our bliss, we had Nellie Melba as the soloist of the day. Melba, come back to us after a two years' absence.

The Third Symphony of Brahams formed the most solid part of the programme. It is a work which has some of the qualities of Beethoven. These are beautiful—and others, not so beautiful, which must be credited to Brahms alone.

The alternate suavity and nobility of the opening movement and the lovely sentiment of the second movement charm one. By contrast all the rest seems dull and dry.

The orchestra, which was in its best form, gave a magnificent interpretation of the symphony, bringing out every delicacy of the composition without sacrificing one iota of breadth. Rarely have the Boston wood-winds and brasses seemed more satisfying than yesterday.

The purely instrumental part of the concert was completed by the Schumann Overture to "Manfred," the "Finlandia" of Sibelius and a novelty, in the shape of a "Puck" comedy overture, by Mr. Strube, a member of the orchestra. Mr. Strube's Puck is half German, half Japanese. He has surely sat at the feet of Cio-Cio-San at Yokohama, and he has gambolled in the homes of the Black Forest. He trips merrily enough at timse, but somewhat heavily. The audience liked the novelty and aplauded its inventor.

The songs which Mme. Melba contributed to the concert were not novelties. She has sung them often to us. But the "Dove Song" of Mozart (from "Le Nozze di Figaro") and the "Mad Scene," from the "Hamlet" of Ambroise Thomas, will be welcome whenever they are interpreted by so marvellous and fine a voice as Melba's.

Time has been kind to the Australian prima donna since she was last heard here. Physically Mme. Melba has changed little. To be quite honest, her voice has lost some—not much—of its old crystalline loveliness. But it is still unique, so far as I know, in its tonal power, its purity and volume.

There were times in the Mozartian recitative and in the opening of the "Ophelia" scene when the great voice was so perfectly controlled as once. There were moments when Mme. Melba had to juggle with some nasty run or phrase. But her rendering of the "Mad Scene" was a wonderful example of what art, with a rare voice and long experience, can accomplish for our pleasure.

om HERALD
dress Washington, D. C. te NOV 9 - 1910

IN THE SOCIAL WORLD

First Concert of the Season Attracts Smart Audience.

MRS. TAFT OCCUPIES A BOX

Wears Fashionable Gown of Wistaria Broadcloth, with Large Hat to Match, While Theater Contains a Number of Distinguished Statesmen and Diplomats.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew out the first real society reunion of the season yesterday at the National Theater. The house contained an unprecedented number of distinquished statesmen and diplomats and their families. Mrs. Taft occupied the President's box, accompanied by Mrs. MacVeagh, wife of the Secretary of the Treasury; Assistant Secretary of War Gen. Robert Shaw Oliver and Mrs. Oliver, and Mrs. A. Garrison McClintock. Mrs. Taft wore a fashionable gown of wistaria broadcloth, with a large hat of felt of a paler shade, with several deeper toned plumes.

Mrs. L. Z. Leiter had the corresponding box on the opposite side of the house, and had with her Gen. and Mrs. Ernst, Dr. and Mrs. B. M. Randolph, and Mrs. Norman Williams. Mrs. Hitt, widow of Representative R. R. Hitt, occupied the box of Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Williams, who have not yet returned to Washington. She had with her Mrs. Boardman, Miss Mabel Boardman, and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. S. R. Reynolds Hitt, wife of the United States Minister to Venezuela, who is with her for a time. Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner were in their customary box, with an interesting party. Dr. and Mrs. Loring had the box of Mrs. James McMillan, who has not yet returned to the city. They were accompanied by Mrs. Goldsborough and Miss Mary Goldsborough and Miss Loring.

Others in the audience were Mrs. Wickersham and Mrs. Aiken, wife and daughter of the Attorney General; Mrs. Dickinson, wife of the Secretary of War, who has just returned from a trip around the world; the Italian Ambassador, Marchese Confalonieri; the Danish Minister, Count Moltke; the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand; Countess von Bernstorff, wife of the German Ambassador; the Minister from the Netherlands and Mrs. Loudon; Mrs. James Harriman, Mrs. Hinckley and Miss Gladys Hinckley, Mrs. Haywood and Miss Doris Haywood, Mrs. Stoddard, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Walcott, Mrs. Huron W. Lawson, nee Kaspar; Mrs. Stilson Hutchins, Senator and Mrs. Newlands, Mrs. F. B. Moran and daughter, Mrs. Hudgins; Mrs. W. B. King, Mrs. Gale, Mrs. Hill, Mrs. Richardson and Miss Richardson, Mrs. Kerr, Miss Harlan, and Mrs. John B. Henderson.

From TIMES
Address Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 9 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT

Musical Season in Full Swing With Series of Notable Events.

Beside furnishing two hours of unalloyed delight for an audience that taxed the capacity of the National Theater yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a program of more than usual interest to the musical student.

For the symphony the orchestra, conducted by Max Fielder, played the neglected Brahms Second Symphony. The symphony is distinctive among the works for that composer, for it is easily understood and lacks the mystical quality of many of his other compositions. It is marked by grace of movement rather than by forcefulness and was splendidly adapted to show that delicate shading for which the Boston orchestra is notable.

Late comers, who were not seated until the end of the first number, in accordance with an admirable rule enforced for the past few seasons at these concerts, missed one of the most delightful selections in the overture to Schumann's essay in the operatic field, "Genoveva." The number is rich in coloring in striking contrast to the severely precise scoring of the symphony.

The soloist yesterday was Miss Margaret Keyes, possessed of a voice of sweetness. She sang an aria from "Orfeo" and was heard again in the charming "Penelope's Lament," from "Odysseus."

The severely classical trend of the program was broken by a number given for the first time in Washington, the comedy overture, "Puck," which won instant demonstrations of approval. The audience was not satisfied until the composer, a member of the orchestra, bowed his acknowledgements.

A fitting climax to the program was the martial "Finlanda," by Sibelius, described as a "Symphonic Poem for Orchestra." The number may not have accomplished all the program claimed for it in depicting Finland national life, but it added a touch of dash and spirit to the program.

The opening of the musical season will be followed in quick succession by a series of musical events. This afternoon the Bostonia Sextette Club opened a concert series at the Columbia, tomorrow the consolidated Washington Symphony will give its first program under its new auspices and on Friday afternoon Mme. Marcella Sembrich is to sing at the National. J. R. H.

om POST
ress Washington, D. C.
te NOV 9 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

First Musical Event of the Season Attracts Large Audience to National.

If the first week of the musical season is an earnest of the year's pleasures, 1910-11 is destined to bring harmonic surfeit. The opening attraction, which was the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National yesterday afternoon, is to be followed this afternoon by the Bostonia Sextet, with the Washington Symphony giving its first recital since its consolidation with the Hammer Orchestra Thursday afternoon, while the fourth event of the week will be Mme. Sembrich's noteworthy recital Friday.

The prodigality of the week's attractions did not affect the size of the audience for the initial concert of the thirtieth season of the Boston Symphony in Washington, however. And the program was followed with the keenest interest at the National, Herr Fiedler conducting.

The symphony for the afternoon was Brahms' work in D major, a musical creation which does not rank among the world's greatest symphonic compositions from an imaginative standpoint, but its delightfully pleasing qualities, and especially the nimble beauties of the scherzo, were so brilliantly interpreted as to arouse much enthusiasm.

The novelty on the program was Gustav ...'s whimsical comedy overture ..." which had its first performance ...arch in Boston. It was the first ...hat the merry musical conceit, de... in the program as a sylvan pic... in the form of a sonata, had been heard in Washington, and it was greeted with spirited applause, the composer, a member of the orchestra, being forced to bow his appreciation many times.

The soloist, Miss Margaret Keyes, sang two arias—the "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and "Penelope's Lament," from Bruch's "Odysseus." Both were given with rare clarity of tone, sympathy, and pleasing method. Miss Keyes has a rich contralto of appealing quality, and her two numbers were admirably chosen to display her natural gifts.

The concert opened with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," which many were unfortunate in missing, as the regulation of former seasons, permitting no one to enter the auditorium during the rendition of a number, was rigidly enforced.

Sibelius' brilliant symphonic poem "Finlandia" closed a delightful program.

om HERALD
ldress Washington, D. C.
ite NOV 13 '10

Last week marked the opening of the concert season, and an auspicious opening it was. The Boston Symphony, with an unprecedented prospect, gave its concert on Tuesday afternoon with Margaret Keys, contralto, as the soloist. Much enthusiasm was justly shown by the audience, for the Boston Symphony never played better. The programme was a credit to the conductor, Max Fiedler, and a rare treat to the music-loving audience which filled the house. The reading of the Brahms Symphony was masterly, and the beautiful work of the violins would be hard to surpass. There was no lack of "temperament" displayed and an abundance of exquisite refinement. The comedy overture, "Puck," by Strube, played for the first time in Washington, was a pronounced success. It is dainty, melodious, graceful, and full of pictures. The composer was called out from the orchestra to receive a portion of the enthusiastic applause, for he is one of the violins of the orchestra, and came modestly from the back rows of the players, in response to Mr. Fiedler's request. It is a splendid programme number, and another Strube work will be looked for with interest. Miss Keyes showed better style in her first number, the ever beautiful "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," than in her second, "Penelope's Lament," from "Odysseus," although the voice showed off better in the second number. It is a mezzo quality, rich and melodious, but not great, and with proper study she would become a beautiful singer. The next concert of the Boston Symphony will be December 6 with Josef Hofman as soloist.

ss Washington, D. C.
NOV - 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM IS OUT

Schumann Overture First Member of Brilliant Musical Array.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

This year marks the sixth successive season the orchestra has visited Washington. The five concerts are among the most important musical and social events of the season.

Max Fielder has arranged a program of brilliancy with which to open the season and the management offers as soloist Miss Margaret Keyes, one of the leading contraltos on the concert stage.

The first number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." This will be followed by Brahms' Second Symphony in D-Major. This was the first of his symphonies to win general approval, and today is one of the most popular works of its kind in musical literature.

The other orchestral numbers will be a comedy overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, and a tone poem by Sibelius, entitled "Finlandia." Although a German by birth and training, Mr. Strube leans strongly toward the modern French school, especially in the matter of orchestration, and his works have taken a high place in orchestral literature.

Miss Keyes will sing two numbers; the first will be the familiar "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the second the aria from Max Bruch's "Odvesseus," entitled "Penelope's Lament."

om EVE. STAR
ddress Washington, D. C.
ate NOV 9 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The large audience which enjoyed the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Washington series testified to the keen interest felt by this city in musical performances which offer programs of merit efficiently presented. Following Schumann's overture to "Genooeva," Brahm's Symphony in D Major was received with appreciation. Strube's overture "Puck" had in addition to its masterful presentation of effects the charm of musical guyety. The conductor, Max Fiedler, was heartily welcomed. The soloist yesterday afternoon was Miss Margaret Keyes, who sang "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo" and "Penelope's Lament," from Bruch's "Odysseus." Her fine contralto voice was heard with sympathetic pleasure and discriminating approval. The closing number was "Finlandia," a work of poetic as well as musical significance by Sibelius.

[74]

STANDARD UNION,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
ss
NOV 11 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO-NIGHT

Louis C. Elson Gives Preparatory Lecture Recital at Academy of Music.

ARCHITECTURE OF HOME.

First of Series of Five Lectures By Prof. Warren.

The usual lecture recital preparatory to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon with the programme of to-night's Philharmonic Concert in the opera house, Academy of Music, as its subject. Like the concert, it is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. It was in the lecture hall of the Academy and the place was crowded. Louis C. Elson, of Boston, was the lecturer, using one piano for the themes and in aid of his explanatory information, and Alfred De Voto was the assisting artist, playing on another piano and giving great enjoyment by his beautiful interpretation of the music.

The programmes had not arrived from Boston in time for the lecture, but Mr. Elson's full description of the music made their absence but little felt. Only the orchestral music was taken up, though Mr. Elson assured the audience they would admire the "Hymn to Pallas Athene," by Saint Saens, which Mme. Jeanne Jomelli is to contribute to to-night's programme, and which will then be heard for the first time in this country. The other numbers will be the overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115, Schumann; the Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90, by Brahms; tone poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, Strauss; recitative and aria from the lyric scene, "The Prodigal Son," Debussy, and "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7, by Sibelius.

Mr. Elson said much about the symphony form and the changes introduced during his interesting discussion of the Brahms Symphony, and he took up each selection in detail, pointing out the contrasting color of the themes, and in the Brahms the contrast between the masculine or dominant theme and the feminine or subordinate theme. He spoke also of the melodic quality present in this composition by "the third great B in German music," the others being Bach and Beethoven.

n AMERICAN
ress New York City.

MELBA DELIGHTS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

A Concert Glorified by Great Music and Noble Singing.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Every seat was filled and a hundred or more stood unmurmuringly at the first afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It took place yesterday, at Carnegie Halls, and will be marked with a white stone in many memories. Great music—besides some less great, though enjoyable—had been provided for the occasion. It was greatly played.

Nor was that all. To fill the measure of our bliss, we had Nellie Melba as the soloist of the day. Melba, come back to us after a two years' absence.

The Third Symphony of Brahams formed the most solid part of the programme. It is a work which has some of the qualities of Beethoven. These are beautiful—and others, not so beautiful, which must be credited to Brahms alone.

The alternate suavity and nobility of the opening movement and the lovely sentiment of the second movement charm one. By contrast all the rest seems dull and dry.

The orchestra, which was in its best form, gave a magnificent interpretation of the symphony, bringing out every delicacy of the composition without sacrificing one iota of breadth. Rarely have the Boston wood-winds and brasses seemed more satisfying than yesterday.

The purely instrumental part of the concert was completed by the Schumann Overture to "Manfred," the "Finlandia" of Sibelius and a novelty, in the shape of a "Puck" comedy overture, by Mr. Strube, a member of the orchestra. Mr. Strube's Puck is half German, half Japanese. He has surely sat at the feet of Cio-Cio-San at Yokohama, and he has gambolled in the homes of the Black Forest. He trips merrily enough at timse, but somewhat heavily. The audience liked the novelty and aplauded its inventor.

The songs which Mme. Melba contributed to the concert were not novelties. She has sung them often to us. But the "Dove Song" of Mozart (from "Le Nozze di Figaro") and the "Mad Scene," from the "Hamlet" of Ambroise Thomas, will be welcome whenever they are interpreted by so marvellous and fine a voice as Melba's.

Time has been kind to the Australian prima donna since she was last heard here. Physically Mme. Melba has changed little. To be quite honest, her voice has lost some—not much—of its old crystalline loveliness. But it is still unique, so far as I know, in its tonal power, its purity and volume.

There were times in the Mozartian recitative and in the opening of the "Ophelia" scene when the great voice was so perfectly controlled as once. There were moments when Mme. Melba had to juggle with some nasty run or phrase. But her rendering of the "Mad Scene" was a wonderful example of what art, with a rare voice and long experience, can accomplish for our pleasure.

om HERALD
dress Washington, D. C. te NOV 9 - 1910

IN THE SOCIAL WORLD

First Concert of the Season Attracts Smart Audience.

MRS. TAFT OCCUPIES A BOX

Wears Fashionable Gown of Wistaria Broadcloth, with Large Hat to Match, While Theater Contains a Number of Distinguished Statesmen and Diplomats.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew out the first real society reunion of the season yesterday at the National Theater. The house contained an unprecedented number of distinquished statesmen and diplomats and their families. Mrs. Taft occupied the President's box, accompanied by Mrs. MacVeagh, wife of the Secretary of the Treasury; Assistant Secretary of War Gen. Robert Shaw Oliver and Mrs. Oliver, and Mrs. A. Garrison McClintock. Mrs. Taft wore a fashionable gown of wistaria broadcloth, with a large hat of felt of a paler shade, with several deeper toned plumes.

Mrs. L. Z. Leiter had the corresponding box on the opposite side of the house, and had with her Gen. and Mrs. Ernst, Dr. and Mrs. B. M. Randolph, and Mrs. Norman Williams. Mrs. Hitt, widow of Representative R. R. Hitt, occupied the box of Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Williams, who have not yet returned to Washington. She had with her Mrs. Boardman, Miss Mabel Boardman, and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. S. R. Reynolds Hitt, wife of the United States Minister to Venezuela, who is with her for a time. Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner were in their customary box, with an interesting party. Dr. and Mrs. Loring had the box of Mrs. James McMillan, who has not yet returned to the city. They were accompanied by Mrs. Goldsborough and Miss Mary Goldsborough and Miss Loring.

Others in the audience were Mrs. Wickersham and Mrs. Aiken, wife and daughter of the Attorney General; Mrs. Dickinson, wife of the Secretary of War, who has just returned from a trip around the world; the Italian Ambassador, Marchese Confalonieri; the Danish Minister, Count Moltke; the French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand; Countess von Bernstorff, wife of the German Ambassador; the Minister from the Netherlands and Mrs. Loudon; Mrs. James Harriman, Mrs. Hinckley and Miss Gladys Hinckley, Mrs. Haywood and Miss Doris Haywood, Mrs. Stoddard, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Walcott, Mrs. Huron W. Lawson, nee Kaspar; Mrs. Stilson Hutchins, Senator and Mrs. Newlands, Mrs. F. B. Moran and daughter, Mrs. Hudgins; Mrs. W. B. King, Mrs. Gale, Mrs. Hill, Mrs. Richardson and Miss Richardson, Mrs. Kerr, Miss Harlan, and Mrs. John B. Henderson.

From TIMES
Address Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 9 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT

ork, 1884

Musical Season in Full Swing With Series of Notable Events.

Beside furnishing two hours of unalloyed delight for an audience that taxed the capacity of the National Theater yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a program of more than usual interest to the musical student.

For the symphony the orchestra, conducted by Max Fielder, played the neglected Brahms Second Symphony. The symphony is distinctive among the works for that composer, for it is easily understood and lacks the mystical quality of many of his other compositions. It is marked by grace of movement rather than by forcefulness and was splendidly adapted to show that delicate shading for which the Boston orchestra is notable.

Late comers, who were not seated until the end of the first number, in accordance with an admirable rule enforced for the past few seasons at these concerts, missed one of the most delightful selections in the overture to Schumann's essay in the operatic field, "Genoveva." The number is rich in coloring in striking contrast to the severely precise scoring of the symphony.

The soloist yesterday was Miss Margaret Keyes, possessed of a voice of sweetness. She sang an aria from "Orfeo" and was heard again in the charming "Penelope's Lament," from "Odysseus."

The severely classical trend of the program was broken by a number given for the first time in Washington, the comedy overture, "Puck," which won instant demonstrations of approval. The audience was not satisfied until the composer, a member of the orchestra, bowed his acknowledgements.

A fitting climax to the program was the martial "Finlanda," by Sibelius, described as a "Symphonic Poem for Orchestra." The number may not have accomplished all the program claimed for it in depicting Finland national life, but it added a touch of dash and spirit to the program.

The opening of the musical season will be followed in quick succession by a series of musical events. This afternoon the Eostonia Sextette Club opened a concert series at the Columbia; tomorrow the consolidated Washington Symphony will give its first program under its new auspices and on Friday afternoon Mme. Marcella Sembrich is to sing at the National. J. R. H.

om HERALD
ldress Washington, D. C.
ite NOV 13 09

Last week marked the opening of the concert season, and an auspicious opening it was. The Boston Symphony, with an unprecedented prospect, gave its concert on Tuesday afternoon with Margaret Keys, contralto, as the soloist. Much enthusiasm was justly shown by the audience, for the Boston Symphony never played better. The programme was a credit to the conductor, Max Fiedler, and a rare treat to the music-loving audience which filled the house. The reading of the Brahms Symphony was masterly, and the beautiful work of the violins would be hard to surpass. There was no lack of "temperament" displayed and an abundance of exquisite refinement. The comedy overture, "Puck," by Strube, played for the first time in Washington, was a pronounced success. It is dainty, melodious, graceful, and full of pictures. The composer was called out from the orchestra to receive a portion of the enthusiastic applause, for he is one of the violins of the orchestra, and came modestly from the back rows of the players, in response to Mr. Fiedler's request. It is a splendid programme number, and another Strube work will be looked for with interest. Miss Keyes showed better style in her first number, the ever beautiful "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," than in her second, "Penelope's Lament," from "Odysseus," although the voice showed off better in the second number. It is a mezzo quality, rich and melodious, but not great, and with proper study she would become a beautiful singer. The next concert of the Boston Symphony will be December 6 with Josef Hofman as soloist.

k, 188

TIMES
ss Washington, D. C.
NOV - 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM IS OUT

188

Schumann Overture First Member of Brilliant Musical Array.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

This year marks the sixth successive season the orchestra has visited Washington. The five concerts are among the most important musical and social events of the season.

Max Fielder has arranged a program of brilliancy with which to open the season and the management offers as soloist Miss Margaret Keyes, one of the leading contraltos on the concert stage.

The first number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." This will be followed by Brahms' Second Symphony in D-Major. This was the first of his symphonies to win general approval, and today is one of the most popular works of its kind in musical literature.

The other orchestral numbers will be a comedy overture entitled "Puck," by Gustav Strube, and a tone poem by Sibelius, entitled "Finlandia." Although a German by birth and training, Mr. Strube leans strongly toward the modern French school, especially in the matter of orchestration, and his works have taken a high place in orchestral literature.

Miss Keyes will sing two numbers; the first will be the familiar "'Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the second the aria from Max Bruch's "Odvesseus," entitled "Penelope's Lament."

[74]

om EVE. STAR ddress Wash
ate NOV

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The large audience which enjoyed the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Washington series testified to the keen interest felt by this city in musical performances which offer programs of merit efficiently presented. Following Schumann's overture to "Genooeva," Brahm's Symphony in D Major was received with appreciation. Strube's overture "Puck" had in addition to its masterful presentation of effects the charm of musical gayety. The conductor, Max Fiedler, was heartily welcomed. The soloist yesterday afternoon was Miss Margaret Keyes, who sang "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo" and "Penelope's Lament," from Bruch's "Odysseus." Her fine contralto voice was heard with sympathetic pleasure and discriminating approval. The closing number was "Finlandia," a work of poetic as well as musical significance by Sibelius.

m POST
ress Washington, D. C.
te NOV 9 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

First Musical Event of the Season Attracts Large Audience to National.

If the first week of the musical season is an earnest of the year's pleasures, 1910-11 is destined to bring harmonic surfeit. The opening attraction, which was the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National yesterday afternoon, is to be followed this afternoon by the Bostonia Sextet, with the Washington Symphony giving its first recital since its consolidation with the Hammer Orchestra Thursday afternoon, while the fourth event of the week will be Mme. Sembrich's noteworthy recital Friday.

18

The prodigality of the week's attractions did not affect the size of the audience for the initial concert of the thirtieth season of the Boston Symphony in Washington, however. And the program was followed with the keenest interest at the National, Herr Fiedler conducting.

The symphony for the afternoon was Brahms' work in D major, a musical creation which does not rank among the world's greatest symphonic compositions from an imaginative standpoint, but its delightfully pleasing qualities, and especially the nimble beauties of the scherzo, were so brilliantly interpreted as to arouse much enthusiasm.

The novelty on the program was Gustav Strube's whimsical comedy overture, "Puck," which had its first performance last March in Boston. It was the first time that the merry musical conceit, described in the program as a sylvan picture in the form of a sonata, had been heard in Washington, and it was greeted with spirited applause, the composer, a member of the orchestra, being forced to bow his appreciation many times.

The soloist, Miss Margaret Keyes, sang two arias—the "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and "Penelope's Lament," from Bruch's "Odysseus." Both were given with rare clarity of tone, sympathy, and pleasing method. Miss Keyes has a rich contralto of appealing quality, and her two numbers were admirably chosen to display her natural gifts.

The concert opened with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," which many were unfortunate in missing, as the regulation of former seasons, permitting no one to enter the auditorium during the rendition of a number, was rigidly enforced.

Sibelius' brilliant symphonic poem "Finlandia" closed a delightful program.

EYE. BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 8 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last Night's Concert With Madame Melba as Soloist

With Madame Melba as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its twenty-sixth season in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music last evening, playing before an audience as large as the house would hold. Many persons were turned away, in fact, the crowd which besieged the doors, unable to gain admittance, pushing and scrambling in a manner that for a time seemed to be verging upon a riot. Quiet was soon restored, however, for some time before time for the concert to begin it was announced that every seat had been sold, and as the "No standing" rule is still enforced at the Academy, scores of people were disappointed.

The orchestra alone, as it was heard last evening, would have been a treat such as rarely is enjoyed, but with the addition of the famous prima donna, who was in the best of voice, and who appeared twice on the program, the concert was one long to be treasured in memory by all who heard it. The first number was Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," which was brilliantly played, with a purity and sparkling quality of tone, and a precision and one-ness of execution, that proved fairly a revelation of instrumental skill.

The Brahms symphony No. 3 followed, having an interpretation that revealed new beauties in the massive and imposing work. Its beauty, its majesty, and, withal, its sympathy, give this noble composition a wonderful charm—an appeal that stirs to the depths the musical soul. The first and last movements are of heroic mould, while the andante is exquisite in its hymn-like solemnity and poetic beauty, and in place of the usual scherzo there is a third movement in which the spirit of romance prevails, the liveliness of the customary scherzo, with its touch of jolliness and piquancy, being absent. There is no suggestion of gloom; however, even in the heart-searching andante, for the symphony as a whole, while impressive in its strength and grandeur, is not tragic. It is heroic, but not fateful; sounding, rather, the song of triumph and the paean of victory. The superb interpretation received the enthusiastic recognition of the audience, and Mr. Fiedler, who conducted with his characteristic ease, discernment and fine musicianship, twice signalled all the men to rise, and, in a body, acknowledge the prolonged applause.

The real instrumental novelty of the program was the "Puck" overture, by G. Strube, one of the violinists of the orchestra. The composition is in the modern style, descriptive in character, though not written as "program music." It tells in tonal phrases of the prankish doings of the mischievous Puck, and is ingenious, musically alluring and skilfully constructed. It resembles somewhat the compositions of Richard Strauss, such, for instance, as "Till Eulenspiegel," though less complicated and not so much given to bizarre effects. There is originality in its measures, however, and much in the way of real melody and sound musical worth. It was received with marked favor, the composer being compelled to rise several times and make his bow. The concluding number was the "Tannhauser" overture, which had a notable interpretation.

Several changes are noticed in the personnel of the orchestra this season, among them being the substitution of A. Witek as concert master, in place of Willy Hess, who resigned to fill an important position in Europe. Mr. Witek is a man of typical German apearance, large, full-featured, with bushy black hair and a mustache—quite the opposite of Mr. Hess, who is tall, slender and of an artistic intellectual personality. The new concert master comes with high recommendations, and his work last evening fully proved his capability. Another change is in the position of first 'cello player, the veteran Alwin Schroeder having returned to fill that important place.

Although the orchestra did so much to make the concert a notable one, the appearance of Melba was, after all, the event of the evening. The great cantatrice, looking quite as youthful as when last here two years ago, when she was heard in opera as a member of the Hammerstein company, was attired in a gorgeous gown of dark green satin, embroidered and much bedecked with sparkling ornaments, and wore a wonderful necklace and pendant of diamonds. Her reception was enthusiastic, and after both numbers she was recalled again and again, the applause, in fact, being annoyingly persistent and prolonged. It was evident that many persons in the audience were ignorant of the rule against encores, and were bound not to give up. But they finally were compelled to do so, for Melba sang only the two numbers named on the program—the recitative, "How Susanna Delays!" and the aria, "Flown Forever," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the Mad Scene from "Hamlet," by Ambroise Thomas. There is nothing gone from Melba's voice that ever was there. It is as limpid, as fresh, as mellow and as sweet as it was years ago, and her tones last night seemed to reveal new beauties. In the florid Mad Scene she was at her best, singing with touching pathos, wonderful facility of execution and great brilliancy. It was small wonder that the audience went into raptures, and there was some excuse even for those who permitted their enthusiasm to carry them away. There is but one Melba, and it was announced that she would not appear in Philadelphia again this season, nor, in fact, for at least two years. The orchestra will give its second concert on Monday evening, December 5, with Josef Hofmann as soloist.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

ess NOV 8 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S FIRST CONCERT

Madame Melba the Soloist with Brahms' No. 3, in F Major, the Symphony.

Program.

Schumann—Overture to Byron's "Manfred"
Brahms—Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90.
Mozart. Aria, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Strube—Comedy. Overture. "Puck."
Thomas.....Mad Scene from "Hamlet"
Wagner.....Overture, "Tannhauser"
Soloist, Madame Melba.

Conductor Max Fiedler.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its twenty-sixth season in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music last evening. The soloist was Madame Melba. Usually at the first concert no soloist is employed, but in order to keep faith with the Philadelphia subscribers, and to fit the limited engagements in this country of the great Australian soprano, Madame Melba was on the program for two of her first concert numbers, a recitative and aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" and the "Mad Scene" from "Hamlet." The double attraction of the opening concert, the Boston Symphony and Madame Melba's only appearance here this season in concert, attracted an audience that was limited only to the capacity of the house. And in enthusiasm it was one of the most marked of any given in Philadelphia in a number of years.

Madame Melba's first number followed the playing of the Symphony. It was the little heard here "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro," preceded by the recitative. Although this is a favorite number with the singer, it is not of the character to give a liberal display of her great vocal powers. It is, however, full of dainty and sweet melody and was sung in so charming a way that the singer was called out repeatedly and was presented with a number of flowers. She sung again, following the "Puck" overture, the "Mad Scene" from "Hamlet" which, in point of brilliancy and opportunity for vocal display, is an operatic number surpassed by no other. After a season of comparative rest, Melba was in amazing voice last evening to bring out the full vocal beauties of this difficult aria, and the exquisite wealth of pure silver tone seemed to flow as easy and as enchanting as ever. Every note was sure and, when necessary, each tone was rounded out, displaying that she still retained her wonderful resources of volume. The audience fairly rose to the singer and demanded her reappearance time and again in the hopes of enticing more from her, but to no avail.

Symphony Stirs Audience.

The concert was opened with the Schumann overture to Byron's "Manfred." This is a somber work, in many respects, presenting all those technical difficulties into which Conductor Fiedler loves to become entangled to demonstrate with what ease he and his men are able to extricate themselves, and they did so fully to their credit last evening, as was expressed by the tremendous applause at its finish.

Brahms' No. 3 Symphony is not an overly-long composition, nor is it of such a character to stir an audience as does his No. 1, nor even his No. 2. The first movement was received rather coldly, but the second (Andante) movement went tripping along at so tuneful and enticing a rate, that warm applause followed its finish. Throughout the entire Symphony, however, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra played with such precision and intelligence that when the crushing outbursts of the fourth movement were finished they had stirred the audience to a great height of enthusiasm, and not only the conductor was led frequently to recognize it, but he compelled the Orchestra to stand to receive with him the credit.

Violinist as Composer.

The fourth number of the program was a composition new to Philadelphia. It is a comedy overture entitled "Puck," written by one of the violinists of the orchestra, Gustave Strube, and dedicated to the Conductor. It is full of witching spirit of the rascally imp, and the composer has embodied through it descriptive music which will undoubtedly live. It was enthusiastically received, and Mr. Strube, who sat in the very rear of the first violins, was compelled to bow, from his almost hidden position, a number of times, and finally had to come before the conductor's platform, where he received quite an ovation and a hearty hand-shake from Mr. Fiedler.

The concert closed with the "Tannhauser" Overture, which was played in the Orchestra's very best style, and was an admirable finish to one of the most delightful concerts ever given by the Boston Symphony in this city. Their next concert will be at the Academy on Monday evening, December 5, with Josef Hofmann as soloist.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

ss NOV 8 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Madame Melba the Soloist in an Impressive Performance.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, "Manfred".....Schumann
Symphony No. 3.....Brahms
Recitative and Aria, "Dove Sono" from "Figaro".....Mozart
Madame Melba.
Comedy Overture, "Puck".....Strube
Mad Scene from "Hamlet".....Thomas
Madame Melba.
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

The first of its Philadelphia series of five concerts was offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy to an audience quite as distinguished as any of those called forth by the operas of yester-year, and occupying practically every seat in the auditorium. Madame Melba, the announced soloist of the evening, has a large and loyal Philadelphia following, and the orchestra during the 25 previous seasons of its performances here, has earned its liberal present-day support.

The first two numbers of the programme left the audience rather cold—the first real applause came after the charming allegretto that constitutes the third movement of the nobly austere symphony. The audience manifestly was saving its enthusiasm for the prima donna. Her performance was, as it were, the ice-breaker for the subsequent portion of the programme. There was no lack of appreciation of the superlative delicacy, the refined and chastened elegance of the interpretation of the overture; the scholarly reading of the Brahms symphony, with the extraordinary unanimity of the several choirs in the production of a single composite tone, was received with reverent attention; but there was no real enthusiasm until Madame Melba's first contribution to the programme satisfied the eager expectancy of her admirers that was distinctly in the atmosphere during the forepart of the evening.

The Mozart music, with its classic simplicity of outline and structure, was strongly contrasted with the brilliant and florid coloratura passages of the operatic version of Ophelia's distraught imaginings. The great artist proved anew her versatility by adapting the resources of her art as well to the one style of music as to the other. The aria from "Hamlet," however, seemed to provide her with more congenial opportunities, and her voice, whether "through giddy mazes running" or in the sustained cantilena passages, held the house spellbound from the first note to the last. The unerring certainty of attack, the impeccable intonation, the fluent and facile delivery of the most difficult intervals, the flute-defying trills and grace-notes—the accustomed qualities of the great singer's art were all in evidence, plus that final quality of inspiration that defies analysis and carries all before it. Many times the singer came forward to receive both floral and plauditory tribute, each time gracefully recoiling again before the adamantine tradition of no encores and the Draconian figure of Max Fiedler upon the dais.

After the subsidence of the storm evoked by Melba's first contribution, Mr. Strube's composition—in its ethereal fantasy recalling the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music of Mendelssohn—was most cordially received. The composer, a first violinist of the orchestra, was four times called upon to rise in his modest place in the back row, and a fifth time Fiedler beckoned him to the centre of the stage and gave him a congratulatory handclasp. The "Tannhauser" overture concluded the programme. The latter part of it was driven at a furious pace, with a somewhat remarkable rhythm assigned to the first recurrence of the pilgrims' chant at the beginning of the coda; and when it came the turn of the brasses the theme was not overblown, as is the stertorous custom of some orchestras. It was, at any rate, a picturesque and suggestive reading.

Anton Witek, at the desk occupied last year by Willy Hess, proved himself an able concertmeister, and it was pleasant to see Alwin Schroeder in his former place as first 'cellist. The performance of Longy upon the oboe and Maquarre upon the flute was not less noteworthy than on previous occasions. It was, all in all, a concert that will live long in the memories of those so fortunate as to hear it.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 8 - 1910

HEAR MELBA SING

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Soloist In Fine Program.

The opening concert of the twenty-sixth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city occurred in the Academy of Music last night before an audience that tested the capacity of the house. The splendid record of this superb organization, established by years of artistic endeavor and accomplishment, has given it a standing in popular favor equal to that enjoyed by our own fine if more youthful orchestra.

In addition to a thoroughly enjoyable program the fact that Madame Melba was announced as soloist was sufficient to put seats at a premium, and to disappoint hundreds who wished to hear one of the greatest vocalists of our age. Melba was in unusually good condition and apparently enjoyed singing as much as the audience was transported by hearing. Her first selections—recitative, "How Susanna Delays!" and aria, "Flown Forever," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro"—were received with a storm of applause and curtain calls so numerous that it was not until she appeared shaking her head in a decided negative that the program could be resumed. The celebrated "Mad Scene" from "Hamlet," which came after an orchestral interlude, with its peculiar binding together with waltz rhythm, its effective accompaniment and technical vocal difficulties, was sung in a manner that literally took the audience off its feet. Melba was compelled to respond to calls until her own patience, as well as that of some of the audience, was exhausted. No doubt there were hundreds present to whom a simple song from that golden throat would have meant a precious memory for years to come, but the rule of the Boston Orchestra prohibiting encores is almost inflexible. Melba's tones, so pure, limpid and full of brilliancy, linger in the ear for hours after she ceases to sing, so in a measure it is possible to continue the pleasure of hearing her without an encore.

The only change in the personnel of the orchestra is in the first violin. Willy Hess, so beloved by all audiences, has been replaced by Witek, who acts as concertmeister. The regular program was sufficient to please the most exacting taste, and included Schumann's beautiful "Manfred" overture; Brahms' Symphony No. 3, in F major; Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture, and a novelty in a comedy overture, "Puck," played for the first time in this city and composed by Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra. The overture made a great impression and the composer, very modestly, was obliged to accept quite an ovation. After rising from his seat to bow several times he was finally induced to advance to the centre of the stage and acknowledge the applause. "Puck" is an intensely modern piece of writing, although the composer has issued no program. He merely wishes to convey the idea that it is a tonal effort to portray a sylvan picture, with the frolics of Puck as the principal figure.

The symphony was beautifully played. Fiedler bringing out thpeo etical side of the work in splendid style. The first movement was particularly effective; the opening chords and following melody were impressively powerful and majestic. The entire concert was an artistic and social success, the house resembling more an important opera night than that of a symphony concert.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

MELBA WILL SING AT THE ACADEMY

384

Schumann Commemorative Concert to Be Given by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

A "POPULAR" CONCERT

Kaltenborn Quartet at Drexel Institute—Agnes Reifsnyder's Recital—The Flonzaleys.

With the season sale the largest it has had in Philadelphia in many years and with the house for the first concert completely sold out, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its twenty-sixth season in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The management has been fortunate enough to secure for this concert the services of Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia this will be during the season of 1910-11. She has just finished a tour through British America, having penetrated far into the Northwest for the first time in her career. She remains in America throughout November and December to fill her engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to sing four times with the Metropolitan Opera in New York and four times with the Chicago Opera in Chicago.

She has elected to sing two numbers. The first will be the lovely "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" and the second will be the Mad Scene from "Hamlet." Conductor Fiedler has chosen for his orchestral numbers the Schumann "Manfred" overture, Brahm's symphony No. 3 in F major, Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. Gustav Strube is one of the exceedingly talented men in the orchestra and his overture "Puck," which has just been published, seems destined to achieve great popularity with orchestral conductors, as it is said to be brilliant and fascinating.

[75]

INQUIRER

ss Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 8 - 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy a Great Success

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler, began its twenty-sixth local season at the Academy of Music last evening under exceptionally inspiring and significant conditions. Long before the time set for the performance to begin people were standing in line awaiting admission and, when Mr. Fiedler stepped on the stage and gave the signal to start, there was not a vacant seat to be seen anywhere in the big auditorium. Of course, this was due in part to the fact that the assisting artist on this occasion was no less a personage than Mme. Melba, who, it is said, is not to be heard in this city again during the present season, but undoubtedly the overflowing attendance expressed the appreciation of music lovers for the organization on which Philadelphia was for years mainly, or even exclusively, dependent for its symphony music, and whose excellence in the interpretation of the compositions with which its reputation is associated remains unsurpassed.

Proud as Philadelphians may feel, as they have cause to feel for their own orchestra, they know that the other one still sets the standard, and they are not unmindful of the gratitude they owe it for the pleasure and instruction of bygone years. That is why so much enthusiasm prevailed among last night's audience and why, when the conductor appeared, he was received with such a spontaneous outburst of applause. The concert which followed was most enjoyable. Brahm's third symphony in F major, Op. 90, was the central feature of the program and, while this is a sombre and far from obvious work, which lacks the charm and grace and melodic beauty of the second and the ecstatic visions of the first, it was played with so much lucidity of analysis, nicety of balance and eloquence of emotional expression that its difficulties were surmounted, its complications simplified and its many hidden beauties revealed in a manner which invested its performance with an extraordinary measure of interest and value. Probably many who had previously thought it dry were led to change their minds by Mr. Fiedler's illuminative and profoundly impressive interpretation of the score.

Of the other orchestral numbers, which comprised Schumann's "Manfred" overture, with which the program opened, and the "Tannhauser" overture, with which it closed, was Mr. G. Strube's comedy overture of "Puck." a work which had not previously been presented here and which proved to be very well worth hearing. It is cleverly conceived and skilfully written, with a piquant wit and a captivating brilliancy, and the audience evidently liked it very much, as it applauded so heartily that Mr. Strube was required to bow his acknowledgments from his place among the violins in the orchestra. Mme. Melba made her appearance immediately after the intermission following the symphony, when she sang "Dove sono," the familiar air in which the Countess, in the "Marriage of Figaro," bemoans the unhappiness caused by her husband's inconstancy, with all the purity of tone and perfection of style which it demands and with a plaintive tenderness which was deeply moving. Her other contribution was a number in a very different manner, the famous "mad scene from Ambrose Thomas' opera of "Hamlet," and here the artist showed that as a coloratura singer she has yet to find her superior. Her delivery of the florid music in its fluent facility, impeccable intonation and chromatic sparkle was a striking triumph of the vocal art. As may be supposed, there were insistent demands for encores, but the draconian rule of the orchestra on this point was maintained and the clamoring crowd was obliged to go unsatisfied.

NORTH AMERICAN

ss Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 14 1910

SAY POLICE FAILED IN PROTECTION TO WOMEN

After Waiting All Afternoon for Seats at Concert Patrons are Brushed Aside

APPEALS QUITE USELESS

Hoodlums Formed for Rush Enter Academy of Music Unrestrained

Bitter complaints have been lodged against the police who were detailed to keep the crowds about the family circle entrance to the Academy of Music in order on Monday night, when Madame Melba sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and several reports of incivility and disorder have been made to Director Clay.

Thousands of persons, mostly women and young girls, who were unable to procure tickets entitling them to seats in the Academy, stood in line on Locust street from 3 o'clock Wednesday afternoon until the doors opened at half-past seven in the evening. A number went without dinner for the privilege of hearing the great singer, and others, in order not to lose their place in line,, bought sandwiches and ate them on the street.

It was an unusual demonstration of music lovers, naturally beyond the comprehension of the police, whose rough-shod strike methods of handling a crowd were enforced. But even the "keep in line there" and other gentle admonitions of the bluecoats did not deter the women, who were willing to go through any discomfort for the sake of the concert. They stood their ground until the doors were opened, but then a wild rush of hoodlums, who had gathered at the last minute, and formed at the opposite side of the street, brushed them aside, and crowded into the Academy in their stead.

The police made no attempt to interfere. Appeals to their authority were useless. When a disappointed group of several hundred women who saw the doors closed on their faces, asked for protection, they were laughed at. One group of students that had camped on the steps for four hours was obliged to leave for home at 8 o'clock, unable to attend the concert.

n TELEGRAPH

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

WORLD OF MUSIC

Opening of Boston Symphony Season—Melba the Inaugural Soloist—Second of the "Pops"—Various Recitals.

ANOTHER season of the long career of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia begins on Monday night, when Mme. Melba will be associated with Mr. Fiedler and his men. Our own orchestra will give the fifth pair of regular concerts and the second of the twelve fortnightly "pops." Several other musical events are hereafter announced.

THE first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening at 8.15. This is the twenty-sixth successive season in which the orchestra has come to Philadelphia, its first appearance here having been in the spring of 1886, and it starts this season with the largest subscription it has had in many years. Moreover, in accordance with the set policy of the management to begin its series of concerts in each of the different cities, it visits as brilliantly as possible, the orchestra will present as soloist Madame Melba. This will be the only opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear her during the coming season. She has chosen for her numbers two strongly contrasted pieces, one the "Dove Song" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," which demands perfection of bel canto, and the other, the "Mad Scene" from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet," which exacts the utmost virtuosity of execution in matters of trills and all the other ornaments which are in the armory of a coloratura. The orchestral numbers will comprise Schumann's overture "Manfred," Brahms' Symphony No. 3 in F major, Strube's Comedy Overture "Puck," and the "Tannhauser" overture. Gustav Strube, the composer of "Puck" is a man of talent, which like that of Charles Martin Loeffler, has been carefully fostered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he has been a member for the last twenty years. "Puck" is a work which has been received with such favor, and in which Mr. Fiedler has so much faith that he has placed it on all his concert programmes of this present Southern trip of the orchestra.

TELEGRAPH

Philadelphia, Pa.

MELBA THE SOLOIST WITH BOSTON PLAYERS

Only Local Appearance of Cantatrice for First Concert of Their 26th Season Here.

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of the present season was given last evening in the Academy of Music before an audience as large as it was brilliant. The orchestra presented the following varied programme: Schumann's Overture to Byron's "Manfred"; Brahms' No. 3 Symphony in F major; Strube's Comedy Overture, "Puck," and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhaeuser." Max Fiedler is again directing the orchestra this year, and his studied work leaves nothing to be desired in the way of perfection of detail; it is questionable, however, whether the orchestra reaches great imaginative heights or emotional depths. This was especially to be felt in the Wagner number. The great contrasts between the Schumann idealization of the Byronesque mood, the academic finish of Brahms' orchestration, and genuine originality of the sprightly Strube number made, perhaps, for brilliancy; but the ensemble lacked unity and left no one impression of clarity. Gustav Strube is one of the first violins of the orchestra, and his overture is an admirable musical exposition of the rascally imp, who mocks at the conventional and the commonplace. The soloist, Madame Melba, was doubtless the star that attracted an audience that taxed the seating capacity of even the Academy. Her numbers, the "Dove Sono" aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" and the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' opera "Hamlet," were such as to reveal the full range and beauty of her still extraordinarily beautiful voice, and a more enthusiastic ovation could hardly have been given any prima donna. All the old mastery of technique is still hers that bade defiance to a singer's arch enemy, a cold, and the diva seems in the plentitude and at the height of her vocal power.

[76]

CECILIA-SYMPHONY.

The three concerts to be given this winter by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Mr. Fiedler mark another step in the musical growth of Boston. With the Symphony orchestra and the opera, Boston is well provided for in two great branches of music, and it only needed such an association to put choral music on the same high plane. The three concerts will be given on Thursday evening, Dec. 1; Thursday evening, Feb. 16, and Good Friday evening, April 14. The subscription sale for these concerts will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, tomorrow morning.

One unfamiliar work, one modern work of tried popularity and one of the greatest classical works will be performed. Bantock's setting of the first 54 quatrains of FitzGerald's "Omar Khayyam," the first part of his very large work, has been received with much favor in England and highly praised when it was performed at the last Worcester festival.

The soloists for this performance will be Miss Margaret Keyes, George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, an English baritone of wide operatic and concert experience, who was recommended by the composer.

Pierne's "The Children's Crusade" has already had two performances here by the Cecilia Society. A choir of 100 children, trained by Prof. Hadley of Somerville will assist. The performance should be noteworthy on account of the first appearance here of Edmond Clement, the French tenor, who made a deep impression in New York last winter as a member of the Metropolitan Opera company. The other soloists will be Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey and Claude Cunningham.

For the last concert on Good Friday evening the work chosen is Bach's Passion according to Matthew. A boy choir of 50 will assist in the chorales. The soloists will be Marie Zimmerman, Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Henry Hadley, who, born in Somerville and educated musically in Boston and Vienna, after some years of conducting in European opera houses and concert halls, and now conductor of the Seattle Symphony orchestra, will conduct his new symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay," inspired by Drake's poem, at the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this week. Mr. Fiedler has extended to him this courtesy, as he was similarly courteous last season to Mr. Rachmaninoff. Mr. Hadley's "Culprit Fay," crowned with a prize, has been performed successfully by the Theodore Thomas orchestra in Chicago and other cities. He is known to symphony audiences by his symphonic poem, "Salome," and two symphonies. Mr. Carlo Buonamici of this city, and a favorite here, will play Chopin's concerto in F minor, No. 2, which was last played at a Symphony concert by Mr. Paderewski. The program will also comprise Tschaikowsky's suite in G major, No. 3, which closes with the variations including the Polonaise-Finale.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE.

The second Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. Rachmaninoff's symphony, which on its repetition at the fifth Symphony concert in Boston met with great success, will be performed. The soloist will be Miss Bessie Bell Collier, violinist, who for the first time will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will play Bruch's G-minor concerto. Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana" will complete the program.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1910

NEWS OF MUSIC

New York Applauds Mr. Strube and His Overture "Puck"—The Need of Better Distributed Concerts—Mr. de Gogorza's Programme Here—Another Series of Sonata Recitals—A Race Over Debussy—English Enthusiasm for Alger's New Concerto

At last, cities other than Boston are beginning to hear Mr. Strube's music that Bostonians have so often and sincerely applauded. He has found a publisher who is willing to risk his symphony and other orchestral pieces on the engraved page and who is fairly certain to bring them to the notice of conductors in Europe and America. Now, too, the Symphony Orchestra has ventured one of his compositions in its concerts in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore and, as the event proved, to admiring publics. In New York on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Fiedler put Mr. Strube's overture, "Puck," on his programme. The orchestra played it as brilliantly as it did here last month; the audience called Mr. Strube to his feet; and the New York reviewers yesterday were warm over it. Says the Sun: "The overture is not a pretentious work and is therefore not profound. It is unaffectedly tuneful in thematic matter, clearly and agreeably developed and scored with a firm grasp of the idiom of the orchestra. It is an ingratiating composition in a small genre and will serve to please other audiences than that which received it with so many evidences of favor yesterday. Mr. Strube was liberally applauded and several times obliged to acknowledge the approval of his hearers."

The Times is warmer: "The music is mirthful and frolicsome in its spirit. There is brilliancy in the orchestration, and large demands are made upon the orchestra's dexterity and lightness of hand. It cannot be said that Mr. Strube's thematic material has of itself great distinction or great charm; but he has shown much skill in his use of it and in making it count for the utmost. The composition scintillates, and it pleased the audience greatly." The Tribune calls the overture a fine composition, more than ingenious in orchestration, consistent and unconstrained idea, characteristic, expressive and charming.

BOSTON POST, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1910

CECILIA SYMPHONY CONCERTS SEAT SALE

The subscription sale for the three concerts to be given by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens at the box office at Symphony Hall this morning. On Thursday, Dec. 1, the first part of Bantock's "Omar Khayyam," will have its first performance in Boston with Margaret Keyes, George Harris, Jr., and Robert Maitland as soloists. On Thursday evening, Feb. 16, Pierne's "Children's Crusade" will be sung with Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Edith Chapman Goold, Edmond Clement and Claude Cunningham as soloists and a children's chorus of 100. The last concert will be given on Good Friday evening, April 14, when Bach's Passion Music will be given with Marie Zimmerman, Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham as soloists and a boy choir of 50.

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1910

FOR next week the Boston Opera announces a succession of eminent singers from the "affiliated" companies. On Monday, Mr. Renaud, one of the chief glories of the Manhattan Opera House through all its existence, now in like place in the Chicago-Philadelphia company, and already known in Boston by a Rigoletto, an Athanaël in "Thais," and Doctor Miracle in "Les Contes d'Hoffmann" that no other singing-actor of the hour may match, will appear for the first time here as Scarpia in "Tosca," a part that he has seldom taken in America. Heretofore in Boston, many times as Puccini's opera has been performed here, we have known only one Scarpia of the first rank—Mr. Scotti's. The more interesting, then, will it be to watch another in Mr. Renaud's. Mme. Mélis will appear as Tosca; Mr. Jadlowker of the Metropolitan, as Cavaradossi, and Mr. Moranzoni will conduct—conditions that promise a remarkable performance. On Wednesday, Nov. 23, Mr. Slezak will come again from the Metropolitan to appear as the Moor in Verdi's "Otello," in which he stirred his audience last Friday; Mme. Alda will take Desdemona again; and Mr. Baklanoff will venture Iago. On Friday, Nov. 25, Mme. Nordica will reappear in "La Gioconda" and on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Slezak will appear in his second part here, Manrico in "Il Trovatore" in which he was warmly liked as singer and actor in New York last winter. Mr. Amato, moreover, will come from the Metropolitan for the doleful but melodious count.

Mr. Jadlowker, the tenor whom the audiences at the opera house have liked so well and so justly in "La Bohème" and in "Tosca," will have the part of the King's Son in Humperdinck's new "Königskinder," when it is performed at the Metropolitan for the first time on any stage in December. For the present, he is dividing his work between his appearances at the Boston Opera House and the rehearsals at the Metropolitan, with an occasional return to his familiar parts on its stage.

Mr. Hoffmann will play with the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of Thursday, Dec. 15, in Cambridge, and of Friday and Saturday, Dec. 16 and 17, in Boston. If he returns here for another recital, as he seems likely to do after the warmth with which his audience received him yesterday, it can hardly take place before the spring, since he has a long tour of the West before him.

After a concert in Hartford last night the Symphony Orchestra returned to Boston this morning from its first monthly journey to New York and other cities to the southward to which it pays regular visits. In each one of them very numerous audiences heard its concerts to very warm applause, and in New York in particular the reviewers were quick to note and praise the new beauty and euphony of tone to which Mr. Fiedler has now restored the band. None of his predecessors has seemed to please the varied publics of the out-of-town concerts so much as does he.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., NOVEMBER 14, 1910.

* * *

The Cecilia Society gives its first concert with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall Thursday evening, Dec. 1, when Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" has its first presentation in Boston. The sale of seats for the Cecilia series of concerts opens today.

77

BOSTON POST TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1910

Joseph Hofmann's Recital in Symphony Hall

BY OLIN DOWNES

Joseph Hofmann, who is now a pianist of phenomenal powers, played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall before a small, but enthusiastic audience. The programme was formidable. In the hands of a lesser pianist it would have been dull. As it was, Mr. Hofmann made some sensational effects in certain instances, and, in the best of the music which he played, showed himself a musician of the highest rank.

This was the programme: Sonata, op. III, Beethoven; Scherzo in E minor, Mendelssohn; C major Fantasie, Schumann; Ballade in G minor, Nocturne in E-flat, Valse in A-flat, Scherzo in B minor, Chopin; Funerailles, Consolation, Campanella, Liszt.

Mr. Hofmann now does what he pleases with the piano, for there is no limit to his technical equipment. Whatever he thinks, he can do. To hear him build up a climax which seems as if it would never reach its highest point is alone worth sitting through one of his programmes. This is by no means the highest quality of his art, but the experience is worth while. The Chopin ballade gave a fitting opportunity to an artist of transcending imagination. The Beethoven sonata was a spiritual adventure in an even higher realm, and Mr. Hofmann was adequate to its demands. The mercury-like scherzo of Mendelssohn made a delightful bridge to the romantic greatness of the Schumann fantasie, with the vehement opening, which is like a passionate call through infinity.

It is possible that Mr. Hofmann yesterday approached nearer to the all-conquering style of Liszt when he played the last three pieces of his programme than any pianist heard here of late years. He did not attempt to gloss over reverberating passages of bombast, or to make Liszt more of a metaphysician than he is, but the "Funerailles" is a singular piece, and, with all its ostentation, full of strange pomp and grotesque imaginings. The song without words was played with more simplicity and less sentimentality than we had ever heard it before, and certainly it showed the composer in a light more favorable than usual, and the Campanella was a glittering, sparkling torrent of notes. Mr. Hofmann lengthened his programme.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER NOVEMBER 12, 1910

The subscription sale of seats for the three concerts which are to be given by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the personal direction of Max Fiedler, will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, Nov. 14. Not since the question of having permanent grand opera here in Boston was first broached has any development in music excited so much interest as the alliance which has been formed between the Symphony Orchestra and the famous Cecilia Society.

The only recital which Josef Hofmann will give in Boston during the current season and the first recital that he will have given in seven years is set for next Monday afternoon, Nov. 14, in Symphony Hall at 2.30. The older generation will remember the enormous sensation he created 20 years ago when he was exploited throughout the East as a prodigy.

Josef Hofmann

The Return to Boston of a Long-Absent Pianist

SOME of us may still vaguely remember a foggy Saturday afternoon of December in 1887, when in the dim old Music Hall, a little Polish boy in knickerbockers and a lace collar, played the pianoforte for the first, or perhaps the second or the third, time in Boston. His name was Josef Hofmann; he was round-faced and bright-eyed; and an imposing "concert company," as the musical fashions of the distant eighties went, surrounded him. He had come to New York a month before, after varying fortunes as a "prodigy" in Europe. The musically intelligent and discriminating Continent, though it is capable to this our day, of freaks of interest in "Wunderkinder," had generally ignored him. In England, where the average muddle-headed Briton still believes all sorts of artistic achievement a kind of perverse and unusual accident, he had stirred more interest, especially among feminine and "mothering" hearers. In America, then more propitious soil for the planting of prodigies than it is now, he quickened most interest of all. A public of seekers for the newest excitement of the hour, a public of mothers and their children, a public that was quietly curious, and a public even of connoisseurs and amateurs of music flocked to hear him. Even freshmen at Cambridge, as some of us then were, took note of him. He played pianoforte pieces of many sorts—played them with an exceeding digital dexterity, with a surprising sense of beautiful, adjusted and varied tone, with a queer reticence that belied his years and avoided all real or pretended excess, and without a trace of precocious or of any other emotion. He had learned his pieces by rote; he played them out of an instinctive musical and pianistic faculty that ran no deeper into their contents. His attempts at improvision on themes suggested by a listener betrayed him, and the alleged orchestral piece "composed and scored by Josef Hofmann" was a fraud. So, for some weeks, the boy went from city to city, to the wonder of his audiences, to the profit of his managers. Then abruptly his tour ceased. As some say, the cessation was due to the interference of a society with a long name and a meddlesome disposition that had persuaded itself that this quiet, self-contained and seemingly contented boy had been overstrained. As others prefer to believe, arrangements had been made whereby rich men provided him means to continue his studies and make the beginnings of the matured pianist who will return to Boston next Monday as the Josef Hofmann of 1910, and in his thirties.

Once and fatefully, if not oftener, in the long interim Mr. Hofmann has come to Boston. Six or seven years ago, when he was by no means the ripened pianist that he is today, he gave a concert here. The audience was scanty and cold; the pianist was in a sensitive mood; and he departed resentful. If the Bostonians cared not to hear him, he had no wish to force himself upon them. Resolutely he stayed away in his tour of two years ago, when nearly every other public in America was acclaiming him. Politely but firmly he declined even an invitation from the Symphony Orchestra to play with it in a series of concerts. Again he departed and such Bostonians as had heard him had journeyed to New York or to Providence for their pleasure. This autumn Mr. Hofmann has come to America again, and the persuasions of the Symphony Orchestra and the stimulus of a hazard of new fortunes to win a public that was indifferent to him will bring him to Boston next Monday for a recital and next month for orchestral concerts in Boston and in Cambridge.

Man in his early thirties as Mr. Hofmann is now, he still keeps some resemblance in physical aspect to the boy of the Saturday afternoon in the old Music Hall. He was a snort and "chunky" lad then; there was nothing "ethereal" or romantic in his presence, and there is not now. He is short and muscular; a head that is set deep within his shoulders suggests intellectual rather than poetic qualities; his face is more immobile than expressive, except when his eyes kindle in intimate talk across a supper table, and his hands have their old "pianistic" quality—not abnormally large, long and thin, like those of some pianists, but sinewy, elastic, wide-spreading, and with a curious detachment, as it were, of finger from finger. Traits of manner in him similarly recall the boy of the eighties. Before his audiences, he is altogether occupied with his playing. He affects neither to court them nor to disdain them. Least of all would he obtrude himself as Josef Hofmann the individual, upon them. He will give them in his playing whatever satisfactions he may, and therewith he and they shall rest content. As a boy, his queer repose and poise, alike in his manner and his playing, impressed his more acute listeners quite as much as did his instinctive virtuosity. He keeps these qualities still. In and out of the concert-room, he is unconscious of himself, as wholly modest as he then was. Now, too, he is alertly intelligent and variously interested. He is no mere musician living in a little, self-centred and distorting world of his own kind. Less still, is he the mere wandering virtuoso, preoccupied with an endless succession of conquests—or defeats—and absorbed in a multitude of little irritations, vanities and perversions. Like Mr. Paderewski, for another eminent pianist, Mr. Hofmann is a cultivated man of the world. Like the other Pole he would be a man of intellectual force and quick and ranging intelligence anywhere. He is good to hear in the concert-room. He is also good to hear in conversation.

In the days when the boy, Hofmann, was a "prodigy," he received many gifts in and out of concert-rooms. His managers—the generous and careless Abbey, for example—lavished them on him; and if no one in his audiences ever sent him up a kitten—a "tribute" from a silly woman that once infuriated the youthful Mischa Elman in London—he received from them gifts as absurd. Yet only one sort of present interested him—those that had something mechanical about them. Mr. Abbey, for example, once gave him a typewriter, and for two or three days in his absorption in it, the boy would scarcely heed his concerts. Even when he first returned to America in the eagerness of young manhood and as a pianist who was no longer prodigious, but proved, those that saw something of him off the stage were surprised at his interest in all things mechanical. If he could "talk machines" with one practised in them the rest of the company vanished for him. No conversation about the art of music or indeed about anything else had half the interest for him of the dissection and reconstruction of a new piece of mechanism. No wonder, some said who watched these things, that his playing was dry, as it then seemed—technical flawlessness, perfect adjustments, delicate gradations, polished symmetry and little else. Two inborn and cultivated instincts—the one mechanical, the other pianistic—have given him to this day a technique that is as perfectly efficient to all that he asks of it, as smoothly running, as delicately adjusted as any idealized machine of a youthful inventor's visions. If he obtruded it, he would rip its magical spell; it is "transcendental" beyond the adjective as it goes with Liszt's exacting and showy exercises. Yet again, as some of these doubters said, out of these two instincts came the dryness, the lack of emotional and personal quality that made his hearers believe him "cold." He was too content, they averred, with mere pianistic perfection. His playing produced a perfect and lovely body of soulless sound. The mental half of the listener applauded, the sensuous heard coldly.

The truth probably is, since none of us quite know the processes of our own inner development, that Mr. Hofmann has ripened slowly and that, as is usually the case with such gradual progress, he will go forward—for long years await him—before comes for long years await him—to richer and richer maturity. He was not a precocious prodigy like the little Mozart, who composed almost in his cradle; he was the born and instinctive pianist. He was also, perhaps, born with a temperament in which the controlling qualities of intellect will always be uppermost. All his adult life and in a youth, too, that was singularly self-contained yet free from self-deception, he has advanced slowly and with an unusual predisposition to self-criticism. Two years ago, when he visited America, at the urgent request of Mr. Damrosch he played a concerto of his own at a concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra; and then it transpired that he had written no less than five of them and numbers of smaller pianoforte pieces that he had not published or even played in public, in spite of all the vogue that his prestige in the concert-room could have given them. To hear the concerto, which had more limitations than distinctions, was to feel the wisdom of the self-criticism that had withheld it and that would still have kept it in the pianist's portfolio. Mr. Hofmann does not love superlatives anywhere. Most other pianists do. Would he accept one, it were truest to name him "the most modest" of pianists.

As the instinctive pianist, endowed by the kindly fates with the sense of touch and of the quality of sound that it calls into momentary existence—the heaven-sent sense that trainmg may foster, but not implant—Mr. Hofmann went forward in his mastery of all the means of pianoforte to the development of a tone that is unique in its pure and disembodied beauty. With new dexterities, alike of the finger upon the keys and a most sensitive and alert foot upon the pedals, he little by little gave this tone the variety of shadings in imparting force and suggesting color that it now possesses. He trained himself to the enunciation of a melody with a beautiful precision, to the clear and elastic leading of it from progression through progression, or like a single shining thread through superposed laces of harmonic tracery and films of ornament. He became the master of rhythm, the sensitive spirit to the varied and significant movement of music, that he is. In all this advance he kept his sense of musical discrimination, and, so to say, of musical justice. Its analogy is the familiar—or, rather, the remembered—faculty of Dr. Muck as a conductor, to take each piece in its kind and to impart it with characteristically expressive voice. Mr. Hofmann kept, too, his sense of the finer musical realities, his poise of musical utterance. He will never be heaven-storming, as Mr. Paderewski sometimes is, as though he would make the music of the pianoforte and the pianoforte itself say what it had never said before. He will not subdue music and instrument to a very intense personal temperament, as Mr. Busoni often does. He cannot be merely showy, as Mr. Godowsky and Mr. Rosenthal sometimes are. He prefers to seek out the depths of his music, the inner secrets of his instrument and its tone, and to impart both for themselves.

In this process, alike in its search of subtly varied beauty of expressive tone and the means to it and in its quest of the inner and characterizing voice of widely differentiated music, Mr. Hofmann's playing was bound to gain in appeal to the listening imagination, in the quickening of his hearers' emotions. With the ripening of the years and the broadening of his life he has become also more sensitive to the poetizing and the dramatizing qualities of his music and his instrument. He is not a man who will ever wear his heart on his sleeve or deliberately open it to the profitable inspection of his audiences. His is the emotion and the imagination that will always be touched with the restraints of reason. Yet by familiar token, emotion so touched and imagination so guided usually run the deeper and the truer. They are not superficial and showy; they are rich and significant, and they are always discriminating. In a few days we in Boston may take our opportunity to know Mr. Hofmann as a pianist of the pianoforte in a time when many a pianist fancies it an orchestra or would constrain it into such function; as a pianist whose technique is of result in tone and not in display; as a pianist who has kept musical emotion continent yet deep; and musical imagery poised yet warmly sensitive; in a time when each pianist, except Pachmann, would outvie the rest in personal revelation and pianistic vehemence. They would seize and overwhelm. Mr. Hofmann persuades and touches. His fire is white.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Hadley's New Rhapsody, with the Composer Conducting and Mr. Buonamici for the Assisting Pianist at the Symphony Concerts—The Return of Josef Hofmann—Mme. Szumowska's Piano Recital and Mrs. Hunt's Concert of Songs

THE Symphony Orchestra will return on Tuesday morning from its journey southward and resume its concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, with Henry Hadley for a visiting conductor in his own music and Mr. Buonamici as the assisting pianist. A day earlier on Thursday, falls the second of its concerts in Cambridge at Sanders Theatre. For the pianists, Josef Hofmann will reappear in Boston for the first time in seven years at Symphony Hall on Monday afternoon, and Mme. Szumowska announces her annual recital to a friendly public for Tuesday afternoon in Steinert Hall. Of song recitals, there is only one—Mrs. Hunt's at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

NO symphony stands on the programme of the Symphony Concerts for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Instead Henry Hadley's rhapsody, "The Culprit Fay" and Tschaikowsky's long and brilliant Suite in G-major will divide the purely orchestral part of the concert. "The Culprit Fay" won a prize offered by the National Association of Music Teachers for an orchestral composition and was performed first in the West last spring by the Chicago Orchestra. It was suggested by the like-named verses by Joseph Rodman Drake written nearly a hundred years ago and long established in American anthologies. They describe at length a midnight counsel of the fairy folk, the condemnation to exile of one of their number for slight offence, and his fantastic wanderings through air, water, light and fire into the palace of the sylphid queen. The verses may becomingly suggest music, but hardly such as Mr. Hadley wrote in his hotly and dramatically imagined tone-poem of "Salome" or in his soberer symphonies. The composer, who has been an operatic conductor at Mayence in Germany and who is now the conductor of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra will lead the Boston band in his new piece. Tschaikowsky's Suite is best known by the "Valse Melancholique" and the set of variations ending with a gorgeous Polacca which are often played as excerpts from it. An Elegy and a Scherzo make the other two of the four movements. Between the two orchestral pieces stands Chopin's concerto in F-minor for pianoforte and orchestra with Mr. Buonamici to play the solo part. When he reappeared last autumn to a public that had long missed him, it had reason to applaud his virtuosity, his quickness of imagination and his warmth of feeling.

/ / + / /

Sanders Theatre: Symphony Concert

THE second of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge is appointed for the evening of Thursday next at eight o'clock in Sanders Theatre. For the last time hereabouts Mr. Fiedler and his men will play Rachmaninoff's symphony in E-minor, the best-liked piece in its kind that has been heard here in years. Then follow Bruch's concerto in G minor for violin, with Miss Collier to play the violin part, and Chabrier's richly colored and whirlingly rhythmed rhapsody, "Espaňa," one of the orchestra's feats of virtuosity.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Josef Hofmann

FOR the first time in seven years and for the first time since Josef Hofmann entered into the maturing richness of his powers as a pianist; especially on the imaginative and the expressive side, he will play in Boston at a recital on Monday afternoon, at 2.30, in Symphony Hall. On Wednesday in this place an article recited his advance to his present high place among pianists and suggested the attributes by which he has won it. He has made a programme for Monday that will test them. It goes:

Sonata, Op. 111.....Beethoven
Scherzo, E Minor.....Mendelssohn
Phantasie, C Major.....Schumann
Ballade, G Minor —Nocturne, E-Flat Major.—Valse. A-Flat Major.—Scherzo, B Minor.....Chopin
Funerailles.—Consolation.—Campanella.....Liszt

HOFMANN MATURED.

Prodigy of Seven Years Ago Returns to Boston a Man, Master of His Art.

Joseph Hofmann, pianist, gave a recital at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon after an absence of seven years.

He is remembered as a youthful player of great precocity. He returned yesterday the mature artist with stability of judgment, breadth of emotional feeling and swift and eloquent power of expression.

He began his program with Beethoven's last sonata, op. 111. Last season it was played here by a formidable pianist whose merciless technic pursues all notes in and out of the picture with the insistence of a photographer's camera. Yesterday, with what imaginative art, as well as with what dignity, authority and sympathy, was the sonata heard.

The principal subject was imperious, implacable at every restatement. There was the pure, smooth singing of a melody in the slow movement against wonderfully subdued and appropriate accompaniment. In the final portion the delicate tracery of tones was as the fleeting imaginings, the evanescent sleep chasings of the world just bordering on bald consciousness.

There was at all times clarity and proportion, but there was not that elaborate pattern of lines known to the steel engraver, the faultless execution of which to some is a great art.

The ravishing delicacy of Mr Hofmann's playing was expressed in the Mendelssohn E minor scherzo. This is a scherzo in the playful sense. Chopin made it a monologue of grim humors.

But here was the lightness, the fleetness, the exquisite daintiness of it. Like a breath it was gone. It was not the mere fleetness of the metronome. There was that radiance of swiftly passing color which gives not only the sensation of speed, but the thrill of life. The piano sang. Marvelous is Mr Hofmann's mastery of the pedal.

The schumann C major Phantasie was an epitome of pianism. Here the player enriched his performance by every device of his technical and interpretative art. In it were the purity, varied color and singing power of tone, the subtle and delicate graduation of nuances, an illuminating, vitalizing variation of tempo, a use of the pedal by which he catches a new gleam and tint of color from vanishing notes, and even seems to sustain tones upon one part of the keyboard while releasing those in another.

The bold figure in the second movement towered in the majesty and nobility of passion. The metamorphoses of the figure in the last made it now repining, now questioning, now gravely philosophic.

The group of Chopin was played with sanity and brains as well as with sentiment. The first three numbers, the G minor Ballade, the E flat major Nocturne, beloved of violinists, and the A flat Valse are all familiar. The B flat minor scherzo closed the group.

The program included Liszt's Funerailles, Consolation and Campanella.

The audience was deplorably small. Applause was therefore redoubled, for Mr Hofmann was deeply appreciated by all present.

THE HOFFMANN RECITAL.

Josef Hoffmann, pianist, gave a recital at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, playing!

Sonate, Op. III.....Beethoven
Scherzo, E minor.....Mendelssohn
Phantasie, C major.....Schumann
Ballade, G minor;
Nocturne, E-flat major;
Valse, A-flat major;
Scherzo, B minor.....Chopin
Funerailles;
Consolation;
Campanella.....Liszt

An audience of fair size comfortably filled the balconies, but there were many vacant seats on the floor. In the audience there were many who have followed and still follow Mr. Hoffmann's career with great interest. They remember his notable performances as an infant prodigy in Boston, the keen interest taken in him then by musicians of note and his retirement for study from which he emerged a few years ago. Mr. Hoffmann has undoubtedly studied hard. He has gained the technique that is expected of the virtuoso who bids for public applause. He played yesterday with many moments of technical excellence. There were no muddy spots in his work. His tone, while not ravishingly warm or highly colored—in fact, it was tiresome in its one color—was clear and carried. Pedalling, etc., delighted many music teachers and students present, but to the majority Mr. Hoffmann brought no message. If he was a well equipped pianist he was not a poet, a man with something to say, eager to play and bring a message, a lovely thought. Where was the fire and enthusiasm, the fine feeling that makes a poem out of the G minor ballade or the B minor Scherzo?

But the playing, as already said, gave technical satisfaction and if the player did not indulge in an over abundance of sentiment he did not fall with sentimentality. The E flat major Nocturne, one of the "sweetest" bits Chopin ever wrote, was not made lush, it was not distorted as many distort it. The Mendelssohn's Scherzo was played with brilliance and the Funerailles of Liszt was given with a fine appreciation of the composition's structure.

CECILIA-SYMPHONY SALE OPENS TODAY

The subscription sale for the three concerts to be given by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens at Symphony Hall today. On Thursday, Dec. 1, the first part of Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will have its first performance in Boston, with Margaret Keyes, George Harris, Jr., and Robert Maitland as soloists. On Thursday evening, Feb. 16, Pierne's "Children's Crusade" will be sung, with Corinne Hider-Kelsey, Edith Chapman Goold, Edmond Clement and Claude Cunningham as soloists and a children's chorus of 100. The last concert will be given on Good Friday evening, April 14, when Bach's Passion music will be given, with Marie Zimmerman, Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham as soloists and a boy choir of fifty.

CECILIA ANNOUNCES SEASON'S SOLOISTS

Left to right, upper row, Claude Cunningham, basso; Margaret Hayes, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor. Lower row, Marie Zimmerman, soprano, at left; Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano, at right.

The soloists announced for the Cecilia-Symphony concert make a strong list. Particularly is this true of the quartet engaged for the Bach Passion music on Good Friday. It includes Marie Zimmerman, Janet Spencer, the contralto; George Hamlin and David Bispham. Equal care has been used in the selection of soloists for the other concerts, Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, who sing in Omar Khayyam on Dec. 1, and Corrinne Rider-Kelsey, Edith Chapman Gould, Edmond Clement and Claude Cunningham, in the "Children's Crusade" on Feb. 16.

Hub To Hear Mrs. Gould

TO BE SOLOIST AT CECILIA-SYMPHONY CONCERT

EDITH CHAPMAN GOOLD

NOTABLE PROGRAM FOR THE CECILIA-SYMPHONY CONCERT

The subscription sale for the three Cecilia-Boston Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. The Cecilia choir has always been one of the best in this country, and since the announcement of the alliance that has been made with the Symphony Orchestra new life has been put into it. It has been decided to limit the size of the choir to 175. For the first time Boston will be able to hear important choral works in which the whole of the Symphony Orchestra will be used. Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" has a most elaborate orchestral dress and will demand the full strength of the orchestra. This is true almost to the same extent of Pierne's "The Children's Crusade," which is down for the second concert; and while Bach's passion music does not demand many of the instruments of brass and percussion that are found in modern music, no work has been written that demands more skilful players of strings, wood winds and trumpets and horns.

The dates of the three concerts, as already announced, are Thursday evening, Dec. 1; Thursday evening, Feb. 16, and Good Friday, April 14. The soloists engaged for the first concert are Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, barytone. Of these Mr. Maitland, an Englishman, will be the only stranger to Boston.

Pierne's charming "Children's Crusade" has already been sung here twice by the Cecilia Society, and of all choral works of recent date that have been heard here gained the greatest favor with the public. In this the choir of the Cecilia and the orchestra will be reinforced by a children's choir of 100 voices, to be trained by Professor Hadley of Somerville.

This concert will be especially notable for the first appearance here of Edmond Clement, the operatic tenor, who made such a sensation with the connoisseurs of New York last year when he was a member of the French section of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The other soloists will be Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold and Claude Cunningham.

The quartet for the Good Friday performance will consist of Marie Zimmerman, soprano, who gained her experience as a Bach singer at the great Bach festival held in Bethlehem, Penn., several years ago; Janet Spencer, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor, and David Bispham. A boy choir of fifty will be chosen for the chorales.

Josef Hofmann's Recital Tomorrow Afternoon.

Tomorrow afternoon in Symphony hall the famous pianist, Josef Hofmann, will make his first appearance here in several years, giving his only recital this season in Boston.

Hofmann is an interesting refutation to the tradition that prodigies do not show in maturity the promise of their childhood, a tradition which persists, despite the example shown by such men as Hofmann, Kreisler and Elman, who are familiar to all classes of music lovers today.

Hofmann's connection with Boston has a certain sentimental interest, because it was here that he gave his last concert of his "prodigious" days. It was in old Music hall 20 odd years ago. All the seats, all the standing room and even the stage were filled with people. The late B. J. Lang in a sense presided over the ceremonies and gave the lad the theme on which he was to improvise. John B. Schoeffel, now of the Tremont theatre, was one of his managers, and the boy's retirement meant a loss of a fortune, for they had arranged for a tour of the country, to be followed by a trip to Australia.

His program tomorrow contains some works that are not often heard nowadays. He will begin with Beethoven's great sonata, Op. 111, and then will come Mendelssohn's rarely heard scherzo in E minor, and the first part will close with the C major "Fantasia" by Schumann. Then will come a group of Chopin and finally a group of the less known works of Liszt.

Henry Hadley to Conduct At This Week's Symphony.

Henry Hadley, the American composer, will at this week's Symphony concerts conduct his new symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay." "The Culprit Fay" is Mr Hadley's most recent composition in large form and will be listened to with much interest. The last of his works performed here was his elaborate symphonic poem, "Salome," which was played under Dr Muck's direction.

The soloist will be Carlo Buonamici, the justly admired pianist of this city. He will play Chopin F-minor concerto, a work which has not appeared on a Symphony program in several seasons.

The final number on the program will be Tschaikowsky's G-major suite No. 3. It is many years since this entire suite was played here, but in his last year Mr Gericke presented the theme and variations which make up the last movement of the composition.

Cecilia-Symphony Concerts.

The subscription sale of seats for the three concerts to be given by the Cecilia society and the Boston symphony orchestra will open at Symphony hall tomorrow morning. The number of orders by mail which already have been received are sufficient to convince Mr Ellis, manager of the Boston symphony orchestra, who has taken charge of these concerts, that his idea of bringing about an alliance between the orchestra and the choral society has been favorably received.

Mr Fiedler, assisted by Mr Malcom Lang, has been directing the rehearsals of the Cecilia, and shortly the first rehearsal with the orchestra of Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be held in Symphony hall.

The first concert will be given Dec 1. Thursday evening, Feb 16, Pierne's "Children's Crusade" will be sung, and Bach's "Passion" music will be presented April 14, Good Friday evening.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

The second Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theatre next Thursday evening, and Mr Fiedler has placed on this program the Rachmaninoff symphony, which on its repetition at the fifth Symphony concert in Boston had such an enormous success.

The soloist will be Miss Bessie Bell Collier, who then for the first time appears with the Boston Symphony orchestra in this capacity. She will play Bruch's G minor concerto, and the other number will be Chabrier's rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana."

JOSEF HOFMANN'S RECITAL.

The chief musical event of today will be the recital of pianoforte music to be given in Symphony Hall at 2.30 p.m. by Josef Hofmann, who has not been heard here for seven years. Hofmann's programme is: I., Sonata, Op. 111, Beethoven; Scherzo, E-Minor, Mendelssohn; Fantasia, C-Major, Schumann. II., Ballade, G-Minor, Nocturne, E-flat major, Valse, A-flat major, Scherzo, B-Minor, all by Chopin. III., Funerailles, Consolation, Campanella by Liszt.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The soloist for next week's Symphony concerts—Friday afternoon, Nov. 18, and Saturday evening, Nov. 19,—will be Mr. Carlo Buonamici. He will play Chopin's F minor Concerto, which has not been heard here for several years. The rest of the programme will be Henry Hadley's symphonic poem entitled "The Culprit Boy," and Tschaikowsky's Third Suitek in G major. Mr. Hadley is one of America's leading composers and this is one of his recent works.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS.

The second of the Cambridge concerts will be given in Sanders' Theatre, Thursday evening, Nov. 17, at which Mr. Fiedler will again conduct the Rachmanioff Symphony, which has been twice placed on the programmes of the Boston concerts. The soloist will be Miss Bessie Bell Collier.

HOFMANN RECITAL.

The Hofmann recital takes place on Monday afternoon, Nov. 14, in Symphony Hall. His programme is one of great musical interest. In the first part will be Beethoven's Opus 111 and the great C major Fantasia of Schumann, while between these two will be Mendelssohn's seldom heard Scherzo in E minor, which demands the fleetest and most delicate finger work, then will close with a group of Chopin and finally three Liszt pieces.

HOFMANN A STAR IN LISZT'S WORK

Josef Hofmann at his recital in Symphony Hall on Monday afternoon is going to interpret the Liszt transcription of the "Tannhauser" overture. Other pianists have, to be sure, tackled it before Hofmann, but few of them do more than get out of it alive, while Hofmann comes through it with flying colors. In addition to a mere execution, he gives it all its orchestral values.

This is the only recital which Josef Hofmann will give in Boston this season. It is so many years since he played here, his last appearance being when he was merely a child prodigy, that practically a new generation will listen to Hofmann, the mature artist. Since Boston has heard him he has been a pupil many years of Anton Rubenstein. The last concert that he gave here was in old Music Hall, when only a boy, he astonished all the wise ones by his marvelous ability in improvisation. The late B. J. Lang provided the theme on which he improvised at great length.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, has another rehearsal this week with the Cecilia society for the first joint concert to be given by the Cecilia and Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 1; the work in hand is Bantock's "Omar Khayyam." The sale of seats for the first concert will open at Symphony hall on Friday, Nov. 25.

Mr. Fiedler has made a slight change in the programme for this week's Symphony concerts. The original programme comprised Henry Hadley's Rhapsody for orchestra, "The Culprit Fay," which is to be conducted by the composer; Chopin's F-minor Pianoforte Concerto which is to be played by Mr. Carlo Buonamici, and Tschaikowsky's Suite in G-major, No. 3. Mr. Fiedler has added to this programme, preceding the Hadley number, Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

EDITH C. GOOLD
CECILIA

JANET SPENCER
Cecilia Society.

(Copyright, Gessford, New York.)
JOSEPH HOFMANN.

HOFMANN'S RECITAL

The most important recital of the season thus far will come tomorrow afternoon at 2:30, in Symphony Hall, when Josef Hofmann will make his first appearance in Boston in seven years. Moreover, this will be his only recital during the current season. Hofmann's connection with Boston has a certain sentimental interest because it was here that he gave his last concert of his "prodigious" days. It was in old Music Hall twenty-odd years ago. He had been the musical sensation of the season. Halls had not been large enough to hold the audiences that wanted to hear the little fellow play and his promise had been so unusual that the late William Steinway had interested certain wealthy men in New York, who provided for his retirement from the concert stage in order that his talent might mature normally. At that last concert in Boston the old Music Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, all the seats, all the standing room and even the stage itself was filled with people. The late B. J. Lang in a sense presided over the ceremonies and gave the lad the theme on which he was to improvise. John B. Schoeffel, now of the Tremont Theatre, was one of the managers, and to them (his managers) the retirement of young Hofmann meant an immense loss, for they had arranged a tour of the country, to be followed by a trip to Australia.

Hofmann spent the next several years chiefly under the supervision of Anton Rubinstein and in the early part of 1898 he returned to this country as a young man of 20 and made his first appearance in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York with the Thomas orchestra.

His programme for tomorrow is as follows:

Sonata, Op. 111	Beethoven
Scherzo, E minor	Mendelssohn
Fantasia, E major	Schumann
Ballade, G minor	Chopin
Nocturne, E flat major	Chopin
Valse, A flat major	Chopin
Scherzo, B minor	Chopin
Funerailles	Liszt
Consolation	Liszt
Campanella	Liszt

CECILIA—SYMPHONY

The subscription sale for the three Cecilia-Boston Symphony concerts which have already been announced will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. It is the belief of those interested that Boston intends to respond most generously to the invitation it has to hear choral music performed under almost ideal conditions. The Cecilia choir has always been one of the best in this country, and since the announcement of the alliance that has been made with the Symphony orchestra new life has been put into it. Its weak spots have been strengthened and rehearsals have been going on with vigor. Some of these have been under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lang, but Mr. Fiedler, who will conduct the concerts, exercises a general supervision over them and is present himself at many of them. It has been decided to limit the size of the choir to 175. With that number of trained singers the body of tone will be ample for any purposes and with a choir of this size it will be possible for the conductor to secure more plasticity and do finer work generally than with a large and unwieldy chorus made up partly of untrained voices.

For the first time Boston will be able to hear important choral works in which the whole of the Symphony orchestra will be used. Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" has a most elaborate orchestral dress and will demand the full strength of the orchestra. This is true almost to the same extent of Pierne's "The Children's Crusade," which is scheduled for the second concert; and while Bach's Passion music does not demand many of the instruments of brass and percussion that are found in modern scores, no work has been written that demands more skilful players of strings, wood winds, trumpets and horns.

The dates of the three concerts, as already announced, are Thursday evening, Dec. 1; Thursday evening, Feb. 16, and Good Friday, April 14. Part I. of Bantock's "Omar Khayyam," which will have its first performance in Boston on Dec. 1, was performed for the first time in America at the last Worcester Festival and is announced for performance by various choral societies in the country for this season and next.

SYMPHONY HOME OF REAL MUSIC LOVERS

Impressions of a Concert and Advantages of Second Balcony.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Click, click, click!

It is the conductor rapping with his wand upon his music stand. Like a mantle silence covers sound. A pin dropped from the balcony would startle one by the noise of its fall. The conductor's stick descends, and a crash of rich harmony fills the hall. The Symphony has begun

The trumpets proclaim the theme, and the strings begin its development. The brasses and woodwinds play their parts. They hurl fragments of a melody at one another until it takes complete form and is sung by the whole orchestra. The full force of one hundred instruments follow the swaying leader through the mazes of the Symphonic score; clarinet, trombone, 'cello and double bass in turn pluck the melody from the melange and wave it aloft. For a full hour the Symphony continues as the composer displays his invention and musicanship.

During all this time the audience sits rapt and never a whisper disturbs the ears of the music lover. That is how Boston listens to its Symphony Orchestra.

The Foe of Sham.

The Symphony is the foe of sham. There are people who pretend to adore music; many who believe they are lovers of this greatest of arts, but a Symphony tears pretense away.

There are people who frequent the opera because of its fashion show and its pageants, who always excuse themselves when a Symphony invitation is offered. They cannot sit through the long orchestral concert.

Yet it does not require culture to appreciate a Symphony. The untutored and unlearned in music can enjoy such a concert if they have in them a love of music. The symphonies of Beethoven, Haydn, Schumann and Brahms are gardens of melody. Rarer tunes are tossed about by the instruments of great orchestras than Verdi ever imagined for his operas. But such concerts are a matter for the ear; there is little to distract the eye. It is a gratification of one of the senses alone, and unless that sense is well developed there is little enjoyment.

Symphony Audiences Select.

That is why the Symphony audiences are select. The orchestra quickly weeds out those who do not belong. Perhaps the most interesting people at a Symphony concert are those in the second balcony on Friday afternoons. These seats are unreserved and sold at a very low price to the five hundred first comers. Nobody is allowed to stand in Symphony Hall and the five hundred and first person is turned away.

The patrons of the second balcony are music students for the most part, charming girls and clean cut boys, who are willing to stand for two hours for the privilege of hearing the concert. They listen with wrapt attention, and they would quickly settle anybody who talked or otherwise interrupted their enjoyment of the music.

If people only knew it the second balcony is the best place to sit. From it one can see the orchestra, look right down upon it and study the wonderful machine which is churning forth such glorious harmonies. It is not a machine, it is a body of one hundred men, each obeying the will of a leader and working very hard. The energy of a great orchestra in action is amazing. It is a lesson in the value of cooperation to watch the strings. There are forty bows moving with exactly the same motion and at the same time, combining one round sweet gorgeous tone. There are the players of the eight bass fiddles, working together with a sideways motion and looking like great beetles.

Then there is the kettle drummer. Here is a wonderful man. His arms work like piston rods as he beats the great drums with sticks. His expression is fierce as befits a man who represents the cannons and roar of war.

Mr. Fiedler from his high stand rules the mighty engine of sound with a tiny baton of wood. His arms are tireless and they are as eloquent as Cicero. The slightest gesture brings a brazen response from the trumpets, and at a turn of the hand the fortissimo becomes pianissimo and allows the oboe, tongue of the woods and pastures, to pipe a placid lay.

The music lover, who sits with closed eyes in the orchestra chair does not know what an exciting thing it is to watch the orchestra from the second balcony. Some day it will be the balconies which are sought by the people with money, while the music students will have to be content with the floor.

MARGARET KEYES.

JOSEPH HOFMANN.

AMERICAN TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Henry Hadley to Take Baton When His Own Symphony, "Culprit Fay," Is Given.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by an American and play an American symphony at the rehearsal and concert of November 18 and 19. Henry Hadley, whose works for orchestra, chorus and solo voice have won him a reputation as a composer of force, invention and scholarship, will onduct his new symphony poem "The Culprit Fay." Mr. Fiedler has extended to him the courtesy, just as last year he extended a similar courtesy to Rachmaninoff.

"The Culprit Fay" is descriptive music of the sort which attracts the modern composer. As the title suggests, it is music of the woods, the sylvan glades, where fairies sport and Oberon holds his tiny court.

The extremely elaborate symphonic poem "Salome," composed by Mr. Hadley, was played by the Boston orchestra several years ago, under the baton of Dr. Muck.

The Tschaikowsky G-Major Suite No. 3 will be played in its entirety at this concert. It is a number of years since this great work was given in full, but in his last season here Mr. Gericke played the theme and variations which make up the last movement of the composition.

Carlo Buonamici, the pianist, will be soloist at these concerts. He will play the Chopin F-Minor Concerto, a work which has not appeared on Symphony programs for several seasons.

The Second Symphony concert in Cambridge, will be given in Sanders Theatre, Thursday, November 17. The famous Rachmaninoff Symphony in C-Minor will be on the program and Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana." Miss Bessie Belle Collier, violinist, will be soloist.

HOFMANN GONE 7 YEARS;

Now in Prime, Comes Back to Give Concert.

Josef Hofmann, the pianist, returns to Boston after an absence of seven years, and will be heard in recital to-morrow (Monday) afternoon at 2:30 in Symphony Hall. Hofman is now in his prime, and there are few pianists who can be considered his rivals in virtuosity. Yet it is twenty years since Boston went mad over a wonderful boy who played the piano like a master. The boy had toured the whole country and displayed so much real talent that the late William Steinway and other New York men of wealth provided for his retirement so that his talent might mature normally.

Hofmann's last concert as a boy prodigy was in old Music Hall, Boston. The late B. J. Lang presided over the ceremony and gave the lad the theme on which to improvise. John B. Schoeffel, now of the Tremont Theatre, was one of his managers.

For some years the boy studied with Anton Rubenstein, and in 1898 returned to this country a young man of twenty, and again won the favor of concert goers. He is now thirty-two, mature, complete master of his art. His program tomorrow includes several works not heard nowadays. They include Beethoven's great Sonata, Op. 111, and Mendelssohn's rarely heard Scherzo in E-Minor and the C-Major Fantasie of Schumann. Then will come a group of Chopin and Liszt compositions.

NOVEMBER 15, 1910
ADVERTISER, TUESDAY.

THE HOFFMANN RECITAL.

Josef Hoffmann, pianist, gave a recital at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, playing:

Sonate, Op. III	Beethoven
Scherzo, E minor	Mendelssohn
Phantasie, C major	Schumann
Ballade, G minor;
Nocturne, E-flat major;
Valse, A-flat major;
Scherzo, B minor	Chopin
Funerailles;
Consolation;
Campanella	Liszt

An audience of fair size comfortably filled the balconies, but there were many vacant seats on the floor. In the audience there were many who have followed and still follow Mr. Hoffmann's career with great interest. They remember his notable performances as an infant prodigy in Boston, the keen interest taken in him then by musicians of note and his retirement for study from which he emerged a few years ago. Mr. Hoffmann has undoubtedly studied hard. He has gained the technique that is expected of the virtuoso who bids for public applause. He played yesterday with many moments of technical excellence. There were no muddy spots in his work. His tone, while not ravishingly warm or highly colored—in fact, it was tiresome in its one color—was clear and carried. Pedalling, etc., delighted many music teachers and students present, but to the majority Mr. Hoffmann brought no message. If he was a well equipped pianist he was not a poet, a man with something to say, eager to play and bring a message, a lovely thought. Where was the fire and enthusiasm, the fine feeling that makes a poem out of the G minor ballade or the B minor Scherzo?

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1910.

HOFMANN RECITAL

The first prominent recital of the year will come tomorrow afternoon at 2.30 in Symphony Hall, when Josef Hofmann will make his first appearance in Boston in seven years. Moreover, this will be his only recital here during the current season. He will begin with Beethoven's great sonata, Op. 111, and then will come Mendelssohn's rarely heard scherzo in E minor and the C major Fantasia by Schumann. Then will come a group of Chopin pieces and finally a group of the less-known works of Liszt. The program in full is as follows:

	I.
a.	Sonata, op. 111	Beethoven
b.	Scherzo, E minor	Mendelssohn
c.	Fantasia, E major	Schumann
	II.
a.	Ballade, G minor	Chopin
b.	Nocturne, E flat major	Chopin
c.	Valse, A flat major	Chopin
d.	Scherzo, B minor	Chopin
	III.
a.	Funerailles	Liszt
b.	Consolation	Liszt
c.	Campanella	Liszt

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Henry Hadley, the American composer, will at this week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening conduct his own new symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay." The soloist will be Carlo Buonamici, the pianist, who will play the Chopin F-minor concerto.

The final number on the program will be Tschaikowsky's G-major suite, No. 3.

[80]

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS.
NOVEMBER 15, 191

JOSEF HOFMANN IN RECITAL.

THE old question: Shall I play this music or shall this music play me?

Busoni replies: Teach me all the traditions that have grown up around the allegro and variations of Beethoven's last sonata, so that when I interpret them I may know what not to do.

Hofmann, on the other hand, replies: Tell me everything that the piano masters have thought of these two movements, tell me the points of excellence in the interpretation of every player who has ever been heard in the opus 111, and I will give a reading of the music that shall sum up the whole thing. By putting together the mass of details that have found approval and by adding a touch of my own here and there, I will make you a picture that you cannot but accept. My utterance about that sonata will be the very latest, and it will be one which students of Beethoven will find some difficulty in challenging.

Now what is there to say for and against the methods of the two artists and their ways of facing the alternative just stated?

Needless that any dispute should arise over the matter.

There will always be some to take the Hofmann view as long as there are pedagogic systems and conservatories, always be some to take the Busoni view as long as there exist men with independent habits of thinking.

An advantage on the Hofmann side of the question, an advantage not to be despised when it comes to practical concert giving, is a gallery full of applauding enthusiasts.

If you want to see how matters stand on this point, just compare Josef Hofmann's recital in Symphony hall Monday afternoon with one of the Busoni recitals of last season.

We like well, say the enthusiasts, to see an artist push his energies in the Hofmann way to the outermost edge of tradition; but let him not, Busoni-like, think of o'erleaping the walls.

We applaud Hofmann because we understand him.

We do not know what Busoni is about.

A disadvantage on Mr. Hofmann's side is that his large and inclusive interpretation has no definite guiding principle.

It gives an encyclopedic view of Beethoven's sonata, brings out, we might almost say, a new style for every phrase, but it does not leave on the mind of the listener a clear and single impression.

Mr. Hofmann gives us a trustworthy account of every item of melody, harmony and rhythm, every point of dynamics and expression, in the thirty-second sonata; but he does not send us home possessed of a general and commanding idea as to the whole work.

His idea of piano playing, quite unlike Mr. Busoni's, is that a worthy interpretation is a sum of excellencies.

Logic and applause are on his side, curiosity and slow public acknowledgment on Busoni's.

The two men take extreme positions in the matter of reading the music of an old master and neither seems to have found the heights.

These lie probably at some point between them, Paderewski knows where. For does not his playing combine Hofmann's fondness for tradition with Busoni's independence and individual command?

Program of Josef Hofmann's recital: Sonata, Op. 111, Beethoven; Scherzo, E minor, Mendelssohn; Phantasie, C major, Schumann; Ballade, G minor, Nocturne, E-flat major, Valse, A-flat major, Scherzo, B minor, Chopin; Funerailles, Consolation, Campanella, Liszt.

HERALD, THURSDAY,
NOVEMBER 17, 1910.

MUSIC NOTES.

The corrected program of the Symphony concerts this week is as follows: Berlioz, overture to "The Roman Carnival"; Hadley, rhapsody for orchestra, "The Culprit Fay" (first time here; conducted by the composer); Chopin, piano concerto in F minor (Carlo Buonamici, pianist); Tschaikowsky, suite No. 3.

The sale of seats for the first Cecilia concert with the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, will open on Friday, Nov. 25. Bantock's "Omar Khayyam," part I., will be the work performed at this concert.

BOSTON JOURNAL
NOVEMBER 15, 1910.

Performance Revelation of Sterling Artistry by Great Pianist.

Josef Hofmann, the pianist, played at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. It was a rare pleasure to hear him, and it should be said that it would have been a greater pleasure still if the performance had been given in a smaller hall. The audience could easily have been seated in some auditorium half the size of Symphony Hall, and the result would have been happier for both the pianist and his admirers. Many shadings are lost or else go to waste when a big auditorium like Symphony Hall is only half filled.

Doubtless there were many present yesterday who remember Hoffmann when he appeared some twenty years ago at Music Hall as a young prodigy—a chubby little boy in a sailor suit, who climbed up to the keyboard and astounded the audience not only with set pieces but with impromptus. The fact that Hofmann has become a serious and celebrated artist need not cause him to blush for those prodigious days. It was certainly an extraordinary sight—that of a child playing the classics neatly and intelligently and improvising upon themes suddenly thrust upon him.

But no less extraordinary was the grown-up Hofmann's performance yesterday. It lacked a little profundity in the Beethoven sonata, op. 111, but in the Mendelssohn E minor scherzo, the Schumann C major fantasie, the Liszt pieces —"Funerailles," "Consolation" and the "Companion"—and in the Chopin series Hofmann's playing was masterly in every sense of the term. It was sympathetic, imaginative, technically superlative. There was no showiness, though Hofmann's technique is splendid of itself; but rather the performance throughout was a revelation of sterling artistry, with virility in it and poetry, too. The Chopin nocturne in E flat major was for once a beautiful midsummer moonlight meditation, and not a maudlin hayrack ride.

Hofmann is to be ranked with the great pianists of the day—with those whose imagination is fully as impressive as their digital dexterity. His work yesterday was that of a symmetrically complete artist.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
NOVEMBER 15, 1910.

HOFFMANN RECITAL

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Josef Hoffmann, who has not appeared in this city for a number of years, gave a piano recital yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, before an audience, while not large, was plainly one of keen appreciation of the artist. Mr. Hoffmann played the following programme

(a) Sonate, Op. III, Beethoven; (b) Scherzo, E-minor, Mendelssohn; (c) Phantasie, Schumann II. (a) Ballade, G-minor, (b) Nocturne, E-flat major (c) Valse, A-flat major, (d) Scherzo, B-minor, Chopin III. (a) Funerailles, (b) Consolation, (c) Campanella, Liszt.

Unquestionably one of the greatest artists at the piano of the present day, Mr. Hoffmann electrifies rather than charms; his playing is full of sharp contrasts that suddenly arrest the attention, and he holds his audience transfixed by the mere suspense of his playing. Motifs and phrases never glide smoothly from one to the other, but rather each one makes a special announcement at the outset. His music is cerebal and spinal rather than introspective, although at times he becomes the philosopher and dreamer, as in a cantilena or a bit of phantasy.

The Schumann phantasie was almost bizarre and fantastic, and the coloring was oriental in vividness. The Chopin ballade was one of the electrifying numbers, and it lost much of its intrinsic value in tones that were merely phosphorescent, bright flashes of light in which there was no warmth. Too often mere thinking and reasoning and not feeling led to logical conclusions, but not to convincing and appealing expression. Again there was not time to analyze impressions, which were registered to suddenly for the average nerve sensations to respond.

In the Liszt numbers Mr. Hoffmann was the most convincing. He made the piano an instrument of many nerves and ganglia, all of which communicated with the great nerve centres of his brain. The Funerailles was a wonderful composite, the awful solemnity and dread of death, the martial tread of feet, with the sweetly spiritual breathing over it all.

In his singing notes Mr. Hoffmann dwells long and expectantly, but even then there is something lacking in their deepness of tone; they do not haunt one after the piano has ceased singing, but are rather a thing of the moment. But in his pedal work he brings out orchestral values; he often produces the effect of opening the stops of an organ, bringing into play new banks of keys and causing organ pipes to give forth new and beautiful tones.

Mr. Hoffmann's audience was most enthusiastic and recalled him at the close of the recital.

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY,
NOVEMBER 18, 1910

News of Music

MANY familiar parts in operas that are many times repeated have fallen into an established and usually a justifiable convention. Outside a few slight variations, there is practically only one way to impersonate Radames in "Aida," for example, or the Consul in "Madama Butterfly," or Kurwenal in "Tristan." Per contra other parts as familiar invite and sanction as many different impersonations as the imaginations of the singing-actors can devise and elaborate. Wednesday evening at the opera house Mr. Galeffi happened to play the vindictive Tonio in "Pagliacci," not only without any particular individuality or thoughtful artifice, but with little definite characterization at all. He made it almost a "straight" part, and the contrast was sharp with all the diversified and calculated versions of Tonio that our operatic stage has known since "Pagliacci" was established on it. We have had the Tonio, who was an uncouth and rather boyish lout, yet admirably schooled in the art of song, of Mr. Sammarco; the Tonio who was a decayed old actor fallen now to a troop of strolling players that wandered about the country-side of Mr. Forsell; the gawky, malignant and insistently leering Tonio of Mr. Amato; and the Tonio of Mr. Scotti that suggested a man of finer nature than were his companions, who had sunk to their level through weakness and mischance and in whom the pent humiliation of the years had festered into a kind of universal hatred, a kind of bitter and consuming passion for malignant evildoing. No doubt Mr. Scotti, who has a very acute mind, tends to make the part over-subtle and to reconstruct a part, as it were, for Tonio. No doubt also Mr. Sammarco's lout and Mr. Forsell's "old-timer" are inventions of their own for which Leoncavello's text and music give little warrant. He, seemingly, saw Tonio as no more than the rejected and resentful clown who turned momentary spy because Nedda would have none of his advances. Because the composer has so little defined the part, the wider is the leeway for diverse impersonation of it. Now the ambitious singing-actor that takes it is duly bound to elaborate a version of his own.

A violinist, unannounced in the prospectus for the new year, will appear at the Symphony Concerts next week—Felix Berber—long the leader of the violins of the Gewandhaus Orchestra at Leipsic under Mr. Nikisch and esteemed in Germany as one of the numerous "heirs" to the Joachim tradition. Accordingly, as it seems, he will play Brahms's concerto, in which he began his tour the other day in New York, but under such hampering conditions that he is counting his appearances here next week as his real début.

Mr. Fiedler exceeds in industry and in "staying power" of mind, body and nerves any conductor that the Symphony Orchestra has known. His work with it gives him a hundred and more concerts—and the preparation for them—between the beginning of October and the end of April. Yet, as willingly as though it were a mere trifle of time and labor, he undertook the conducting of the concerts of the Cecilia. The original plan was that Malcolm Lang, who has some of his father's aptitudes as a choral conductor, should take charge, under Mr. Fiedler's supervision, of the preliminary rehearsals. In practice the conductor has found—or rather snatched—more time for them than he anticipated, and already the singing of the chorus bears the stamp of his painstaking hand. "Rehearsals in the morning, scores in the afternoon, another rehearsal or a concert in the evening—these are my days with short nights between"—Mr. Wood once wrote of his work in London. The words describe Mr. Fiedler's too.

Mr. and Mrs. Mannes, who were the pioneers hereabouts of the sonata recitals that have now become a musical fashion, will return to Boston for two such concerts on the evenings of Tuesdays, Dec. 13 and Jan. 24, in Steinert Hall. For their programmes they have picked sonatas for pianoforte and violin from Biber, a German of the seventeenth century and one of the earliest composers of music for the violin; from Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann; and from Enesco, the Roumanian who, as violinist and composer, has won his place among Parisian musicians.

The programme at the Symphony Concert in Boston today traverses Berlioz's overture "Carneval at Rome"; Mr. Hadley's new rhapsody, "The Culprit Fay;" Chopin's concerto in F minor for pianoforte—with Mr. Buonamici to play the solo part and Tschaikowsky's suite in G major. In New York, at the concert of the Philharmonic Society, Mr. Mahler is playing Debussy's new "Rondes de Printemps," Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Brahms's first symphony and, with Mr. Hofmann, Saint-Saëns's fourth concerto for pianoforte. In Chicago the "Rondes de Printemps" are also on Mr. Stock's programme, along with Debussy's "Scottish March," Brahms's first symphony, and Goldmark's concerto for violin with Mr. Macmillen in the solo part. (Evidently in the view of Mr. Mahler and Mr. Stock, Debussy and Brahms mate—or contrast—well. In Philadelphia Mr. Pohlig has returned to the elder classics, with Bach's suite in B minor, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and his concerto for two pianos, and Weber's overture to his opera, Euryanthe" to fill the afternoon. Mr. Hutchison and Mr. Randolph are, of course, the pianists.

POST, FRIDAY, ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 18, 1910

WOMEN MUST REMOVE HATS

Management of Symphony Hall Recognizes That Removal of Hats Is Compulsory by Law, and Seeks Co-operation of Its Women Patrons

Mayor Fitzgerald today sent a letter to Louis H. Mudgett, manager of Symphony Hall, saying that he may be compelled to revoke the license of Symphony Hall, if women attending the Symphony rehearsals persist in ignoring the law by keeping their hats on. The mayor says that he has received many complaints from persons who experience discomfort by the practice of wearing hats. He adds that he has delayed taking the matter up, hoping that Mr. Mudgett would be able to abolish the nuisance without resorting to extreme measures. It would be a calamity, the mayor thinks, if it were found necessary to put an end to these concerts for so trifling a cause. The mayor's letter is as follows:

Nov. 18, 1910.

Louis H. Mudgett:

Dear Sir—I wish to call your attention to chapter 3, Revised Regulations of Aug. 5, 1898, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement.

I have received many complaints of the constant violation of this law in Symphony Hall at the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I am informed that despite the printing of the regulation on the programme and the posting of cards in the Hall, many, if not most, of the ladies who patronize these concerts ignore the law to the extreme discomfort of their neighbors.

These complaints have of late become more numerous and more emphatic. I have delayed as long as possible taking the matter up, not wishing to embarrass the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is one of the chief glories of the city, and hoping you would find some means to abolish the nuisance without resorting to extreme measures. It would be a calamity if it should be found necessary to put an end to these concerts for such a trivial cause; but the law is very clear, and distasteful as it is to me, I may be compelled to enforce it even to the point of revoking the license of Symphony Hall.

For twenty-nine years these concerts have been a centre of the social and æsthetic life of Boston. The city has one of the finest orchestras in the world, and for this reason, if for no other, occupies a unique place in the world of music. I am confident that the wearing of hats at these concerts is simply the result of thoughtlessness on the part of the ladies, and when the matter is presented to them in a proper light, so that they will understand that a continuance of the custom must mean an end of the concerts, their loyalty to the orchestra and their respect for the law itself will bring about the reform asked for.

I beg to enclose a marked copy of the license under which Symphony Hall is operated.

Yours very truly,
John F. Fitzgerald, Mayor.

Present agitation regarding the wearing of hats during performances at Symphony Hall has placed the management in a peculiar attitude, for while it desires to please its patrons in every possible way, it recognizes that law is law, as Manager Louis H. Mudgett states, and at this hall, so he added, they of course cannot expect to depart radically from the practice in force at other places of amusement or entertainment.

For a long time the management has printed in its official programmes a courteous request to women patrons to remove their hats, and again and again small cards bearing the injunction of the law have been handed to offenders, yet without avail, in most cases, as women, conscious that their millinery is attractive and becoming, have been reluctant to take off their hats. Again, disposal of the large hats in vogue is easier, if kept on the head, than if held in the lap.

The management has been as lenient as possible in the matter, because the majority of women patrons have preferred to keep on hats, whereas the minority have removed theirs. Present remonstrance against the custom comes from the few, rather than from the many, yet these few have the law on their side. It is from them that the complaints have been made to the mayor, who, in consequence, has been forced to act in the matter.

It is a singular condition that while most of the women patrons of the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra keep their hats on, these same women, as patrons of almost all other afternoon concerts in the hall remove their millinery, without hesitation, before a concert begins. In the evening no hats ever are worn and it is simply at the Friday rehearsals that the law is ignored.

Not a few patrons of the hall have made urgent requests to the managers to have the hall kept dark, other than for the lights above the stage, just as is done in like places abroad and in theatres everywhere. They desire that this be done at both afternoon and evening performances. People who have made a remonstrance against the wearing of hats claim that their objection to this is because they frequently are unable to get a satisfactory view of the performers, especially soloists, and that failure to see as they wish to detracts from full enjoyment of attending concerts. Mr. Mudgett states that as the management does not make laws, and is, on the other hand, expected and bound to observe them, it finds itself in the position of urging women patrons to coöperate courteously in helping settle the difficulty by complying with the law.

LADIES, OFF WITH HATS AT CONCERTS

Mayor Wants Law Observed at Symphony Hall

War has been declared upon the custom of wearing hats at the Symphony concerts and rehearsals which has been practised since time immemorial by the feminine portion of Boston's ultra fashionable set.

As a result the fair patrons of these exclusive music feasts are destined to receive a severe jolt via their millinery.

ENFORCED IN THEATRES

Some years ago a city ordinance was passed making it compulsory for women to remove their hats in places of public entertainment.

All of the theatregoers were forced to comply with the ordinance, although many of the women objected loudly and long to this shearing of their feminine prerogatives.

But the ordinance was never enforced at the Symphony concerts. There they took the ground that the patrons of Symphony Hall went to hear, rather than to see, so that the wearing of hats could not interfere with the enjoyment of anyone.

In consequence of this the Symphony concerts of late years have numbered among the few public functions at which good dressers could display millinery.

That they made the most of the opportunity in this direction was the size and substance of the protests which reached the city authorities. The objectors to this "sea of millinery," as one person described it, said that the headgear of the feminine patrons of the concerts made it almost impossible to see the costumes of the fair artists who performed there, not to mention its preventing one from seeing their fellow patrons while being seen.

The Mayor issues the license for Symphony Hall and can revoke the same any time that he discovers that the management is not enforcing the laws and ordinances. It is understood that the Mayor is in sympathy with this movement to enforce the ordinance.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
NOVEMBER 18, 1910.

HATS OFF, LADIES, MAYOR SAYS AT SYMPHONY HALL

Mayor Fitzgerald has written a letter to Louis H. Mudgett, manager of Symphony hall, calling Mr. Mudgett's attention to the statute requiring women to remove their hats in places of amusement.

The mayor says that he has received many complaints from visitors at the rehearsals and he is informed that despite the regulations printed on the programs and notices posted in the hall that most of the women at these concerts ignore the law.

Mayor Fitzgerald requests Mr. Mudgett to take cognizance of this warning and have the law obeyed.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
NOVEMBER 19, 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The soloist for the seventh Symphony programme is a violinist new to Boston, Prof. Felix Berber of Leipsic, who was for many years concert-master of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipsic under Arthur Nikisch, and is regarded as one of the foremost violinists of Germany. He is to play the Brahms Concerto, which has not been played here for five years. There are two novelties on this programme, one a Debussy, "Rondes de Printemps," the third part of the Suite entitled "Images." It had its first performance in America last Tuesday night by the Philharmonic Orchestra in New York. The other novelty will be an Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra by Mozart. It was originally written for piano, then rearranged for orchestra. The other number on the programme will be Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

FIRST HEARING OF HADLEY'S CULPRIT FAY

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE GIVEN AMERICAN MUSIC

Berlioz "Carnaval Romaine" Overture and Works of Chopin and Tschaikowsky.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Berlioz. "Carnaval Romaine" overture.
Henry Hadley. Symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay."
Conducted by the composer.
Chopin. Piano concerto in F minor.
Soloist, Mr. Carlo Buonamici.
Tschaikowsky. Suite in G major.

A bright and thoroughly agreeable programme, with no headachy puzzles and few unresolved dissonances. In listening to this concert one could almost believe that music was intended for enjoyment and not for a severe task and lesson. The second concerto, in F minor, really composed first of Chopin's pair, is the better of the two concertos. Neither of them had thorough orchestration and they have therefore been retouched in this particular. The composition is another instance of the influence of women in music, for Chopin thought of his beloved Constantia Gladkowska when he wrote the larghetto movement, and in this there is much of the language of passion.

It is a work which can readily be sentimentalized. But Carlo Buonamici does not sin in this respect. He is always masculine and this virility gives to Chopin a charm which is not always found in his interpretations. Carlo Buonamici comes by his excellent gifts as a pianist and a poetic musician by inheritance, for his father has been the best pianist in all Italy, and has been somewhat affiliated with the German school as well.

The Klindworth orchestration, and the very effective Burmester cadenza (the latter a masterly summing up of the movement), are always points to be mentioned with respect. Mr. Buonamici did not play from memory, but had the music before him, which we think is a good practice. Why torture the soloist without necessity? It is much better that the music should be on the rack than that the pianist should be.

The Larghetto was played with especial power and beauty, but every point of Mr. Buonamici's work may be well spoken of, and the audience evidently thought so, too, for they recalled him again and again, which is a very unusual thing to do at the afternoon concerts. In spite of the revised orchestral part the work still remains more of a piano solo with accompaniment than a true concerto. A concerto should be far more sympathetic than this composition is.

Better a good Suite than a poor Symphony. Tschaikowsky's Suite in G major is one of the most charming examples of this style of composition, which is less formal and ambitious than the Symphony. A Russian seems only to be quite happy when he is very melancholy, and there is both an Elegy and a Valse Melancolique in this Suite for the composer to heave his sighs at the audience. But there is also a folk-song element in the work which is very attractive, and there are variations which are absolute gems.

We still doubt the effect of the waltz as a movement in classical form. Berlioz tried it first in his "Symphonic Fantastique," where it forms the least attractive movement of the work. Tschaikowsky has used the waltz-form otherwheres in his symphonic works, but even his skill and melodic grace does not reconcile us to the waltz as a classical movement. The Scherzo was one of those themal conflicts in which Tschaikowsky takes delight. There was in it much of the "Pride, pomp and circumstance of glorious War." But this militant part was finally overcome by mirth and jollity. The conflict between the two contrasting elements was well portrayed.

But the last movement of the Suite, the Theme and Variations, is much the finest part of the work. The theme, in the first place, is very attractive and might almost be a Russian folk-song, although it is the work of the composer himself. The contrasted style of the variations is striking, they are chorale-like, dance-like, contrapuntal and fugal by turns, and the climax, which was splendidly performed, was in the vein of a Polonaise, a rhythmic fantasie which is more than a mere dance and is often the climax of Russian occasions of festivitity.

Such variations always serve well to display each department of an orchestra, and violins, woodwind, brasses, all passed in review with credit, but the variations with violoncellos and contrabasses pizzicato was of especially commendable character, while the crashes of the finale made a very exciting climax to a work in which many styles of composition as well as of orchestration are displayed finely.

But the chief interest of this concert centred in the young American composer and his new work, heard here for the first time. Henry Hadley is a most promising member of that small band of Americans who have been able to plant the standard of cis-Atlantic music in Germany. He is not an over-ambitious writer who demands an orchestra of twice the classical dimensions before he will begin even a Slumber-song, and he does not lie awake nights thinking of how to manufacture some new discord that Reger and Strauss have not yet discovered.

Mr. Hadley has been wise in the choice of his subject, for James Rodman Drake drew his inspiration from native sources and was perhaps the first American to idealize our own rivers, lakes and mountains. "The Culprit Fay" is something that gives plenty of room for the display of contrasted musical moods. The fay has sinned by receiving the glance of a mortal maiden's eye, and is sentenced by the monarch of fairyland to two quests.

"Thou shalt seek the beach of sand,
Where the water bounds the elfin land,
Thou shalt watch the oozy brine
Till the sturgeon leaps in the bright moonshine,
Then dart the glistening arch below
And catch a drop from his silver bow."

The second quest is as follows:—

"Thy flame-wood lamp is quenched and dark,
Thou must re-illumine its spark.
Mount thy steed and spur him high,
To the heavens blue canopy;
And when thou seest a shooting star,
Follow it fast and follow it far.
The last spark of its burning train
Shall light the elfin lamp again."

Many are the obstacles which the fay meets in his two quests, both oppositional and the lure of temptations, before his final triumph.

Mr. Hadley has in this work rather followed Debussy than Strauss, since the subject calls for the delicacy of the modern French school. The work tends to extreme pianissimo effects and has some points of orchestration that are both novel and effective. The use of the violins in very high positions and in harmonics is remarkable, and at one place there is a picture of immensity, of vast distance, which is achieved by these harmonic tones against deep tone of the wood-wind, the harmonics sounding empty fifths; which is far in advance of Berlioz's attempt to picture a similar effect by combining pedal trombone tones against the piccolo. This last effect may be found in Berlioz's Requiem, and the two parts mingle about as well as oil and water. But in Hadley's work there was a perfect blending of tone and all the orchestral experiments were successful.

The extreme delicacy of many of the touches in this work may be well understood if one thinks of the hero as described by Drake:

"He has put his acorn helmet on;
It was plumed of the silk of the thistle-down;
The corselet plate that guarded his breast
Was once the wild bee's golden vest;
His cloak of a thousand mingled dyes
Was formed of the wings of butterflies:
His shield was the shell of a lady-bug queen,
Studs of gold on a ground of green;
And the quivering lance which he brandished bright
Was the sting of a wasp he had slain in fight."

Such a hero demands a style of treatment such as Berlioz accords to Queen Mab, and Mr. Hadley attains it with success. Tangible and attractive melodic thoughts are present through the work, and the dash of the sturgeon, the gallop after the meteor, the capture of the sacred spark, can all be followed without any strain of the imagination. All modern touches are employed in this tone poem which is scored for a large orchestra, and harp, muted horns, muted trumpets, and all other resources of the grand orchestra are drawn upon royally.

The end justifies the means, for here the full orchestra is used not merely to display modern cleverness, but for a definite purpose. We cannot imagine a more delicate setting of a more delicate subject, and it is pleasant to remember that poem and poet, composition and composer, are all American.

The concert began with Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture, in which English horn, piccolo and bassoon deserve especial mention, and the Saltarello was given with an appropriate joyful skip.

We ought to mention the fact, in closing, that Mr. Hadley was recalled over and over at the end of his work, which he conducted very successfully. It was a very spontaneous tribute, and one which reflected credit upon the judgment of the audience.

[82]

BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1910

American Composer and Local Pianist Seize Opportunity

Henry Hadley sings his prize song, Carlo Buonamici discourses pianistic scholarship at Symphony concert.

WAS it the fairy that did it? If not, what was the disturbing influence in the symphony music of Friday afternoon?

Heretofore, Oberon's people, when invited to take part in our concerts, very properly, after giving us their half hour of entertainment, have retired to make room for serious things. But on Friday the fairy king was not in a disciplinary mood. He handed his scepter over to Puck; and Puck told the rest to go ahead and take possession of the Symphony flutes and fiddles and not let go until they had their fun out.

So there was only fairy music at Mr. Fiedler's sixth matinee; or, to put it more correctly, there was some music that Oberon's folk made, other music that they spoiled; fairy fiddling, we might say, and fairy meddling.

The trouble began when the "Roman Carnival" overture was about a third part played. You would have said that the conductor when preparing for the concert had taken his men just that distance in the overture, and finding they were doing well, rapped his baton for a halt and practised the work of Berlioz no further. You might have said, too, that the Friday matinee was showing itself to be in truth what its official name implies, only a rehearsal and not in the severest sense of the word a concert.

Insufficient explanations. The blame lies with Oberon for letting his scepter go out of his hands. Thought Puck: "If this is a Roman carnival, I surely belong in it. Fairies! To your posts!" and at every violin's bridge at once a fairy stood, and into the tube of every flute, clarinet and horn crept another.

Such a jogging as the rhythm got at that moment! And it never found its balance again while the overture lasted.

"That was not very well done of us," said Puck to his crew. "No harm, however, for 'carnival' means each one act as he pleases. Ready, now, to go to your places again! Here comes Mr. Hadley, who brought us to Boston today, and we must do our best for him. All remember your tricks. Which of you is to be the spotted toad? Who is to be the leaping fish, and who the shooting star? Yes, and just as the fiddling is coming to an end, Mustardseed is to crow. Make it more like a sneeze, Mustardseed, and they will all laugh in spite of themselves. Twenty minutes before your turn comes. Watch Mr. Hadley, everybody!"

The orchestra does not need to keep anything secret from its Boston patrons. Mr. Fiedler and his men, coming home from a brilliant southern tour which maintained the musical reputation of our city and perhaps added something to it, could not be expected to prepare one of the heavier pieces of their repertory. Although the players arrived home early in the week, the work of the trip practically held on until the Cambridge concert of Thursday evening. The elaborate modern symphonies will come in good measure when Mr. Fiedler has time to give them the necessary study.

Suppose the director of the orchestra had undertaken to present this week a Strauss number, where would Mr. Hadley, the visiting conductor, have been with his little tone poem on the "Culprit Fay"? Surely, if the conductor of the Seattle orchestra were coming across the continent to perform his music here, the courteous thing to do was to let him have the first honors of the program. You cannot give American music writers a fair chance, you see, unless you retire your German favorites for the time being into the background.

Two things worth knowing we learned on Friday; first that we have a native composer with ability to write a score which in idea, imagination, color, workmanship and all other musicianly points is worth the consideration of a Schumann, Bruckner, Strauss orchestra; and second, that we have piano scholarship in our city that merits the Symphony orchestra's recognition.

Describe Mr. Buonamici's playing in the terms of praise that are customary in estimates of solo performance. Write down, touch, tone, execution and all the other words that relate to piano technique and place with each of them some adjective that conveys a compliment. Put the old phrases together in any pretty way you like, the result will not overestimate Mr. Buonamici. But take care when you come to tell about the performance of orchestra and soloist as a whole; for there you have the meddlesome fairies to reckon with. Puck, the considerate fellow, did keep his hands off Mr. Buonamici's piano.

Program of the sixth Symphony rehearsal and concert:

Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9; Henry Hadley, "The Culprit Fay," rhapsody for orchestra, conducted by the composer; Chopin, concerto No. 2, F minor for piano and orchestra, op. 21; Tschaikowsky, suite No. 3, in G major, op. 55; soloist, Carlo Buonamici.

* * *

CONCERT NOTES.

Felix Berber, a violinist new to Boston, is the soloist at the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon, Nov. 25, and Saturday evening, Nov. 26. Mr. Berber was for many years concert master of the Gewandhaus orchestra of Leipsic, under Arthur Nikisch. He will play in Boston the Brahms violin concerto. The new work of the seventh Symphony program is Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," which is a part of an unfinished suite entitled "Images." An adagio and fugue for string orchestra by Mozart will have its first Boston performance. The piece calling for the larger powers of the Symphony men is the "Death and Transfiguration" tone poem of Richard Strauss.

* * *

Max Fiedler is a busier conductor this year than he has ever been before since he came to Boston, and all to the benefit of our musical life. The Cecilia Society's choral program now entrusted to his care will call out those energies which the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony indicated were latent in him. Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" is the work to be given at the first Cecilia concert, Mr. Fiedler directing, and the complete Symphony orchestra assisting Thursday evening, Dec. 1, in Symphony hall.

Only season tickets for the three Cecilia concerts will be obtainable until Friday, Nov. 25, when unsubscribed tickets will be put on sale at the Symphony hall box office.

BOSTON JOURNAL, NOVEMBER 19, 1910

SON OF SOMERVILLE LEADS AT SYMPHONY

Henry Hadley Conducts His Rhapsody for Orchestra.

PIECE POSSESSES SINGULAR BEAUTY

Third Tschaikowsky Suite Is Orchestral Feature of the Concert.

A native son of Somerville, Henry Hadley, was the foremost figure at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr. Hadley, who was formerly a student here in Boston, and who is a pupil of Jacques Hoffmann and a brother of Arthur Hadley, both members of the Symphony Orchestra, conducted his rhapsody for orchestra, "The Culprit Fay," which is a setting of Joseph Rodman Drake's poem. It was with this piece that the ex-Somervillian—who last year jumped across the country to take the conductorship of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra—won the $1000 prize offered by the National Federation of Music Clubs. The Theodore Thomas Orchestra played it through the Middle West last season, but this was its first hearing in Boston.

The rhapsody deserves to be performed by every symphony orchestra in the land. It is scholarly and imaginative. It conjures up the fairyland where elfs and fays fogather when the watch strikes the hour of midnight on his bell of pearl, and where, according to the story, the culprit fay was condemned for his misdemeanor of permitting some mortal maiden to catch sight of him; it pictures the culprit regaining fairy favor by catching a drop from the rainbow of spray through which the sturgeon leaps, and catching, too, the spark from the trembling star; it makes a fairy tone poem that does credit not only to the composer, but to the organization that invited it.

It is written in the new style and it possesses that singular delineative beauty which characterizes the writings of Debussy and Loeffler. It is tone poetry of the most charming description, in which the imaginative element is matched with mastery of orchestral forces. When it was over the audience kept the towering young composer bowing for several minutes.

Another son of Greater Boston, this time an adopted one, Carlo Buonamici, was also one of the heroes of the occasion. He played Chopin's second concerto so well that it almost seemed worth while. His cyrstal-pure tone, his unerring legato, his intelligent interpretation of a piece that might easily have been made to bore the audience, and his brilliant technical proficiency combined to win high favor for him. It was an artistic performance, worthy of a better composition. The enthusiasm was in this case altogether a tribute to the virtuoso.

The orchestral feature of the concert was the performance of the third Tschaikowsky suite Berlioz' rousing "Roman Carnival" overture was the introductory number.

RECORD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1910

WOMEN MUST TAKE OFF HATS

Or Symphony Hall May Lose License

Mayor Fitzgerald has called the attention of the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra to complaints against women wearing their hats in Symphony hall, particularly at Friday afternoon rehearsans. He says that he is compelled to see that the regulations are enforced, even to the point of revoking the license of the hall.

The mayor in a letter to Louis H. Mudgett calls attention to the regulations of Aug. 5, 1898, and says:—

"I have received many complaints of the constant violation of this law in Symphony hall at the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. I am informed that, despite the printing of the regulation on the programme and the posting of cards in the hall, many, if not most, of the ladies who patronize these concerts ignore the law, to the extreme discomfort of their neighbors.

"These complaints have of late become more numerous and more emphatic. I have delayed as long as possible taking the matter up, not wishing to embarrass the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is one of the chief glories of the city, and hoping you would find some means to abolish the nuisance without resorting to extreme measures.

"It would be a calamity if it should be found necessary to put an end to these concerts for such a trivial cause; but the law is very clear, and distasteful as it is to me, I may be compelled to enforce it even to the point of revoking the license of Symphony hall.

"For 29 years these concerts have been a centre of the social and aesthetic life of Boston. This city has one of the finest orchestras in the world, and for this reason, if for no other, occupies a unique place in the world of music. I am confident that the wearing of hats at these concerts is simply the result of thoughtlessness on the part of the ladies, and when the matter is presented to them in a proper light, so that they will understand that a continuance of the custom must mean an end of the concerts, their loyalty to the orchestra and their respect for the law itself will bring about the reform asked for."

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1910

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

DEBUSSY'S new "Images" for orchestra, originally played in Paris late last winter were sure to make two of the interesting new pieces in symphony concerts in America this season. By common consent the conductors have begun with the shorter of the two, "Rondes de Printemps," performed in Chicago and in New York this week and to be played at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The title "Springtime Roumds" and the gay motto of the joys of the returning spring that Debussy has prefixed to the music, sufficiently suggest the vein of the substance. The substance and the manner of it are all of the composer as he is today. Side by side with the "Rondes" goes Strauss's tone-poem "Death and Transfiguration," the last of his pieces to the power of which every one agrees and which more and more account his finest achievement. The first half of the programme is classical, with an Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra from Mozart, to be played for the first time here, and Brahms's concerto for violin to divide it. In the concerto, Felix Berber, long the leader of the strings in the Gerwandhaus orchestra at Leipsic, and a violinist of the Joachim traditions, will play the solo part.

Thursday evening, Dec. 1, in Symphony Hall, the first of the joint concerts of the Cecilia, with its chorus raised to 175 singers and of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Fiedler conducting. The chosen music is the first part of Bantock's setting of the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, in warmth of imagination, freedom of expression and sustained interest one of the remarkable choral compositions of our time. The solo singers are Margaret Keyes for the Beloved; George Harris, Jr., for the Poet, and Robert Maitland, an able English baritone, for the Philosopher.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 2, in Symphony Hall, eighth of the afternoon series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Melba for the assisting singer.

Saturday evening, Dec. 3, in Symphony Hall, eighth of the evening series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Melba as just noted.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1910

DEMANDS THAT WOMEN TAKE OFF HATS IN SYMPHONY HALL

Mayor Writes to Management as to Complaints About Practice at Concerts, and Says Rule Must Be Enforced Unless License Is to Be Revoked.

Mayor Fitzgerald has called the attention of the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra to complaints against women wearing their hats in Symphony hall, particularly at Friday afternoon rehearsans. He says that he is compelled to see that the regulations are enforced, even to the point of revoking the license of the hall.

The mayor in a letter to Louis H. Mudgett calls attention to the regulations of Aug. 5, 1898, and says:—

"I have received many complaints of the constant violation of this law in Symphony hall at the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. I am informed that, despite the printing of the regulation on the programme and the posting of cards in the hall, many, if not most, of the ladies who patronize these concerts ignore the law, to the extreme discomfort of their neighbors.

"These complaints have of late become more numerous and more emphatic. I have delayed as long as possible taking the matter up, not wishing to embarrass the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is one of the chief glories of the city, and hoping you would find some means to abolish the nuisance without resorting to extreme measures.

"It would be a calamity if it should be found necessary to put an end to these concerts for such a trivial cause; but the law is very clear, and distasteful as it is to me, I may be compelled to enforce it even to the point of revoking the license of Symphony hall.

"For 29 years these concerts have been a centre of the social and aesthetic life of Boston. This city has one of the finest orchestras in the world, and for this reason, if for no other, occupies a unique place in the world of music. I am confident that the wearing of hats at these concerts is simply the result of thoughtlessness on the part of the ladies, and when the matter is presented to them in a proper light, so that they will understand that a continuance of the custom must mean an end of the concerts, their loyalty to the orchestra and their respect for the law itself will bring about the reform asked for."

[83]

Josef Hofmann

The Newly Ripened Traits That Make Him a Rare Pianist

USUALLY singers and virtuosi come to Boston well-heralded or long-familiar; and their hearers speedily settle into remembered or anticipated pleasure of them. Very rarely does circumstance give us the delight and the excitement of discovery, and it was this experience that made Josef Hofmann's recital in Symphony Hall last Monday unique among the concerts of many seasons. To all practical intents the occasion was his return to Boston for the first time since he came to it, nearly twenty-five years ago, as a prodigy. Once at least in the long interval he has played here; but then to so small an audience and in such relative immaturity of expressive powers that few after seven years could recall either the pianist or his playing. At one leap, then, with his public in Boston, Mr. Hofmann has passed from a prodigy for the wonder and the pastime of the hour into a pianist of the first rank, to be heard with every receptive and appreciative faculty at full stretch and with deeply satisfying reward to the ear, the mind and the emotions. The audience that he assembled on Monday was numerous, as such audiences even for eminent pianists go here, and it was finely and variously representative of the æsthetic life of the town. Youth was especially numerous in it, and youth is a welcome thing, since the pianoforte and pianists presumably have a future, at such recitals. No more was middle age lacking; yet probably few of the elders of the audience recalled the Josef Hofmann of the concerts of 1886 in the old Music Hall. Fewer still could have been of the handful of listeners to whom he played in Boston seven years ago; and as few, probably, were those who had chanced to hear him in his more recent visits to America in which he has resolutely disdained Boston, because Boston once disdained him. Thus were the discovery and the pleasure of it as complete as such things can well be. Perhaps, in turn, Mr. Hofmann discovered too that an exceptionally intelligent audience of Bostonians could warmly appreciate him.

The sum of the discovery was the disclosure of Mr. Hofmann as a pianist of the first rank by the titles of a command of all the resources of his instrument, alike when he made them fullest and when he kept them finest; of a mastery of the gradation, the coloring, the shading, the transformation, and the appropriate and expressive quality of tone that raised it now to beauty and now to power and often simultaneously to both; of a superlative skill in the enunciation and the interweaving of melodies and in the maintenance and the variation of the rhythm that gives them motion; of a clear comprehension of the chosen music and a discriminating penetration into it; and of a flow of ardent imagination and imparting emotion, directed but not checked by intellectual faculties that were always unobtrusively and objectively in play. Mr. Hofmann is not of the expository pianists, whom German audiences so cherish, that pour great music in pedagogic pints into the little pitchers waiting before them. No more is he of the heaven-storming band who raise their listeners into titillating tremors of nervous excitement. Least of all is he of the pianists who make calculating play with an "eccentric" personality. He is a man of the world practising an art that he cherishes and following a profession that he respects for what he can worthily accomplish in it. He does not expect his audiences to be interested in Josef Hofmann, the man; perhaps even he is too resolved that they shall not be. (No pianist so short and thick-set and still a little gawky, none so much preoccupied with his work and so little heedful of his audience, will ever much fleck the shallow fancies of the matinée maidens.) He does expect them to be interested in Josef Hofmann, the pianist, and in the playing that he accomplishes, because he will make them deserve such heed. Consciously or unconsciously, pianists of all ranks are prone, unless they are on their guard, to become more or less feminized by much playing to excitable feminine audiences. There is much and wholesome masculinity in Mr. Hofmann; he plays as a man to men; while he surely sets himself a man's job when he makes a programme, as he did on Monday afternoon, that continued for two hours without extra pieces; that included Beethoven's "last" Sonata and Schumann's Fantasia, beside exacting groups out of Chopin and Liszt.

Such a list indeed tested Mr. Hofmann's present powers and on the sides along which they have most ripened. The reproach long followed him that he was cold to the heats of romantic music and that he kept his audiences hearing it as objectively as did he. Now, if ever there was romantic pianoforte music, it is Schumann's Fantasia. It belongs to the years when he was happiest and when he was most his spontaneous self, before he took thought of what the illustrious Mendelssohn or the rest of the musically conventional might say; when his imagination teemed with thick-coming fancies and his creative spirit was as quick to invent and heat expression for them. It is not easy to say in cold blood just what the lines from Schlegel that he prefixed to the Fantasia really mean; and it is no easier to interpret the sub-titles that originally divided the music. The truth is that like the piece itself, they are all of a romantic mood—of the mood that in endless variations possessed Schumann and many another fine spirit of his time through the whole length and breadth of Europe. Now, the intrinsic appeal and stimulus of romance in any of the arts to us that are sensitive to it is its tang of strangeness, of mystery, of glamour. In an art so intangible as music, this appeal must be all of vision finding expression in tones. The Fantasia, then, is a succession of such ardent and varied visions—we may each make them what we will—finding voice in music that gives them also evanescent shape, intoxicating substance and iridescent color. The Fantasia must sound as a very masque or pageant of romance in the tones of the pianoforte—now all magnificence and luminosity as of deeply radiant visions and deeply answering emotions, again all restless movement and fitful expression as of racing flecks of mood; while yet again it must be as of shadowed and tender images, that soothe and whisper as they pass. Recall Mr. Hofmann's playing of the Fantasia. Dismiss for the moment all recollection of the bent and absorbed figure at the pianoforte. Forget even the means, remarkable as they were, to all that he accomplished. Think only of the voice of the music. And then how richly, variedly, sympathetically and completely he summoned it. At last he has looked on the face of romance and heard her voice; and the contemplation and the listening have made him such a pianist as he never was before.

Similarly Mr. Hofmann was long reproached with a lack of susceptibility to large, grave, striving and turbulent passion—the passion of fulness of years and of might and torture of spirit. They that so depreciated him granted him many-sorts of minute and flawless perfections, but averred that the more strenuous and agitated utterances of music were not for him. Unquestionably Beethoven's "last" sonata that he played on Monday is of such passion and utterance. When Beethoven wrote it he was already restlessly bursting the bonds of established musical form (as musical form then was), because it could not bear the weight of his thoughts and the might of his passions. He needed Choral Symphonies and great Masses for them; he was preparing to remodel the string quartet to his will; he was wrestling even with the pianoforte sonata. Of these struggles and aspirations is the music that Mr. Hofmann chose. The restless and striving passion of the first movement is large, grave, deep, mighty in its wrestlings with itself and with the power of tones. The following arietta is the voice of calmer but as deeply passionate song; to the end Beethoven continues in the vein of mighty and changeful rhapsody. Recall, again, Mr. Hofmann's playing of the sonata. The arietta may have been lacking in sustained exaltation of mood and expression. It may have been a little too beautifully crystalline. Elsewhere, however, in the strivings of the first movement with its alternations of emotional tumult and emotional exhaustion, in the rhapsodic excitement of it and of the finale, in the pervading voice of a mighty spirit in agitation Mr. Hofmann was as puissant as the music. The expository pianist would have kept the excited interplay of the musical ideas wholly clear; the purely emotional pianist would have blurred the whole with his smoky heats of passion. Mr. Hofmann fused the music as music and the passion as passion into a whole that the welding of emotion and its utterance.

And so, in turn, with the music of Chopin and of Liszt that the pianist played. Certain minds and temperaments will always demur to his versions of Chopin, because their Chopin must be super-sensitive, highly neurotic, a little feminized into endless and changeful excitability. To them he is as a most delicate nerve upon which every breath of feeling within or without momentarily played. Mr. Hofmann's Chopin is of more masculine and better controlled vein—the singer who knew the voice of the pianoforte as has scarcely another; who sang his songs now delicately, now warmly, now even strenuously, out of the changeful emotions of his heart while an imagination that was never still and always sensitive wove harmonies in endless and iridescent tracery about them. Mr. Hofmann's Chopin thinks as well as feels in his music; he does not merely cry or dream in tones. The thought of reason and method as well as of fancy and caprice in the composer orders the varied pace, the plastic outline that Mr. Hofmann gives his music. Of course, his Liszt is a Liszt who exacts a "transcendental" virtuosity, but also a Liszt who is not all technical rhetoric. Mr. Hofmann can find in the music its deeper and more imaginative qualities, as he found and imparted the sombre tone-picturing of the "Funerailles," the soft plangency, alike of mood and of sound in the "Consolation," and the aerial fancy of the "Campanella." Being a man of mind and imagination himself, he finds the like possessions in the much too depreciated Liszt of the virtuoso pieces, who did not often forget that technical show might express emotional substance.

Thus, then, does Mr. Hofmann now enter into the content and the spirit of the music that he plays, approaching it at once intellectually and emotionally, sensitive, yet continent; alert, yet poised. Having so comprehended and felt it, letting it play upon him and him upon it, he gives it imparting voice through the beauty, the power, the diversity, plasticity and subtlety of his tone. He is no pianist that would have the pianoforte the orchestra that it is not and that it can never be. He has searched its secrets too assiduously and revealingly; he cherishes it too much to have it aught but what it is. The old fancy that a musical instrument, thing of wood or metal, wire or catgut that it might be, yet had a spirit that inhabited it, has its fine significance. There is a community of spirits between the player and his instrument when a Kreisler or a Hofmann has both caressed and commanded it to his will. There is a sublimated technique that is less skilful command than spiritual persuasion and of such is Mr. Hofmann's. If there be spirits in the pianoforte—and there must be imps and demons in some—he can conjure them.

Only from such an affectionate and spiritualized technique—whatever it may have been once in the days when Mr. Hofmann was coolly and flawlessly perfecting it—could come such a tone and such a range of tone as his now are. His tone has not merely beauty and power; it has all the [illegible] all the powers. It can be superbly magnificent, clangorous, luminous. It can be all soft brightness, light-spun, a thing of iridescent gossamer. Between it can be songful intensity, firm proclamation, playful fancy, whispering suggestion, the sound of many voices woven into one. Its gradations are endless and water is not more fluid; its tints are countless and a prism is not more crystalline; the whole gamut of light is in it from shimmer to shadow. It bears melody meltingly; it glints with rhythm; it phrases as water makes circles in its edgeless flow. It is the voice of the pianoforte idealized, the voice of Mr. Hofmann's spirit, the voice of all that music may contain or suggest beside its absolute self. The "touch" that makes it is not only the intimate community of finger and ear and but the equal community of mental and emotional direction. The pedalling of Mr. Hofmann is as sensitive, too. With such a tone, as he matures yet more, he may do what he will with the chosen music, impart what he may from it. All that he may will that this tone shall bear, will not be more beautiful, more puissant, more commanding or more melting than it is in itself. Mr. Pachmann has tirelessly refined the voice of the pianoforte; Mr. Paderewski has driven it from might to might; Mr. Hofmann has idealized it.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY NOVEMBER 19, 1910

MUSIC NOTES.

The Sanders theatre concerts of our orchestra in Cambridge are becoming more and more interesting in their development of home talent. On Thursday evening Miss Bessie Bell Collier made a decided success with Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto. Miss Collier is one of the most promising of our younger violinists and has a breadth and expression that speak of artistic maturity. In the slow movement of this Bruch Concerto she displayed these qualities at their best. Her debut in these Symphony concerts was in every way most successful, and she was recalled several times at the end of her performance, received many floral tributes and evidently won the audience completely. We hope that Miss Collier may soon be heard in the Boston series as well.

A violinist new to Boston will be the soloist on the seventh Symphony programme which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is Prof. Felix Berber of Leipsic. Prof. Berber was for many years concert-master of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipsic under Arthur Nikisch and is regarded as one of the foremost violinists of Germany. He made his debut in New York two weeks ago with much success. He will play the Brahms Concerto which has not been heard here in five years.

The subscription sale of seats for the three concerts to be given at Symphony Hall by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been in progress at Symphony Hall now a week, indicates that the management made no mistake in bringing about the alliance of the two organizations. The sale of unsubscribed seats for the first concert which will be given on Thursday evening Dec. 1, will open at Symphony Hall next Friday morning, Nov. 25. Season tickets, however, can be secured up to the time of the first concert.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1910

HENRY HADLEY'S "CULPRIT FAY"

Prize-Winning Rhapsody Conducted by Composer at Boston Symphony.

MUSIC 'SOUNDS' AND CHARMS

Reminder of Early American Lyric Flight Now Too Little Read.

By PHILIP HALE.

The sixth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Carlo Buonamici was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
"The Culprit Fay," Rhapsody for orchestra.....Hadley
Concerto in F Minor, No. 2.....Chopin
Suite in G major, No. 3.....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Hadley's Rhapsody was composed in 1908-09, and it won the prize offered by the National Federation of Music Clubs in America. The composer conducted his work yesterday as he did when his composition was played for the first time at Grand Rapids, Mich., May 28, 1909.

The Rhapsody was suggested by Drake's poem of the same title. It would be interesting to know how many in the audience had read this poem by a New Yorker, who believed that the Hudson as well as the Rhine might inspire romance in verse and prose. The poem is to be found in its mellifluous length in "The Household Book of Poetry," collected and edited by Charles A. Dana in 1858 before he became embittered and when he had a poetic soul. Who reads Drake today, or knows of his close friendship with Fitz-Greene Halleck? "The Culprit Fay" has gone its way with Percival's "Coral Grove" and "Seneca Lake" with its sibilant lines:

"On thy fair bosom, silver lake,
The wild swan spreads his snowy sail."

Mr. Farwell provided Mr. Hadley with an argument, in order that an audience, hearing the music, might dilate with the proper emotion. It is not necessary to inquire how closely the composer followed the poet's verse. Music that is only panoramic demands little discussion. It was enough for a hearer yesterday to know that the Fay's purity had been sullied; that he was obliged to pay a forfeit; that he accomplished his task and was wooed by a beautiful spirit; that he was true to his oath, and returning in triumph, was welcomed by the Fays. He joined in the mirth. Day broke, the cock crew and the Fays were gone from mortal sight.

Mr. Hadley has indisputable facility. He has talent as composer and conductor. The conspicuous feature of this Rhapsody is the instrumentation. The music always "sounds," and thus answers the requisite of Mozart: "Musik soll klingen." The musical ideas, while they are pleasant to the ear, are not strikingly original, and in fact they have little individuality, but they are agreeably presented and there is poetic treatment. The composer has fancy; there is the suggestion of fairyland. His instrumentation is not that of an experimenter; he has fine tonal sense. An instrument is used, not because it should not be idle, but because it aids in expressing the composer's thought. His blends of tone colors are often delightful, and the Rhapsody thus pleases, rather than by fine melodic line or uncommon harmonic treatment. "The Culprit Fay" is frankly pretty. In this period, when so many composers wish to be profoundly impressive or translators of pessimistic thought, it is a relief to hear pretty music. There is room for it, as there is for pretty women. A handsome woman is often as terrible as an army with banners. She may even be as stupid as the Fotheringay. No wonder that the audience was pleased and applauded Mr. Hadley as composer and conductor.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Buonamici chose Chopin's concerto, which is for a smaller hall and a smaller orchestra. The poetic flavor of this composition is quickly dissipated in Symphony Hall, unless the pianist holds the audience by the poesy of his performance and by irresistible rhythm. Mr. Buonamici is more successful with works of extreme brilliance, works that depend chiefly on dash and tours de force. He played clearly, with fluent technic, with a command of himself that was too often severe self-restraint. His tone was crystalline, and in song passages not without warmth; but the performance as a whole was lacking in spirit. The superb recitative in the Larghetto should have been declaimed with greater dramatic force, and the rhythm of the opening measures of the finale should have been more sharply accentuated. Mr. Buonamici, who was heartily applauded, has many excellent qualities as a pianist, but this concerto did not display them brilliantly. The concerto is of an intimate nature. Mr. Buonamici shines in compositions that have exterior attractiveness; that require dash and virtuoso feats.

There have been much better performances of Tschaikowsky's Suite in Boston than the one of yesterday. The tempi chosen by Mr. Fiedler often did great harm to the music. The Scherzo, for example, was taken at so fast a pace, that it was hardly playable even by this famous orchestra. It was almost unrecognizable. There were variations that, on account of the pace set by the conductor, were merely a scramble. The composer gave the indication "molto vivace," it is true; but "molto vivace" does not mean that the music should be played so fast that it loses character and is beyond the performance of mortal men. And what is to be said of the hurried performance of the stately Polonaise at the end? The introduction for once was not impressive. There was no suggestion of an imposing preparation for something extraordinary to come. The Polonaise is pompous, ceremonious. As performed yesterday it was as any wild folk dance. Mr. Fiedler has a tendency to hurry his allegros and drag his andantes. Yesterday the performance of the Polonaise robbed it of its proud stateliness. Mr. Fiedler might answer: "But the audience applauded loudly." An audience is easily excited by din and blare and excessive speed. The public might, however, have been still more enthusiastic if the variations had been conducted with a finer sense of tempo.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, adagio and fugue for strings (first time in Boston); Brahms, concerto for violin (Felix Berber, his first appearance here); Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Debussy, "Rondes de Printemps" (first time in Boston).

[84]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT. SATURDA[illegible] NOVEMBER 19, 1910

THE MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

MR. HADLEY'S NEW ORCHESTRAL RHAPSODY

His "Culprit Fay" for the Pleasure of an Otherwise Uninteresting Symphony Concert—Mr. Fiedler's Mistakes with Tschaikowsky's Suite—The Disappointing Mr. Buonamici—"La Boheme" at the Opera, with the Familiar Cast of Last Year—The Conservatory Orchestra Heard Again

Once upon a time there was a "literary afternoon" at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra were to play MacDowell's posthumous tone-poem, "Lamia," and the learned "programmist" had reprinted bodily Keats's long poem of like name, which had suggested the music. Evidently it was new or forgotten to most of the audience and through all the course of the concert many read it diligently, absorbedly. With Henry Hadley's rhapsody, "The Culprit Fay," after Joseph Rodman Drake's like-named poem on the programme for yesterday, there was fair prospect to the cynically reminiscent of a second "literary afternoon." Drake's poem, which was published nearly a hundred years ago and that now the curious must hunt out of the anthologies, may not compare with Keats's in quality, but it would have been quite as new and strange to the company that assembles on Friday afternoons. Fortunately or unfortunately, the eminent "programmist" defeated these expectations. He found "The Culprit Fay" too long for insertion in even the spacious lengths of the programme book. A summary in prose that could be read in two or three minutes condensed it, and if Keats has had his day at the Symphony Concerts, Drake certainly has not.

Unexpected incidents, however, were not lacking. For the first time in some years a resident pianist, Mr. Buonamici, was the "soloist" of the afternoon, and for the first time since Mr. Pugno last played with the orchestra, a pianist had the score of his concerts before him. If to have the music before him helps rather than hampers him, there is no sensible reason why he should not have it on the pianoforte. Whatever way gives him the more freedom is the better way for him; but nineteen out of twenty pianists still memorize their concerts and the sight of Mr. Buonamici's score was a mild surprise. Then, too, there was the incident of the hats, though there was much more of it in Mayor Fitzgerald's office and in the evening papers than there was in Symphony Hall. The trouble began, it seems, a fortnight ago, when sundry women were unable because of obscuring hats to look their fill upon Miss Farrar. (Mischievous feminine tongues hinted yesterday afternoon that they "must have been dressmakers.") They and others who had been similarly irritated bore their complaints to the mayor, even as to an all-wise cadi in an Oriental town. The mayor was moved in his turn and wrote his letter. The management of Symphony Hall purposes to do all it can to persuade the women to remove their hats, without recourse to harsh measures. We shall see what we shall see; a fortnight hence Mme. Melba will appear at the concerts and necks will be craned to see her. Thereafter comes a succession of mere men, and with them the "agitation," like its predecessors in the past, is likely to subside.

Outside "The Culprit Fay" and the performance of it with the composer conducting, the concert was less interesting than any of its predecessors this autumn and for the first time the audience below stairs drifted away in perceptible numbers before it was done. In the nature of men and things and one hundred concerts here and elsewhere in six months, there is bound to be an occasional "off" Friday or Saturday at Symphony Hall and for no apparent reason. Yesterday, however, the causes were not far to seek. In the first place, Mr. Buonamici, who was clearly very nervous and who hardly did himself justice, played the pianoforte part in Chopin's concerto in F minor mechanically and drily, with little warmth of tone, variety of shading, elastic pace, sensitive rhythm or adept contrast. In the second place, unless there is some pianist like Mr. Paderewski or Mr. Pachmann, of very fine and sympathetic understanding to play the concerto, it sounds more and more antiquated and out of place in a concert-room of 1910, especially when Mr. Fiedler carries the accompaniment in such weighty accents and heavy sonorities as he did yesterday. In the third and last place, as a Scottish dominie might say, Mr. Fiedler dimmed the tonal brilliancy, obscured the rhythms, blurred the instrumental colors and generally distorted the scherzo, the variations and the final polacca of Tschaikowsky's suite in G major by the extraordinarily fast pace at which he took it. Plainly his men—and the highest of speed usually little perturbs these virtuosi—could not keep to his beat and play some of their instruments. Once, in a symphony of Beethoven, Dr. Muck so drove his men to a speed that they could not compass and maintain. Mr. Fiedler brought them to like case yesterday.

Of course the suite is brilliant, romantic music, rich in diversified and intense instrumental coloring, abounding in varied musical incidents and musical moods, frank of emotion, likely to stir any band of virtuosi that plays it and any audience that listens. Those who recalled it came to it with warm recollection and high expectation of the wistful and reiterated song of the "Elegy" that begins it, of the shadowed and haunting voices of the "Melancholy Waltz," in which it continues, of the vivid tonal contrasts of the scherzo, of the fanciful variations, of the thrilling sweep into the final polacca and of the stately and gorgeous march of the dance itself. The whole piece was of a sort that Mr. Fiedler and the band, especially when it is at the top of its form, usually play brilliantly, excitingly. The "Elegy" and the "Melancholy Waltz" went interestingly, but with no particular stir to the listening imagination. Mr. Fiedler gained the long rich curves, the mellow ascent and descent in the orchestral voices, the wistful "dying falls" of the song of the "Elegy" and by pace and quality of tone kept the waltz a phantom waltz moving against its shadowed background as to the reiterated beat of moody, sorrowing thought, sorrowing, in Slavic wise in the arts, for the sake of sorrow.

In the confusions and distortions of overspeed and misplaced accents the scherzo began. The hearer felt little of the contrast between the gay beginning and the ghostly march of the trio; the end was a whirl of inchoate sound. The variations followed in light play of Tschaikowsky's ready and changeful fancies. Better than in the scherzo, Mr. Fiedler kept their contours, their rhythms; but as he advanced them, he blurred more and more in a perverse zeal for a hot pace that was evidently mastering him. He flung his band upon the introduction to the polacca—kindling suspense in tones if there was such a thing—and the pace was too swift for the music to sound either sonorous or brilliant. Even the ritardando, which is the climax of the suspense, was lost in the instrumental bustle. The polacca itself began, continued, ended and all the way was only a blind ruse of orchestral speed in which the proud rhythm, the sumptuous color, the romantic stateliness were ground, as it were, under foot. In a sense, music so brilliant could not help "sounding"; but it ought to have "sounded" more—and far differently.

When Chopin himself played his concerto in F minor at Warsaw in the thirties, he believed that the first movement was "quite unintelligible" to the audience that then heard it. Yesterday, it was too intelligible to those that were listening to it eighty years later—in its meagreness of form, its bareness of orchestral chess, its monotonous alternations of orchestra and pianoforte, its want of most of the qualities of lyric and personal hopin who was now trying to be big and conventional. Mr. Hadley's playing of the accompaniment, which was heavy-handed and weighty of string tone did not much mend matters and Mr. Buonamici at the pianoforte was mechanical and nothing else. In the slow movement were the beginnings of pleasure because Mr. Buonamici's tone occasionally had songful quality, variety of accent, irridescence and intimacy. Yet he seemed to ignore more than the superficial contrast of the recitative in which the pianoforte seems to answer in melancholy voice its own richer and warmer song. To finale went better simply because Mr. Buonamici played with a keener sense of rhythm, of flashing phrase, of elastically modulated pace than he had shown in all the rest of the piece, and because Mr. Fiedler was lighter with his intervening orchestra. Yet the whole impression of the performance was disappointing. The concerto sounded singularly meagre, barren, virtuous. It needs a master of the finest intuitions, of the most adroit execution to play it, if it is to be played at all nowadays. It belongs to the historical hopin who is dull and threadbare and not to the hopin who lives because the beauty of his intimate and passionate melody, the irridescence of its harmonic glamor, and its sensitiveness to voice every lyrich mood are deathless.

Thus, the pleasure of the day lay chiefly in Mr. Hadley's rhapsody and the apt and fanciful fashion with which the orchestra played it. As the music of symphony concerts goes, "The Culprit Fay" is a light, almost a gay piece. It expresses itself, the composer's imaginings, the suggestions of the poem behind almost wholly in the quality and the interplay of the instrumental voices. Mr. Hadley has imagination and invention in timbres. He can make them fascinate in themselves and suggest the image, weave the atmosphere, imply the violin that he would compass. He can choose no combinations and contrasts of the instrumental voices, reanimate old to his purpose, modulate and shade them subtly. "The Culprit Fay" is not notable for melodic invention; for Mr. Hadley, like the other young moderns, seeks serviceable rather than distinctive musical ideas that still posses the hearer for himself. The form of the rhapsody is free but never spumeless, and though it is designedly brief, it does not seem short-breathed. The composer could have said more, pictured more, adapted more of Drake's poem had he chosen. His means to his ends are his harmonic dress, which is often fanciful and sometimes daring, and his resource and imagination in instrumental timbres.

Thus equipped, Mr. Hadley is indeed a wise young man in the choice of a subject exactly suited to his purposes. Drake's verses summon the fairy train at still and moonlit midnight; the guilty fairy—he had endured the glance of mortal maiden—is condemned and sent to his punishment—to swim the depths and fetch a drop of the glistening spray that the leaping sturgeon flings from his glistening back; to reach the stars and fetch a spark of their falling fire. Off he sets; a toad cheers his way; he has light adventures in the water and they are elfin; he has temptations in the stars, and they are of spirits. He achieves the quest; he returns to the fairy court; the faint flicker of dawn whisks it away. Tone picturing clearly for fanciful and adroit instrumental timbres. Now it must be—and is—as light as gossamer; now eerie with elfin voices and elfin steps; now flecked, as it were, with the spray and the spark; now swelling into baby tumult over the perturbed, the battling or the hurt on the way, wistful with a gentle longing not quite of mortal passion since it is of star-sprite and fairy; now gay with little touches of humor; now lightly solemn elfin-wise, when the fairy court gives judgment; now of tender fancy, as with the solo violin; now "creepy" of the terror—to elfin mind—of the night and the quest, now whistling with the eeriness of it all to elves, to us, and, may be to the orchestra itself. A trifle of light, buoyant, fine and inventive fancy that expresses itself as gaily, dexterously, pictorially and imaginatively in instrumental timbres. From beginning to end Mr. Hadley, as the saying is, "carries it off," and yesterday the orchestra was at one with him.

H. T. P.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
NOVEMBER 20, 1910.

HATLESS WOMEN AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Styles for Evening Help Carry Out Mayor Fitzgerald's New Order.

When Louis H. Mudgett saw the audience file into Symphony Hall last night for the regular concert he drew a long breath of relief.

"Thank goodness," he ejaculated, "they are not wearing hats!"

The manager had been in a fever of apprehension on this subject. Mayor Fitzgerald had told him that the law must be obeyed relative to the appearance of hatless people at a theatrical performance. The manager wanted to obey the law. But he did not know just how the audience would take it.

Suppose, for instance, some woman should say, "I'll not take off my hat, so there!" what would the poor manager do?

So Manager Mudgett concocted a neat, perstuasive little paragraph, which he inserted in the program, in which he asked the ladies please not to wear any hats.

Dame Fashion decrees that women in evening dress shall not wear hats. That helped the manager out last night. There were two or three women who wore hats, but when an usher told them the situation they readily removed them and the music proceeded without a discordant note.

But all the trouble is not over yet. In the afternoon there is no such fashion edict. Women may wear hats in the afternoon. Next Friday afternoon there will be a Symphony concert. Nearly all of the women will appear in all sorts of artistic headpieces.

"But I think by that time," said Manager Mudgett, "they will realize that it is 'hats off' here, and that I shall have no trouble. I hope so, anyway. The law must

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDA[illegible]
NOVEMBER 22, 1910

MME. MELBA'S present visit to the United States will end on Dec. 17, when she returns to London to proceed with her plans for the opera company that next summer she purposes to carry to Australia. In the interval she will sing at concerts in the provinces and in opera at Covent Garden. Here in America she will appear four times at the Metropolitan Opera House; twice more at the Auditorium in Chicago, where she has already sung Gilda and Mimi; and twice with the Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 2 and 3. Her numbers at the Symphony Concerts will be the Countess's air, "Dove Sono" from "Figaro's Wedding," and Ophelia's "Mad Scene" from Thomas's "Hamlet."

HERALD, THURSDAY,
NOVEMBER 24, 1910.

MUSIC NOTES.

The sale of seats for the first Cecilia Symphony Concert will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. The concert will be on Thursday night, Dec. 1, when Bantock's setting of the first 54 quatrains of Fitzgerald's "Omar Khayyam" will be sung for the first time in Boston. The solists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, George Harris Jr., and Robert Maitland. The entire Cecilia Society of 175 voices, the entire orchestra of 100 musicians will take part, with Mr. Fiedler as conductor.

The seventh program of the Symphony orchestra, which will be played tomorrow (Friday) afternoon and Saturday evening, contains the latest of Debussy's compositions for orchestra, "Rondes de Printemps," part III. of the suite "Images." Another novelty will be an Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra by Mozart. Felix Berber, the soloist, is a violinist with high credentials. He has been the concert master at the Gewandhaus in Leipsic, and he succeeded Hugo Heermann in the Conservatory in Frankfort and later Henri Marteau in the Conservatory of Geneva as professor of the violin. He will play Blahms's Concerto. Straus's "Death and Transfiguration" will also be played.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST
NOVEMBER 20, 1910

ALL HEADS BARED AT SYMPHONY

Mayor Wins His Fight Against Display of Millinery

Mayor Fitzgerald has won in his fight against the millinery display at the Symphony concerts. Last night not a hat or bonnet was to be seen in the great hall.

In response to a somewhat tearful appeal from the Symphony management, the women concertgoers took off their hats and toques.

The Saturday concerts are, of course, composed of different patrons than the Friday rehearsals, so that virtually none of the women who defied the Mayor Friday were present last night.

Friday afternoon has always, it has been claimed, brought out the fashionable ones, and the display of millinery at those performances has been up to the limit in style and elegance. So that, although the Saturday night trouble has been adjusted, those interested are wondering how the next Friday afternoon gathering will receive the Mayor's latest edict.

L. H. Mudgett, manager of the hall, and W. E. Walter, the press representative, expressed great pleasure that so general a response had been in evidence to the demands of the Mayor, police, fire department and management of the hall and orchestra.

Both Mr. Walter and Mr. Mudgett said that the action of the Mayor in stating that unless hats were removed the license of the hall must be revoked was laudable, for they saw no excuse why hats should not come off, as they do elsewhere.

The order of the Mayor relative to the law on hats was circulated throughout the hall on printed slips, which were inclosed in the programmes, and this was considered as being responsible for the general response last evening.

Mr. Walter said, last night: "There is no reason why the ladies should not remove their hats. We have tried to allow those who wore hats that did not obstruct the view to leave them on, but the feeling seemed to prevail that if one woman had her hat on, of course another could do likewise, and the same ran through the entire audience. The result was that ultimately all of the ladies got into the habit of wearing their headgear. I think that things will right themselves now.

"When Sergeant Barry and his patrolman were here earlier in the evening they expressed themselves as being satisfied with the conditions which they found and went away.

"If we do have any trouble it will come next Friday afternoon and if any arrives it will be necessary to ask the offending party to leave."

BOSTON JOURNAL
NOVEMBER 20, 1910.

CECILIA-SYMPHONY CONCERTS POPULAR

The subscription sale of seats for the three concerts to be given at Symphony Hall by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been in progress at Symphony Hall, is said to indicate that the management made no mistake in bringing about the alliance of the two organizations. The sale of unsubscribed seats for the first concert, which will be given on Thursday evening, December 1, will open at Symphony Hall next Friday morning. Season tickets, however, can be secured up to the time of the first concert.

The Cecilia Society, which has been at work on "Omar Khayyam," has attended the rehearsals with much enthusiasm. Mr. Fiedler has had charge of several rehearsals, the others falling to Malcolm Lang.

NOTED VIOLINIST COMING

A violinist new to Boston will be the soloist on the seventh Symphony program, which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is Professor Felix Berber of Leipsic. Professor Berber was for many years concert master of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipsic, under Arthur Nikisch, and is regarded as one of the foremost violinists of Germany. He made his debut in New York two weeks ago with much success. He will play the Brahms Concerto, which has not been heard here in five years.

Two novelties are on the program, Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" and an adagio and fugue for string orchestra by Mozart. The other number on the program will be Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

CORINNE RIDER-KELCEY. CECILIA SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

EMILIO DE GORGOZA CONCERT BARRITONE

BERBER TO MAKE BOW HERE NEXT FRIDAY

Leipsic Violinist Will Appear as Soloist on the Seventh Symphony Program.

A violinist new to Boston will be the soloist on the seventh Symphony program next Friday afternoon and Saturday night. This is Professor Felix Berber of Leipsic. Professor Berber was for many years concert-master of the famous Gewanhaus Orchestra in Leipsic under Arthur Nikisch, and is regarded as one of the foremost violinists of Germany.

He made his debut in New York two weeks ago with success. He will play the Brahms Concerto, which has not been heard here in five years.

Two novelties are on the program. The more interesting of the two promises to be Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," which is the third part of the suite which is entitled "Images." This had its first performance in America last Tuesday by the Philharmonic Orchestra in New York.

Debussy has anounced three parts to this suite, but only two have yet been published, the "Rondes de Printemps" and the second part "Iberia." The first part, the "Gigue Triste" is still unknown. The "Iberia" and "Rondes de Printemps" were first performed by the Cologne Orchestra in Paris last Winter.

The other novelty will be an Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra by Mozart, which was anounced for an earlier concert, but broken off. The Fugue was originally written for piano, then he arranged it for orchestra, and added an Adagio prelude. The other number on the program will be Strauss's tone poem, "Deaht and Transfiguration." The order of the program:

Mozart—Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra.

Brahms—Concerto for Violin in D-Major, Op. 77.

Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.

Debussy—Rondes de Printemps.

Soloist—Felix Berber.

* * *

The subscription sale of seats for the three concerts to be given in Symphony Hall by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been in progress at Symphony Hall now a week, indicates that the management made no mistake in bringing about the alliance of the two organizations. It is as if the old days had returned, when choral music was so popular.

There has always been a demand for concerts of this kind, but for various reasons interest in them had fallen off. But the response this year has been immediate and large. The sale of unsubscribed seats for the first concert, which will be given on December 1, will open in Symphony Hall next Friday morning. Season tickets, however, can be secured up to the time of the first concert.

The Cecilia Society, which has been at work on "Omar Khayyam," has attended the rehearsals with much enthusiasm, for the composition is extremely interesting. Mr. Fiedler has had charge of several rehearsals, the others falling to Malcolm Lang. The first general rehearsal for the chorus and orchestra is called for Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, November 27. The general rehearsal with soloists is called for the night before the concert.

MME. JOMELLI. CONCERT CONTRALTO.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 20, 1910.

HATS WORN BY ONLY FEW WOMEN

Symphony Concert Has No Incidents.

About 25 With Headdress Not Violators of Law.

Crucial Test Is Expected Next Friday.

There were no new developments last evening in Mayor Fitzgerald's campaign against women wearing hats at the Symphony hall concerts.

The regular Saturday evening symphony concert took place without incident so far as the hat question is concerned, notwithstanding the rebellious spirit that had been shown at the Friday rehearsal, by some of the women who were asked to remove their hats.

About 25 women wore their hats, to be sure, during last evening's concert, but they were all occupying seats in the back rows in the hall, so that there was no one behind them whose view could be obscured, and so they were acredited with not violating the law.

Manager Mudgett said that not the slightest trouble had been anticipated last evening, as the women who attend the Saturday concerts have been voluntarily removing their hats for a year or more, or wearing none to the concert, and so the fact that all save a few on the outskirts were hatless was the regular thing and nothing to cause comment.

The crucial point will come next Friday at the rehearsal in the afternoon, when every woman save those against the wall will be given a last opportunity to remove her hat. What will happen if a considerable number again refuse has not been divulged, though it is hinted that the mayor will then revoke the license of the management to give entertainments in Symphony hall, and that will effectually put a stop to the Symphony concerts.

One of the knowing ones said last evening that this whole hat trouble has been caused by two very small groups, first simply a few objectors against the presence of hats in the audience, a great majority of the auditors believing that the music can be enjoyed just as much when the hats are in evidence as when they are not; second, a comparatively small number of women who live in more or less distant cities and towns, who come to Boston to the Friday Symphony rehearsal and to do shopping, and, not knowing Boston ways and sometimes laden with bundles, insist that it is utterly impracticable for them to remove their hats.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Nov. 25, and Saturday evening, Nov. 26, will be of unusual interest. Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" will be performed for the first time in Boston, and Felix Berber, violinist, will play here for the first time. Debussy's piece was performed for the first time in America at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of New York, led by Gustav Mahler, last Tuesday (Nov. 15). Mr. Berber played for the first time in this country at one of Walter Damrosch's concerts in New York Friday, Oct. 28. Theodore Thomas' orchestra of Chicago played Debussy's piece at its concerts yesterday and the day before.

"Rondes de Printemps" is the third composition in a series entitled "Imagee." The first, a Gigue, has neither been performed nor published. The second, "Iberia," was played for the first time at a Colonne concert in Paris, Feb. 20, 1910. It contains three movements, "Par les rues et par les chemins"; "Les parfums de la nuit"; "Le matin d'un jour de fete." Mr. Boutarel wrote after the first performance that the hearers are supposed to be in Spain. The bells of horses and mules are heard, and the joyous sounds of wayfarers. The night falls; nature sleeps and is at rest until bells and aubades announce the dawn, and the world awakens to life. "Debussy appears in this work to have exaggerated his tendency to treat music with means of expression analogous to those of the impressionistic painters. Nevertheless, the rhythm remains well defined and frank in 'Iberia.' Do not look for any melodic design, nor any carefully woven harmonic web. The composer of 'Images' attaches importance only to tonal color. He puts his timbres side by side, adopting a process like that of the 'Tachistes' or the Stipplers in distributing coloring." The Debussyites and Peleastres wished "Iberia" repeated, but while the majority of the audience was willing to applaud, it did not long for a repetition. Repeated the next Sunday, "Iberia" aroused "frenetic applause and vehement protestations."

"Rondes de Printemps" was performed for the first time at the third concert of French music in Paris early in March of this year. Debussy conducted. The composition was then described as "short, luminous, full of color, always free in form and vague, according to the habitual methods of the composer, but an ingenious use of the folk roundelay, 'We Shall Go No More Into the Woods,' gives it cohesion and unity." This composition bears a motto: "Hurrah for May, welcome be May, with its wild gonfalon," and, written in 1909, it is dedicated to Debussy's wife (his second). It is scored for three flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes, English horn, three clarinets, three bassoons, double bassoon, four horns, kettledrums, triangle, tambourine, cymbals, celesta, two harps and strings.

The other orchestral pieces to be played next week are Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and an adagio with fugue for strings by Mozart.

The latter piece has probably not been played in Boston. Mozart wrote the short adagio in July, 1788, at Vienna, and then arranged the fugue, which he had composed in December, 1783, for two pianos. Beethoven liked this fugue and wrote out the parts—in score.

Mr. Berber will play Brahms' violin concerto which he played in New York. He was born March 11, 1871, at Jena. He studied at the Dresden and Leipsic conservatories, especially with Adolf Brodsky at Leipsic. In 1889 he lived in London. From 1891 till 1896 he was concert master of an orchestra at Magdeburg, where he led a string quartet. He lived in Chemnitz (1896-8), then moved to Leipsic, and was concert master of the Gewandhaus orchestra from 1898 to 1902. In 1904 he taught at the Royal Academy of Music in Munich; in 1907 he succeeded Heermann at the Hoch Conservatory at Frankfort-on-the-Main; in 1908 he succeeded Henri Marteau at the Geneva Conservatory of Music, and he is leader there of a string quartet. He has made many concert tours in Germany, the Netherlands, Russia.

CECILIA SYMPHONY.

The subscription sale of seats for the three concerts to be given at Symphony Hall by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been in progress for a week, indicates that the management made no mistake in bringing about the alliance of the organizations. The sale of unsubscribed seats for the first concert on Thursday evening, Dec. 1, will open at Symphony Hall Friday morning, Nov. 25. Season tickets can be secured up to the time of the first concert.

The Cecilia Society, which has been at work on "Omar Khayyam," has attended the rehearsals with much enthusiasm. Mr. Fiedler has had charge of several rehearsals, the others falling to Mr. Lang. The first general rehearsal for the chorus and orchestra will be in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 27. The general rehearsal with soloists will be on the night before the concert.

BOSTON POST, NOVEMBER 22, 1910

HAT EDICT PUTS MAYOR IN QUANDARY

Woman Patron Wants Symphony License Revoked

Still another phase of the Mayor's war upon the old custom of making the concerts and rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra millinery exhibitions reached the Mayor's office yesterday.

Miss Mary Buckingham of 96 Chestnut street, Beacon Hill, wrote to the Mayor saying that the management of Symphony Hall leaned backward in its efforts to strictly enforce the Mayor's anti-hat dictum, and she urged that the Mayor revoke the license for the Symphony concerts unless the management apologizes for the action of one of its ushers at last Saturday evening's concert.

ALLOWS SMALL HATS

She stated that although the ordinance which the Mayor directed to be enforced specially provides that a low head covering without any projection may be worn, the ushers at Saturday night's concert insisted that everything in the shape of headgear must be taken off.

Failure to comply with the directions of the ushers, she stated, brought threats of violent ejection.

Miss Buckingham said that although the headpiece worn by her mother did not violate the city ordinances, an usher "brutally" insisted that she take it off or be forcibly ejected.

She declared that she has demanded an apology from the management and asked the Mayor to revoke the concert license if he did not receive notice of the requested apology within 24 hours after her letter reached him.

The Mayor is now in a quandary. He threatened to revoke the license of the Symphony Hall people if they did not make the women take off their hats, now he is asked to revoke the license because the management made a complete job of it and insisted that everybody who listened to the Symphony Orchestra last Saturday night do so with bared head.

BOSTON TRAVELER NOVEMBER 23, 1910.

Concert Sale Opens Friday at Symphony

Friday, Nov. 25, the seat sale for the Cecilia-Symphony concerts opens at Symphony Hall.

This is the first season of the combination of the Cecilia and Boston Symphony, and the chorus and orchestra are now rehearsing for their first joint concert, at which Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" is to be given.

Bantock, now a man of 45, and Peyton professor of music at Birmingham University, England, was first known here as a composer last season, when Mr. Fiedler placed on his programmes his charming overture entitled "Pierrot of the Minute." Bantock is an orientalist, his music being tinged with the colors of the East. It was undoubtedly his love for the color of the East that led him to set the "Omar Khayyam" to music. He has divided it into three parts, and the part which is to be given here is a setting of the first 54 quatrains. There are three characters in it, the "Beloved," sung by a contralto, the "Philosopher," sung by a baritone, and the "Poet," sung by a tenor.

The orchestration is elaborate and will require the best efforts of the entire orchestra. The soloists are Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, bass.

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1910.

The sale of seats for the first Cecilia Symphony concert will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. The first concert comes a week from tonight, when Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will be sung for the first ... Boston.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1910.

MAYOR'S ORDER DEFIED; WOMEN KEEP HATS ON

Unless Symphony Patrons Obey Order Hall Will Be Closed—Management Alarmed

The request of the Symphony management regarding the orders of Mayor Fitzgerald failed yesterday to induce women patrons of the Symphony orchestra to remove their hats, and now the management, face to face with the dilemma of losing its license unless the edict is obeyed, is planning ways to resist the unwillingness of their feminine patrons.

Tonight Symphony Hall will be a battleground between the management and its patrons, and women who are not inclined to remove their hats will be requested to leave the hall. What action will be taken if a number of women present refuse to leave the hall or to remove their hats the management refuse to state, but they hope that summary methods may not be forced upon them.

WOMEN WIN FIRST ROUND

Yesterday afternoon the women won. Every employee worked valiantly distributing cards requesting women to remove their hats. Every woman present read through the printed request carefully. Then the wand of the conductor waved and at the first bar of the orchestra a few hands plucked hesitatingly at hatpins.

But the number of women who complied with the request was pitifully small

WEAR HATS AND DEFY THE MAYOR

Women Win First Round in Symphony Hall Battle

Continued from First Page

in contrast with the hats that still stood out prominently above heads. Bucket hats, toques, new hats, old hats, hats of every description seemed to be held even a little higher than usual and the fate of the Symphony Orchestra was trembling in the balance.

Mayor Fitzgerald's edict against wearing hats at Symphony concerts became known about noon, and as soon as possible neat cards bearing the following inscription were distributed:

Are Violating Law

"Ladies wearing hats in Symphony Hall during a concert are violating the law. Will you kindly remove your hat? You will thereby oblige those seated behind you and aid in observing the law."

Ushers and other employees darted about in the crowd in front of the hall distributing them and made sure that every woman to enter received one. Here and there a bared head could be noticed in response to the edict, but there were hats everywhere on the floor and the balconies were hedges.

Mayor Fitzgerald may not have realized the audacity of his request for Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, as it has been known from time immemorial as a show place of millinery. Probably no other place in the city ever abounds in so many creations of the milliner's art, and the majority are the freshest Paris fashions.

Men dodged back and forth yesterday just as they have dodged for Friday after Friday. They caught slight glimpses of Henry Hadley of Somerville conducting his symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay," they caught fainter glimpses between waving feathers and plumes of Carlo Buonamici, the pianist. Birds of paradise, ravens and chante-

Not the First Attempt

The present crusade of the Mayor is not the first time that the feat has been attempted, and tonight's occurrences are awaited with interest by all who are familiar with the situation. But never before has the loss of the orchestra been threatened to Boston if the edict is not obeyed, so that it is judged probable that hats will be removed tonight, although the gnashing of teeth and remarks under the breath may not be welcome music to the Mayor's ears.

Tonight this slip will be inserted in all the programmes:

"His Honor the Mayor has notified the management of Symphony Hall that, unless the law relating to the wearing of hats by ladies at public entertainments is obeyed at the Symphony rehearsals and concerts, he will be forced to revoke the license of Symphony Hall.

"This will mean an end of the Boston Symphony concerts. It is hoped that the ladies who patronize these concerts will come to the aid of the management in this matter.

"THIS LAW WILL BE STRICTLY ENFORCED."

Manager Welcomes Edict

The strongest objection to the new ruling, it appears, comes from those who live out of town, and who must fasten themselves up considerably to meet the ordeals of wind and weather. But Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, welcomes the edict from the Mayor. He said yesterday: "The ruling of the Mayor, who has written us an excellent letter as a result of many complaints which have reached him, will be absolutely enforced here.

"It was impossible to do very much this afternoon, though many of the audience were quick to oblige. But, in the first place, the ruling of Mayor Fitzgerald is perfectly justifiable from every point of view, and, in the second place, if the measure does not go through, Symphony Hall will lose its license, which no one in Boston desires. Mayor Fitzgerald, in the discharge of his duty as a public official, is assisting us to bring about conditions which we have tried to establish by request rather than command for several seasons. No hats obstructing the view will be worn in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon or Saturday evening, or at any of the Symphony concerts following."

Mayor Fitzgerald's Letter

Mayor Fitzgerald's letter to Louis H. Mudgett, the manager of Symphony Hall, was as follows:

"City of Boston.

"Office of the Mayor, Nov. 18, 1910.

"Mr. Louis H. Mudgett, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.:

"Dear Sir—I wish to call your attention to chapter 3, revised regulations of Aug. 5, 1898, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement.

"I have received many complaints of the constant violation of this law in Symphony Hall at the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I am informed that despite the printing of the regulation on the programme and the posting of cards in the hall, many, if not most, of the ladies who patronize these concerts, ignore the law to the extreme discomfort of their neighbors.

"These complaints have of late become more numerous and more emphatic. I have delayed as long as possible taking the matter up, not wishing to embarrass the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is one of the chief glories of the city, and hoping you would find some means to abolish the nuisance without resorting to extreme measures. It would be a calamity if it should be found necessary to put an end to these concerts for such a trivial cause; but the law is very clear, and distasteful as it is to me, I may be compelled to enforce it, even to the point of revoking the license of Symphony Hall.

"For 20 years these concerts have been a centre of the social and esthetic life of Boston. This city has one of the finest orchestras in the world, and for this reason, if for no other, occupies a unique place in the world of music. I am confident that the wearing of hats at these concerts is simply the result of thoughtlessness on the part of the ladies and when the matter is presented to them in a proper light, so that they will understand that a continuance of the custom might mean an end of the concerts, their loyalty to the orchestra and their respect for the law itself, will bring about the reform asked for.

"I inclose a marked copy of the license under which Symphony Hall is operated. Yours very truly,

"JOHN F. FITZGERALD,
"Mayor."

HADLEY CONDUCTS

Native of Somerville at Head of Orchestra in Performance of Own Composition — Buonamici, Local Pianist, Soloist

By Olin Downes

A very enjoyable programme, and one which meant a great deal to Bostonians, was offered yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, at the sixth public rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henry Hadley of Somerville conducted in person his own orchestral rhapsody, "The Culprit Fay," a delightful piece, after the poem of Joseph Rodman Drake, Carl Buonamici, the excellent pianist of this city, won a triumph with Chopin's F minor concerto. The programme commenced with Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival," and came to an end with four movements from Tschaikowsky orchestral suite in G, op. 55.

"The Culprit Fay" won the $1000 prize offered by the National Federation of American Musical Clubs for such a composition in the spring of 1909. Mr. Hadley has written very programmatically. The argument of the poem is followed closely step by step. The fairies assemble at midnight to sit in judgment on the Culprit Fay, whose elfin purity has been sullied in "the glance of a mortal maiden's eye." The penalty for the Fay is to procure a glistening drop from a sturgeon as it leaps from the deep, to mount the skies and procure a spark from a falling star. The Fay is discouraged, for his wings are soiled and his fairy chain broken, but he takes heart and leaps on the back of a frog. He plunges into the moonlit water, but the water spirits attack him, and he turns back in dismay. In a mussel boat he fares over the waters. Up leaps the sturgeon and he has his drop of spray. He makes the shore and mounts a firefly to the sky. A beautiful spirit of the air tempts him, but his word has been given to the queen of fairies and he goes forward on his quest. In the sky the star trembles, the meteor bursts, the Fay catches his spark and is welcomed back by the fairies. He joins in the dance, the cock crows for the dawn of day and the Fays have gone.

Mr. Hadley has written in a delightfully fanciful vein. There are, in turn, the suggestions of all the phases of the poem, the moonlight night, the court, the ride on the toad, the leap of the sturgeon, and the final pages, in a most refined manner, are truly impressive. The scoring is as felicitous as it could well be. The workmanship reveals the practised hand and the gifted musician. Mr. Hadley has steadily progressed as a composer for a number of years. He was recalled repeatedly for his admirable conducting, as well as his composition.

Plays From Score

Mr. Buonamici played from score and therein showed his good sense. A certain rather cruel tradition has developed in pianistic circles since the days of Liszt, who played without notes. It seems since to have become almost a matter of honor with a pianist to abstain from score during performance, and there is no greater nonsense. Some pianists have good memories, others have none. A will prefer to play with his notes before him, B cannot do himself justice unless he is entirely free of his score. Is there any earthly reason why a virtuoso should not establish the conditions to make himself heard to the best advantage—when he can?

Mr. Buonamici's performance was masterly. He did not modernize the concerto, which remains today one of the loveliest examples of that form of composition; neither did he perfume it or affect the languishing graces which many pianists seem to think characteristic of Chopin. Admitting that the performance was of a more robust description than may have seemed to some most characteristic of a very refined piece of music, it was musical and proportionate and full of delicious color. In spite of his masculine treatment, more especially of the opening movement, Mr. Buonamici played with true elegance, and he was so thoughtfully indiscriminative that, for once, the music came from its real period—just a little in advance of Field and Moscheles, and by no means of such modern origin as the concertos of Liszt, Chopin, fresh from the hands of Zellner, and in the midst of Kalkbrenner, Czerny and their confederates, wrote a concerto which was in disconcertingly serious vein at the time, yet retaining the old forms and the old orchestration.

Who, listening yesterday, would have preferred different scoring? Mr. Buonamici's pianism was of the most artistic description. His execution was as clean as a knife, and his tone, whether in forte or pianissmo passages, was always pure, singing, and legato when demanded, no matter how fast the tempo pace. To play this rather looked-down-upon concerto is a real feat, and a pianist who can sing the larghetto so beautifully and yet so simply, and give the finale such unstudied grace and piquancy, may well rejoice in the maturing of his powers. Mr. Buonamici was recalled again and again, and certainly his reception was justified.

The orchestral performance was brilliant in the extreme.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1910.

HATS ALL OFF AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

One Lone Woman Refuses and Her Money Is Promptly Returned.

One lone woman refused to take off her hat at the Symphony Orchestra rehearsal in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. She ended up by going to the box office and getting her money back. The several hundred-odd women who last week absolutely refused to comply with the hat-off edict promulgated for just such affairs by Mayor Fitzgerald last week, either weren't present or had changed their minds.

The wearing of small opera bonnets, which are a headcovering worn under the ordinary hat and which might come under the ban if the law were rigidly interpreted, was permitted. Any other form of headwear was not.

It was the surrender of a privilege that the women Symphony-goers had long enjoyed, and one which it might be expected they would stubbornly defend. The law requiring the removal of hats has been printed in the program for a number of years, but any effort at enforcement has always ended as soon as it began almost. The class of patrons that attended the concerts were not to be trifled with, apparently.

The Friday afternoon rehearsal and the Saturday evening concert last week looked as if the mayor would have to take back water. There were just as many women present as ever, and just as many as ever wore their hats. Ushers distributed printed slips calling attention to the mayor's orders, but the women threw them aside.

Manager Ellis must have awaited yesterday with some inward trepidation. He need not have. Because the women came in, removed their hats as calmly and peacefully as if they were in a theater, and the Symphony Orchestra played, the heavens didn't fall nor did the earth open.

Mayor Fitzgerald when asked to comment on the manner in which the women complied said: "I was very sorry that I was compelled to issue such an order, but the complaints forced me to do so. I am deeply gratified that the women acted as they did; it is characteristic of the city of Boston, and also in accordance with good government."

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1910.

OFF GO HATS AT CONCERTS OF SYMPHONY

When the Symphony concert began yesterday there was great trepidation felt on the part of many eager watchers. Manager Mudgett felt a little nervous. The ushers felt a trifle uncomfortable. But all was quiet and tranquil. No manifestations of fury were seen. Law and order had won. Hats in Symphony Hall will hereafter be nothing but a memory. One more Lost Cause is enrolled.

Only one woman held firm. Only one sacrificed the concert to her hat. She sat tranquilly through the first half until intermission. She did not see the worried face of Manager Mudgett, or the nervous dallyings of the usher he urged to approach her.

Finally one was thrust forward. Delicately he indicated the programme on which was printed the suggestion that ladies must remove their hats or leave the hall.

With haughty languor the Lady of the Hat arose and left the hall.

RECORD, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1910

The Cecilia society and the Symphony orchestra on Sunday afternoon held their first joint rehearsal on Bantock's "Omar Khayyan," which is to have its first hearing in Boston on Thursday evening in Symphony hall. The work has turned out to be one of enormous difficulties, but so thorough has been the preparation that a remarkable performance is promised. Those who heard it on Sunday afternoon are confident that it is going to enjoy a very popular success.

[87]

BOSTON POST, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1910

Hats Off (?) to the New Symphony Leader

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, NOVEMBER

After the reaction of Friday afternoon, the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening was sure to go better. Mr. Fiedler was content to take Tschaikowsky's Suite at a less obscuring and much more impressive pace, and he was generally more light of hand; while Mr. Buonamici had his nervousness in tighter control and so improved his performance of Chopin's concerto. The honors of the evening, however, rested with Mr. Hadley and his rhapsody of "The Culprit Fay," as they did on Friday afternoon. He conducted in it with like command of his men and ability to gain his smallest ends; while the music seemed as imaginative and suggestive play with instrumental colorings as it had at a first hearing. Sometimes, however, tempted no doubt by the sonorities of which the orchestra is capable, he sought a body of tone that made his fays and sprites and foam-drops and star-dust far too material things. Altogether the experiment with a composer-conductor of "local interest" succeeded; while that of a "soloist" of like appeal did not. Of course the Symphony Orchestra has its obligations to the city that maintains it. There are also obligations to the standards that have made it what it is.

Hats, Concerts—and Mistakes

THE mayor and Council of Boston have ordered the removal of women's hats at all public meetings. Hitherto theatre managers throughout the country have been obliged to make war on big hats unaided by the law, and they have won the fight, as hats are no longer worn by the women in theatres. But the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra have been noteworthy in Boston for the display of elaborate and monstrous headgear. The excuse of the women is that people go to the concerts to hear and not to see. This is not reasonable, but it suffices for a woman's reason. Of course, everybody wants to see the solo singer, whether it is Miss Geraldine Farrar or Mr. David Bispham. The musically educated wish to follow Mr. Mock's (sic) motions, and their enjoyment of the music is increased by the sight of the bows moving in unison over the strings. However, nothing in this is exactly to the point. Big hats in public places are nuisances. They ought to be abolished, not only at plays and concerts, but in churches and lecture halls as well.

The Boston ordinance, however, though perhaps justifiable as a matter of public expediency, is open to question. We are getting too many laws. If we have a law affecting headgear in the theatre, why may we not also have one regulating the cut of bodices, another prohibiting the interruption of performances by ill-timed applause? The theatre managers suppressed the big hat, with the aid of a powerful, untrammeled press, with ridicule, censure and insistence. The big hat hurt their trade, and they overcame it. It is now a matter of custom for women not to wear hats in the theatre. The custom could be established by the same means at concerts and lectures. Laws of all sorts should be made slowly, gravely, with much deliberation of their effect. Boston's big-hat law seems to us superfluous and ill-considered. [The New York Times.

News of Music

RIGHTLY, the Parisian contends that American audiences in the opera house with indifference to the outward illusion that the singing-players should convey of the personages they are assuming. You, they say, tolerate and even applaud Mr. Caruso, for example, as Faust or as des Grieux in "Manon Lescaut," when every aspect of his figure and nearly every movement that he makes is the negation of the romantic air that should enwrap such operatic lovers. Did they know the American operatic stage better, they might add that we have similarly applauded Aidas, who in figure and in the sootiness of their complexions, suggested nothing so much as a Negro laundress stopping to leave the "wash" on her way to a "fancy dress" ball. There was thought of these things before the Aida of Mme. Mells on Saturday at the opera house when, for a rare once, since Mme. Eames left our stage, the Ethiopian princess had beautiful and illusive aspect. No doubt the Egyptians were "sun kissed" and no doubt the sun kissed the Ethiopians, yet more warmly, but there is no need as Mme. Mells and Mme. Eames have persuasively proved, that in color Aida should be full sister to the "black Othello" of Shakspeare's line which most Italian players, in and out of opera, still construe as though it were literally and not derisively spoken. Voice is voice, it is true, in the opera house, and singing is singing, and there are those that would rather hear Mr. Caruso with all his unwieldy bulk and plebeian manners in romantic parts than look upon the illusive impersonator of them, if he happen to have less magnificent tones. On the other hand, the opera house is a theatre of both music and drama. The eye receives the first impression there as it does in any theatre, and an impression of color most of all. Black Aidas and black Othellos, as Mme. Mells and Mr. Slezak have discovered, are not for American spectators, even if a prejudice that Continental audiences know not, is at the bottom of such distaste.

Minor items of news are that Mr. Renaud has arrived in town ready to undertake Scarpia in "Tosca" at the Opera House tonight and that he expects to appear and in more than one part five or six times in the course of the season; that Mr. Hofmann will play Liszt's familiar concerto with the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Dec. 15 and Rubinstein's in D minor at the concerts of Dec. 16 and 17 in Boston; and that the programme of the next concert of "the Kneisels" at Chickering Hall on Dec. 6 will comprise three quartets by Reger, Tanéieff and Cherubini, respectively.

"Madama Butterfly" was performed for the first time this season at the Metropolitan Opera House on Saturday, and at the suggestion of Mr. Puccini with a new variation of the vexatious final episode with the course of which he and intelligent stage-managers and singing-players have long been dissatisfied. The Sun describes it: "Formerly Cio-Cio-San put her child on the floor and retired behind a screen to inflict the fatal wound upon herself. Then she staggered out and, falling prone, struggled dying toward the child, which waved a United States flag. Yesterday Cio-Cio-San gave the child a doll to play with and after passionately kissing the little one pushed it out into the garden. Then she slew herself at the top of the steps and rolled lifeless to the floor. Sharpless subsequently searched for the child and finding it in the garden brought it forward in his arms to gaze upon its dead mother. This ending, while perhaps less melodramatic than the original one, was equally theatric and moving."

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1910.

Peggy Frowns On Hat Wearers At Concerts

ASSERTS FAIR-MINDED WOMAN WILL HAVE THOUGHT FOR THOSE BEHIND HER

It is an admission that a woman is not abreast of her times or that, which is worse, she is indifferent to the rights of those about her, when she neglects or refuses to remove her hat at the theater, in the concert or lecture room or wherever it causes any inconvenience to those in her company or proximity. Women as a class recognize this and do observe the rule pretty faithfully, although those who are obliged to enforce it have complained that they need frequent reminders of the courtesy they owe others.

One feels wrathy at and at the same time sorry for the woman who in these days has to be persuaded by an usher or other authoritative person to remove her hat. You feel that she does not go about enough to become familiar with the custom which has become a practise in the last decade, and in this we nd cause to pity her, for life must be monotonous indeed to the woman who is so home-bound that she is ignorant of what is expected of her under the varying circumstances of ordinary social life.

HAS NO SIGNIFICANCE FOR NUMEROUS WOMEN

I am quite convinced that there are many women who go so little that the necessity of removing a hat at a lecture or concert has no significance for that reason. I sat behind such a woman at a recent lecture, which was accompanied by views. I was indignant at first, for while the woman's hat was not a monstrous affair, it did interfere with my view and my enjoyment. Looking at her and recognizing in her a type of woman who would not purposely give offense, I momentarily expected to see her come to and take it off. However, she did not and it finally dawned upon me that she was wholly unconscious that she was not fulfilling any and all obligations she might owe the public.

And so she sat thus all through the evening with women about her bare of head, even to her seatmate with whom she was on terms of intimacy. It wasn't vanity; the thought that she looked more attractive in her hat or the wish to display any imported headgear, for she was a plain woman, wearing a plain hat. Hers was a case of too little chance to observe and become versed in the habits of people who are more worldly wise. I doubt not at all that she has read many a pertinent story dealing with the very subject—that she has heard it discussed, but she has failed to apply it to herself because her little pleasurings are so few. It would not be fair to state of women stay-at-homes that they all fail, because some of them are just as much alive to the rights of others and the prevailing customs as anyone. But in audiences everywhere easily may be selected the women who do not remove their hats because usage has not made it natural.

SOME WHO ARE VAIN AND VERY SELFISH

Every one who is in any sense a theater habitue has seen a woman who typifies the very reverse of the one just mentioned. She is worldly to the extreme, vain and selfish. No one is of consequence except herself; no one's rights except her own are of any importance. She wears a hat for show and not for protection. If she thinks it enhances her beauty and charm she attempts to wear it regardless of the law or rights of others. She wears it just as long as she can without interference of the long suffering usher, and when he asks her to remove it she does so in a manner that speaks volumes for what she considers his impudence and inferiority.

She knows that the custom has become almost as an unwritten law among women who wish to be considered law-abiding, reasonable and considerate. She resents louder than any other woman the one who shuts off her view by means of a wide-spreading hat, yet she will deliberately wear her own when it suits her pleasure and express the greatest indignation at a politely worded request to remove it. She ought not to be tolerated, and while she is more numerous than she should be, she is by no means representative of women.

The woman who would like to wear and is tempted to wear her hat has only to put herself in the place of the woman behind her. If she will do this and is at all fair-minded her hat will come off and there will be an end of it. The woman who does not do this voluntarily in these days will be accused of narrowness, selfishness and ignorance, three things that the modern woman will not mother as her faults.

PEGGY QUINCY.

POST, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1910

Cecilia-Symphony Rehearse "Omar Khayyam"

The Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra on Sunday afternoon held their first joint rehearsal on Bantock's "Omar Khayyam," which is to have its first hearing in Boston on Thursday evening in Symphony Hall. The work has turned out to be one of enormous difficulties, but so thorough has been the preparation that a remarkable performance is promised. Those who heard it on Sunday afternoon are confident that it is going to enjoy a very popular success.

ADVERTISER, NOVEMBER 29, 1910

The Cecilia society and the Symphony orchestra on Sunday afternoon held their first joint rehearsal on Bantock's "Omar Khayyan," which is to have its first hearing in Boston on Thursday evening in Symphony hall. The work has turned out to be one of enormous difficulties, but so thorough has been the preparation that a remarkable performance is promised. Those who heard it on Sunday afternoon are confident that it is going to enjoy a very popular success.

GLOBE- NOVEMBER 26, 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Debussy Novelty Is Heard For First Time.

Felix Berber, Violinist, Makes His Debut in Boston.

Debussy's "Roundelay of Spring" and a Mozart adagio and fugue were played at the seventh Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon for the first time in Boston. Felix Berber, the German violinist, made his local debut in the Brahms concerto. Mr Fiedler closed the program with Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

Debussy's new work is the third number in his suite, "Images." The first, "Gigue Triste," is as yet unpublished and unperformed. The second, "Iberia," was played at a Colonne concert, Paris, last February; the third, the "Roundelay of Spring," was first performed March 2 last at a concert given by Jacques Durand, Debussy's publisher. The composer conducted.

Mr Mahler and the Philharmonic society played it in New York Nov 15 for the first time in America. Mr Stock and the Theodore Thomas orchestra played it at Chicago at their concerts of last week.

Debussy has not written a large work for orchestra since "The Sea: Three Symphonic Sketches," first played in the fall of 1905 and brought out here by Dr Muck in the spring of 1907. This composer does not attempt to hasten or compel inspiration, for he may now take his ease. He has said he might never touch his opera "Tristan and Isolda" again, that he had not done so for months, and would not until he felt the mood upon him.

It had been feared that this cessation argued for a declining, a decadent Debussy. The work of yesterday would seem to denote that imagination yet remains to this man who reverences beauty and truth while he commits wanton sacrilege upon some of the rigid molds into which they have been poured, as some believe.

Neither earthen pot nor golden chalice can give the wine its spell. There is no set formula by which Debussy, or any writer, could have taken this old children's melody and have worked it over and over as a round and have made all hearers say, "That is the song of May, of spring, of eternal youth."

Debussy has heard it with less of his whole tone scale than previous writing has contained, but he still persists in sticking pins into ears to whom beauty is consonance, and "discourses" are sore distress.

Some day somebody will discover that a dessonance, a harmonic combination of notes at war with each other, resolving to a consonance, a combination of notes at peace with each other, gives that consonance redoubled character and power.

Debussy's pungent moments are not chaotic. They have purpose and design, largely because of the rhythmic structure. There is no definite melodic profile, but there is about it all the freshness, the invigorating odor, the breath of spring.

In spite of a concerto which meanders on through interminably dull pages of uninspired music, Mr Berber won a cordial welcome for his unostentatious, well schooled, musicianly playing.

His tone is pure, yet of good size. His intonation is secure. The technic throughout is reliable and adequate. He played the work with evident regard amounting to reverence. His interpretative ability does not move one to great emotional depths, but commands sincere respect.

Mr Fiedler's reading and the orchestra's playing of the "Death and Transfiguration" was searching, towering, compelling.

Here Strauss has written with salient, significant material and with purity and logic in development. The plan is stupendous, but consistent. Furthermore it is worthy, lofty, sublime.

There is no higher mount of ascension to which man may rise in religion or philosophy than the question, "O, death, where is thy sting; O, grave where is thy victory?"

Strauss has made the orchestra sound the depths of human pathos in suffering. He has done a more spiritual, a more unattainable thing in making man transfigured, all conquering through death in a mighty apotheosis of tone which was as the rolling back of the curtain of eternity. It was a memorable performance.

[88]

"Rondes De Printemps"

A Word About Debussy's New Piece for the Symphony Concerts

IT can never be said of Claude Debussy that he is precipitate in giving his music to the world, nor that it is the fruit of hasty inspiration. For in an epoch whose feverish productivity is a questionable quality, implying a decline in self-criticism, Debussy spent ten years over "Pelléas and Mélisande." Furthermore it was three years before he brought forward his next large work, the "Symphonic Sketches," entitled "The Sea." Similarly, after a lapse of four years he turned to the composition of three "Images," "Gigue Triste," "Ibéria" and "Rondes de Printemps." The last of the three seems to have found the most favor with American conductors, for Mr. Damrosch in New York, and Mr. Stock gave it a place upon their programmes of last week, and Mr. Fiedler purposes to give the first Boston performance at the Symphony Concerts of this week. Inasmuch as Debussy's music falls strangely upon even the most receptive ears at a first hearing, some tentative analysis of the style and substance of the new "Image" may be not inappropriate.

From indications in the publishers' catalogues, these "Images" were composed in 1909, originally for two pianos. The present version for orchestra is in the nature of a free adaptation with the inevitable addition of picturesque details to the more elastic and coloristic medium of the orchestra. So far, Debussy has only orchestrated "Ibéria" and the "Rondes de Printemps," and the "Gigue Triste" seems to have remained under the ban of his critical disapproval. In "Ibéria" the composer has frankly turned towards Spain for inspiration, seeking to revivify his imagination with scenes and melodies which have haunted French composers from Chabrier to Ravel. "Rondes de Printemps" is essentially French in mood and melodic material. It is doubtful whether even the composer framed a "programme" for this work, but that he intended to give a clew to its character and prevailing spirit is evident in the quotation, "Vive le Mai, bienvenu soit le Mai avec son gonfalon sauvage." The "Rondes de Printemps" is a fanciful and rhapsodic poem to the Spring which is none the less articulate and impressionable because of its seeming vagueness. From the conventional standpoint of "tonality" and "form," this piece is free and radical even in the modern acceptance of the treatment of these technical terms, but Debussy has nevertheless attained a "form" of his own, a definite lucidity of construction in the coherent interweaving of episodes, and above all a consistent outgrowth from one rhythm to another in a legitimate mastery of technical artifice. The central melodic idea of the piece comes from a French children's song, "Nous n'irons plus au bois," but the listener who was not forewarned, would scarcely recognize the original melody in the many modifications of rhythm and harmony to which it is subjected.

While indications of structure are at best difficult if not all but impossible to follow, a brief outlining of Debussy's procedure may help to impart a greater definiteness to his rhapsodic utterance. To an opening tremolo of the violins, the bassoons and horns suggest in alternation a hint of a theme, this is taken up by the clarinets and English horn in a more palpable melodic outline. It is taken up by one instrument after another, grows in intensity, and suddenly appears in a lighter and more fantastic version with the uncommon rhythm of fifteen eighth notes to the measure. We get a hasty glimpse of the children's song in the minor mode, but the mood of the fantastic episode persists in new guises, fancifully developed along fresh lines, yet clearly connected with its earlier form. There are moments of forceful orchestral insistence upon a new melodic phrase, but these give way, aided by returns of the folk song theme, to a new episode. In much slower tempo the introductory figure in the first violins divided over a delicate accompaniment of celesta, harp and soft strings tremolo. But soon the tempo changes to allegro, the oboe gives out the theme founded on the children's song in a rhythm of frank gaiety; it is answered by 'cellos and basses. Then clarinets, oboe, English horn and piccolo toss it back and forth over a new harmony, with that scholastic device know as "imitation," which one scarcely associates with Debussy. The music grows in intensity and harmonic daring, until violas, harp and English horn utter emphatically the children's song in notes of double the previous value, another scholastic device known as "augmentation." This in turn gives way to the episode in fifteen-eight time, for the most part repeated as before until a fresh modulation introduces a light and rhythmic accompaniment in strings and flutes, against which we hear a new and joyous "augmented" version of the folk song. This is continued with fanciful gaiety, often interwoven with the song theme in its original form, until we arrive at an increasingly rhythmic climax in which the song theme is modified once more in a fresh harmonic presentation. To an increasing pace, the orchestra gains in verve and brilliance up to an outburst of its full force, then subsides with a novel harmonic sequence, intensely characteristic of Debussy's poetic vision, for a moment of delicate preparation before the upward swoop of harps glissando to its final vigorous sive message. For those to whom Debussy speaks in vague and unapproachable riddles, the comment of M. Louis Laloy, after the first performance of the work under Debussy's baton at a concert of French music organized by the Parisian publishing house of Durand, may help to elucidate its inner meaning.

"The 'Rondes de Printemps' sing the joy of a tender renewal—an innocence more than original, childlike and divine; that of the opening flowers, of the branches which give themselves to the breezes of heaven. Here the emotion comes to us direct, but it retains the motion of the air and the clarity which filters through the transparent leaves. Thus these two works ('Ibéria' and 'Rondes de Printemps'), each with a different character and in unlike proportion, bring about this alliance of sentiment and sensation which Claude Debussy has always sought, which he alone can give us, and which he has succeeded at present in giving a more concise form than ever.

"Music which is all sentiment is abstract; music which is all sensation has no continuity. By the constant and natural union of one and the other Joaquin des Prés, François Couperin and Mozart were pure musicians. Claude Debussy is of their lineage. This latest work brings him especially close to Mozart, on account of the ingenuity of the subject, which permitted him to show a like aptitude for evolving music from itself, without the intervention of circumstance, story or drama. But in Mozart, restricted by preoccupation for development and symmetry, freedom of invention appeared only at intervals. Here, on the other hand, invention furnishes everything. Without ceasing melody germinates and springs from melody, and order, more essential to an art without fixed forms than any other, constitutes itself a created order. There is not here the invariable and predestined progress of this or that movement from a sonata or symphony, but a harmony of lines, a disposition of plan, a sense of proportion, a fitness and balance, which henceforth must be found for each musical work, as in the plastic arts. It constitutes in itself a rhythm."

"Claude Debussy has long since been infallible in determining this unity of rhythm, but he has never maintained its grace with such rigorous firmness. The work is pervaded by one idea unceasingly varied, from which it flowers as from a supple branch. This idea, hardly perceptible at first, disengages itself little by little from the life which palpitates about it, but gradually takes on new motives which it fosters from its own sap, now they disappear before its say, now it becomes enveloped by their abundance, without allowing its invisible support to become obscured. This idea originated in an old children's song, which has already appeared in the third "Estampes," "Gardens in the Rain." But its transformation is such that there is no question of borrowing, and one must be warned to recognize the notes of the round in this aerial dance, in which Corot's nymphs alone with their vaporous bodies could follow the sudden caprices and the resistless buoyancy; a purely musical dance which has its own gestures, and does not ask help from material movement; a dance of tones, like them impalpable, diaphanous, which leads the imagination forward with irresistible power. From its charm one feels that the soul of the forest is awakening around about, and singing its own song, a song that we do not know, for it is not that of the birds, nor even the rustling of leaves, or the trickling of springs. All is revelation here, and not imitation."

Thus it is evident that the "Rondes de Printemps" is a work, fundamentally musical in its essence, which tells its story in its own untranslatable medium, making its imaginative appeal from its native suggestibility. It remains only to characterize briefly its orchestral style. Debussy has always shown himself a master in economy of orchestral material, in delicateset sensible variations of sonority. If in "The Sea" he attempted a larger canvas with perhaps relatively less success in bolder impressionistic splashes of color, in the "Rondes de Printemps" he returns to his early simplicity, but at the same time gains palpably in fusing it with greater richness of timbres, a more marked conciseness and surety of effect. If Debussy does not use the ultra-modern orchestra of a Strauss or a Mahler, he is none the less from his native standpoint vital and above all poetic.

E. B. H.

From even a brief outline of its structure, it can be seen that this "Image" is far removed from the reproach of aimless vagaries of form. In fact Debussy has seldom exhibited more constructive skill, and a more happy assimilation of some of the features of academic workmanship. The pliability with which he makes the children's song subserve his expressive purpose, now in one form and now in another, shows a mastery of his material which indicates no retrogression. From the standpoint of rhythm, Debussy exhibits a sensitive and imaginative manipulation of a quality for which the French in general, and he in particular, have manifested an especial predilection. This development of rhythmic interplay extends not merely to the answering of phrase by its complement, but in the adjustment of the separate episodes to one another in such a fashion as to form an organic undercurrent throughout the whole work. To achieve such distinction of inter-relation is difficult enough in the symphonic and sonata forms but is incredibly more problematic when the composer has not the conventional framework of structure to lean upon. To maintain as Debussy has done such internal elasticity without detriment either to coherence or freedom of expression bespeaks an uncommon and distinguished mastery.

To characterize the musical substance of the "Rondes de Printemps" involves the well-nigh insoluble problem of giving concrete utterance to the intangible. For in this piece Debussy has given free rein to all the subtleties of his somewhat subjective imagination. He has sought to enchain an impalpable succession of fleeting moods each instinct with one phase or another of spontaneous joy in spring. For those to whom his evanescent individuality possesses the quality of evoking and answering inward sympathy, "Rondes de Printemps" will [illegible] an obvious if at first slightly elu-

News of Music

AT the Symphony Concerts next week, when Mme. Melba will sing with the orchestra, it will play for the first time in Boston, "Brigg Fair," the rhapsody by Delius, that Mr. Fiedler originally announced a year and more ago. It is of the composer's shorter and lighter pieces, free variations as it were upon an old English folk-tune, all dressed in very compact and sensuous instrumentation, with melancholy, rather than the boorish frolic that the title suggests, for its pervading vein. With it, in addition to Mme. Melba's pieces, will go Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony—the symphony of the long and passionate song of the Andante—and since it is the alternate year that brings Weber to the programmes—his overture to "Der Freischütz."

The zeal that laid a heavy and a removing hand upon the women's hats and bonnets in Symphony Hall last Friday afternoon has not yet extended to the neighboring auditorium for smaller concerts and recitals. On Monday afternoon for Mr. de Gogorza and on Tuesday afternoon for Mme. Jomelli and Miss Nichols, the audiences in Jordan Hall were largely feminine and every woman who chose to keep her hat on her head—and nine out of ten of them did—were it undisturbed. No admonition on the programme and no word from the ushers suggested that this obstructing head-gear should be removed. Yet all the concert halls in the city are amenable to the regulation that the management of Symphony Hall is trying to enforce under Mayor Fitzgerald's prompting. Some of the aggrieved there carried their complaints to him. Presumably none has done so with the other concert rooms.

BOSTON GLOBE
DECEMBER 1, 1910.

FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

Opening Part of Omar Khayyam to Be Given Tonight by Symphony Orchestra and Cecilia Society.

Tonight brings, at Symphony hall, the first of the Cecilia-Boston symphony concerts under Max Fiedler as conductor, when the first part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" will have its first performance in this city.

The work is a setting of the first 54 quatrains of FitzGerald's version of the Rubaiyat. The entire Cecilia society of 175 voices will be used, and the entire Symphony orchestra of 100 musicians will also be employed.

The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes contralto, George Harris Jr tenor and Robert Maitland baritone.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN NOVEMBER 27, 1910.

"OMAR KHAYYAM" CONCERT FEATURE

Poem Set to Music by Cecilia Society and Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The most important musical event of the coming week in more senses than one will be the performance of the first part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" at Symphony Hall next Thursday evening, by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Fiedler as the conductor. It is expected that this concert will mark a decided revival of interest in choral music in Boston, and the concert should give to Boston as nearly a perfect choral and orchestral performance as this city has ever heard.

Bantock, which overture "Pierrot of the Minute" attracted such favorable comment a year ago at the Symphony concerts, divides with Elgar the honor of being the foremost English composer. His setting of the 101 stanzas of FitzGerald's version of the Rubaiyat is by all odds his most important undertaking. The entire setting is divided into three parts, the First Part consisting of the first fifty-four stanzas, and this in itself makes an evening's entertainment.

Dramatis Personae.

In order to make the poem more amenable to musical treatment by associating the stanzas with definite characters and making them appear as utterances of distinct personages, Mr. Bantock has provided dramatis personae for his work. These are the Poet, the Beloved and the Philosopher and at times the Chorus—at other times the chorus being employed as it was in Greek drama: to punctuate the course of the poem with reflections on the sentiments expressed by the other characters.

In order to give full and free expression to the multi-colored musical fancies which his exuberant imagination suggested, Mr. Bantock has found it necessary to make use of an orchestra of unusual proportions and to employ two separate choruses, each of which is again at times subdivided, as well as a semi-chorus. The strings of the orchestra are grouped in two distinct sections corresponding to the two choruses. This has made it possible to produce the most varied tonal effect with greater ease than could have been done with the customary arrangement. The wind instruments called for are more than ordinarily numerous, while the instruments of percussion include the kettle drum, bass drum, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, gong, Glockenspiel and harps and the composer has added a camel bell and an orchestral hand drum.

The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto, George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, baritone. Miss Keyes, naturally, will sing the part of the Beloved, Mr. Harris that of the Poet, and Mr. Maitland that of the Philosopher. The concert will begin at 8 o'clock precisely.

Melba at the Symphony.

Madame Melba will make her only appearance of the season at next week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will sing for her first number the aria "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and for her second number the Mad Scene from "Hamlet." Both of these numbers she sang with enormous success two weeks ago in New York.

The orchestral part of the program will begin with Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. Then will come one of the important novelties of the season Fritz Delius's English Rhapsody entitled, "Brigg Fair." This had its first performance in America a short time ago by the Damrosch Orchestra in New York. Delius is one of the leading English composers and his "Paris," which was played last year, made a distinct impression on those who heard it. The final number will be the "Der Freischutz" overture by Weber.

RECORD, THURSDAY,
DECEMBER 1, 1910

FIRST CECILIA-SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

Tonight brings at Symphony Hall the first of the Cecilia-Boston Symphony concerts under Max Fiedler as conductor, when the First Part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Knayyam" will have its first performance in this city. The work is a setting of the first 57 quatrains of FitzGerald's version of the Rubaiyat, in which the composer has taken the liberty of giving various of the stanzas now to the Beloved, now to the Poet, now to the Philosopher and now to the chorus. The entire Cecilia Society of 175 voices will be used and the entire Symphony Orchestra of 200 musicians will also be employed.

The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, baritone.

HATS OFF AT SYMPHONY HALL

HATS OFF AT SYMPHONY

Law is Obeyed--Defiant Woman Leaves in Middle of Concert.

The second round of the battle of the hats at the symphony rehearsals yesterday afternoon resulted in a complete if polite victory for the antihatters.

This does not by any means signify that no hats were worn during the concert.

The back rows of the balconies were full of "hatties," in all the varieties of grotesquerie that the minds of the milliners have conceived. But there was nobody behind these hats but the statuary, and that could see over them, being of heroic size.

Also there was one woman downstairs, in the middle of the audience, who kept a large black confection defiantly on her head through the first half of the concert—and then left the hall altogether, going away in an automobile. This woman had a veil pinned round her head, and the veil was fastened in a peculiarly inaccessible place, down the middle of the back of her head, with pins. If she had succeeded in taking that hat off she never could have put it on again unaided.

Furthermore, another woman stood beneath the balcony, well down toward the front, wearing her hat. This was by special arrangement with the management, for this woman went to Mr Ellis' office and asked for permission. She had a seat in the front row, she said, but she simply couldn't take off her hat. Rather than miss the music she was willing to stand, if Mr Ellis was willing to let her.

Less than a dozen older women, wearing close-fitting bonnets, were allowed to keep them on without protest. And one very old man kept his hat on during the first part of the rehearsal, taking it off upon request by an usher. The protest against his wearing his hat came from a woman newspaper reporter.

Considerable interest was shown in the question whether it would be necessary for the management to ask a woman to leave the hall because she would not take off her hat. The first attempt to have hats removed was at the rehearsal a week ago, in response to a request from the mayor. At the Saturday night concert last week there were almost no hats, but this is usual. The real test was expected to come yesterday.

Of course the bad weather may have prevented a fair test; that is, it is possible that on account of the rain some women may have worn hats easier to take off than the regularly ordained symphony hats would have been—and for that matter gowns in which it is easier to reach up to the hatpins than the regularly ordained symphony rehearsal gowns.

Manager Mudgett, who by long contact with the public has learned lots of this lore, says: "Many women simply cannot take off their hats. The hats are put on for them at home by maids, and cannot be removed until they have the assistance of a maid. Some of the older women, with close-fitting gowns, cannot reach up to their hairpins."

The management prepared yesterday, by printed appeal slips tucked into the programs, and lettered cards in the lobby, as far as possible. The cards said "Please Remove Your Hats During the Concert," and there was one larger one which read, "Ladies are requested to remove their hats during the concert, to obviate the cause of complaints by subscribers whose view of the stage has been obstructed." The program slips were more elaborate still, they said:

"His honor the mayor has notified the management of Symphony hall that unless the law relating to the wearing of hats by ladies at public entertainments is obeyed at the Symphony rehearsals and concerts he may be forced to revoke the license of Symphony hall.

"This would mean an end of the Boston Symphony concerts.

"It is hoped that the ladies who patronize these concerts will come to the aid of the management in this matter.

"The law will be strictly enforced."

As the audience began to flow in it was noticeable that more than half of the women went to the women's cloakroom, and nearly every one came out again bareheaded and carrying her hat in her hand. By 2:30, the time for beginning, the great audience had hardly a hat in sight. One or two, here and there, were still covered, but most of these took their hats off when the ushers spoke to them.

Six women persisted; a second request from the ushers whittled these down to two, and these two were the center of all gazing during every pause in the music. By the time Herr Gerber had finished his solo one woman had taken her hat off, and the other left the hall.

Mr Mudgett wouldn't say whether he would haev put any woman out if she had persisted in keeping her hat on, but there was a rumor in the corridor that this course had really been determined upon.

[90]

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1910.

"OMAR KHAYYAM" THURSDAY NIGHT

One of the most important musical events of the coming week will be the performance of the first part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam," at Symphony Hall, next Thursday evening, by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Fiedler as conductor. It is expected that this concert, being the first of the three which have been announced, will mark a decided revival of interest in choral music in Boston. Since early in the fall the Cecilia Society has been hard at work preparing the very difficult music, partly under the direction of Malcolm Lang, partly under the direction of Mr. Fiedler, and as the chorus is composed of trained voices which this year have been selected with particular care, some notable results should be achieved.

The soloists will be Margaret Keyes, contralto, George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, barytone. Miss Keyes will sing the part of the beloved, Mr. Harris that of the poet and Mr. Maitland that of the philosopher.

MELBA AS SOLOIST

Mme. Melba will make her only appearance of the season at next week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will sing for her first number the aria, "Dov Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and for her second number the mad scene from "Hamlet." The orchestral part of the program will consist of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Fritz Delius' new English rhapsody, "Brigg Fair," and the "Der Freischuetz" overture by Weber.

FELIX BERBER AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

YOUNG VIOLINIST SCORES UNMISTAKABLE HIT

Earns Right to Be Classed as One of the World's Best Artists—Hats-Off Rule Obeyed.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Adagio and fugue for string orchestra. (First time in Boston.)
Brahms. Concerto for violin. Soloist, Felix Berber.
Debussy. Ronde de Printemps. (First time.)
Strauss. "Death and Transfiguration," tone poem.

The concert began with a novelty. An adagio and fugue by Mozart, heard for the first time in Boston. The composer of this new composition is decidedly different from what we demand a modern composer to be. The rules of ultra-modern composition can be formulated as follows: The composer must first of all be unintelligible: only weak composers can be comprehended. There must be plenty of dissonances left hanging in the air; only a student resolves his dissonances nowadays. There must be a weird and mystical story told by the instrumental music. The composition must be as "Long as a night in Russia, when nights are longest there!" It must employ an orchestra as big as a political convention.

Not one of these demands did this absurd Mr. Mozart fulfil. The adagio was melodic, the fugue clear. The work was short and really ceased when it had no more to say. Each and every progression was according to the laws of harmony. Therefore Mr. Mozart, you must not attempt to thrust yourself among the much more ponderous gentlemen of the present epoch.

The performance was admirable and it gave good opportunities for our string orchestra to prove again that they are the best organization of this kind in the world. The fugue itself, however, is not as beautiful as some of the Bach fugues are, or even as Mozart's double fugue in his requiem. Its skill was too apparent. It had not the art of concealing art.

There are so many excellent solo violinists in our orchestral ranks that it seems almost unnecessary to import any stars to help out our programmes in this direction. But it was very interesting, nevertheless, to listen to the new European artist who comes to us without any preliminary flourish of trumpets, or ecstasies of press agents. Less interesting is the work itself. Brahms' violin concerto is full of technical difficulties, and can be attempted only by great artists. But it has less inspiration than his piano concertos and far less than his symphonies. The formalist cannot find any cause of complaint; everything is as correct as a Sunday school, but there is not a trace of that soulfulness that is in the Bruch G minor violin concerto, or of the masculine force that is in the Beethoven concerto. An exception must be made however, of the finale, which is by all odds the most attractive of the long work. The first two movements have a deadly length.

Mr. Felix Berber came as a surprise. He had not played many measures before one became aware of the fact that he belongs to the world's great artists, that he is one of the elect. His pure and incisive tone, his broad bowing, his surety even in the highest positions, his fiery "martellato," all showed great technique, and the phrasing and ensemble showed something yet higher. The difficult cadenza was given most fluently, and in spite of the fact that it was not good violin weather, his tones had good carrying power.

In the adagio a word of praise may be spoken for the excellent horn playing. The final rondo was given with much dash and verve. A tumult of enthusiasm followed, and it was entirely deserved. Mr. Berber was recalled many times and it was quite evident that the public fully appreciated the high character of his work. He has not yet the power of an Ysaye, but he combines strength and delicacy in a noble manner and is one of the best violinists that we have recently heard.

Now followed Debussy's "Ronde de Printemps," No. 3 of a set of orchestral works which he calls "Images."

Any new work by Debussy is sure to arouse interest in Boston, where there is a small, but devoted, band of Debussyites. The Gallic composer celebrates spring with a very large orchestra and sometimes more boisterously than is his wont. The motto attached to the work justifies this, for it runs:—

"Vive le Mai, bienvenu soit le Mai, Avec son Gonfalon sauvage!"

Some of the progressions are rather bitter for May-time, unless they are intended to portray Spring medicine. If Spring is like that in France, we in Boston will say no more about our east-winds. It was wrong to make the ladies take their hats off in such raw Spring weather. Yes, the ladies took off their hats! With every programme there was handed out this notice:

"His honor, the mayor, has notified the management of Symphony hall that, unless the law relating to the wearing of hats by ladies at public entertainments is obeyed at the Symphony rehearsals and concerts, he may be forced to revoke the license of Symphony hall.

"This would mean an end of the Boston Symphony concerts.

"It is hoped that the ladies who patronize these concerts will come to the aid of the management in this matter.

"THE LAW WILL BE STRICTLY ENFORCED."

We supposed that a regular "Bataille des Dames" would ensue. We thought that every dame would demand at least a ladies' maid to do up her hair after removing the chapeau. We hoped that some of the more defiant would form a hollow square while Mr. Hartshorne vainly charged against it at the head of his ushers; we thought to hear female voices

Oh say can you see in the afternoon light
What so proudly we wore when the [illegible] was beaming,
Hitched on with elastics, and pinned doubly tight,
With ostrich plume waving and bright ribbons streaming.
And the usher's meek prayer,
And the threat of the mayor,
Were not any force, for our hats are still there.
And many a hat in the hall you will find
To hinder the sight of the party behind.

But we were bitterly disappointed. What the ushers have vainly attempted for in these many years, our courageous mayor has accomplished with a stroke of the pen. All the hats in the body of the hall were removed from the heads of their wearers without a protest, a murmur, or an expostulation.

Revenons a notre Debussy! Although the orchestration of the work was strong, there were no trombones or trumpets evident, much variety of tone-color being elicited from the wood-wind. There were some really original and effective points in the orchestration. The introduction of a folk-melody made the work more tangible than it otherwise might have been, and there was some figure treatment that was highly interesting. Nevertheless, we are not yet accustomed to the bitter-sweet of much of the flavor of this work. We would like to hear it again soon, for it is as well worth repeating as some of the long symphonies which we have studied twice in a season. It was superbly played and so was the Strauss work which followed it. "Death and Transfiguration" has not yet had so good an American performance as it received yesterday. A slight slip in the brasses counted for nothing amidst the great power and excellence of the interpretation. The general reviewer, however, is, to the present writer, the most powerful of his purely orchestral works. Its subject gives it a higher "raison d'etre" than the large symphonic poem which circles around the domestic affair and the nursing bottle, and the nursery hearth truer than the conceited "Hit rings much which Richard Strauss celebrates in his "Hero's Life," in the grandeur of Richard Strauss. It brought the concert to a magnificent close.

Mme. Melba will make her only appearance of the season at next week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will sing an aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," and for her second number the mad scene from "Hamlet."

CECILIA-SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The performance of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 1, in more ways than one will be a particularly notable event of this season. Bantock today divides with Elgar the reputation of being the foremost English composer, and this first part of his setting of FitzGerald's version of the Rubaiyat is the most ambitious of his undertakings.

With a choir of skilled singers like that of the Cecilia Society, with the entire force of the Symphony Orchestra, the whole under the personl direction of D. V. Fiedler, Bantock's work will have the most perfect performance imaginable.

In order to give full and free expression to the multi-colored musical fancies which his exuberant imagination suggested, Bantock has found it necessary to make use of an orchestra of unusual proportions and to employ two separate choruses, each of which is again at times sub-divided, as well as a semi-chorus. The strings of the orchestra are grouped in two distinct sections corresponding to the choruses.

The wind instruments called for are more than ordinarily numerous, while the instruments of percussion include a kettle drum, bass drum, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, gong, glockenspiel and harps, and the composer has added a camel bell and an oriental hand drum.

The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; Geo. Harris jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, baritone. Miss Keyes, naturally, will sing the part of the Beloved, Harris that of the Poet and Mr. Maitland that of the Philosopher.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1910.

NEW VIOLINIST IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Felix Berber Plays Brahms Concerto in Dashing Style.

The big figure at yesterday's Symphony concert was a new comer from Geneva, Felix Berber, violinist, who played the Brahms concerto in a dashing style that evoked exuberant applause. Mr. Berber is especially strong on the technical side. His playing of the first and third movements, which bristle with difficulties, was sparkling, if not altogether brilliant, and in the second movement he showed sincere poetical feeling. His tone is clear and true, but dry. All in all, he revealed himself as a very well trained musician, a sympathetic interpreter of Brahms and a master of the instrument which is so popular that it has furnished three of the six soloists heard at the Symphony concerts so far this season—Macmillen, Witek, Berber.

There were two novelties on the program, an adagio and fugue for strings by Mozart, and Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps." The fugue, a stirring composition, was played in the orchestra's most brilliant manner. The Debussy number, as generally happens with Debussy's novelties, left the audience pleased, yet puzzled. Such strange, yet impressive music is not to be thoroughly understood, not to say enjoyed, at a single hearing. The piece deserves an early repetition, like the Rachmaninoff symphony, which was comparatively banal.

The concert ended with a spirited performance of Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." So far as the orchestra itself is concerned, yesterday's concert was the most brilliant of the season. Mr. Fiedler was in his element.

Cecilia and Symphony to Perform This Week

Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" to Be Heard for First Time in Boston—Poet and Composer—Special Features of the Work

The most important musical event of the coming week will be the first performance in Boston by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening in Symphony Hall of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam," which will be heard for the first time in this city. Mr. Fiedler will conduct. The concert should be the signal for a marked revival of interest in choral performances here, for there is every reason to believe that the alliance of the great choral and orchestral organizations will result in the best performances of the kind yet seen in Boston.

Since early in the fall the Cecilia Society has been hard at work preparing the difficult music, partly under the direction of Malcolm Lang and of late Mr. Fiedler, who has taken much interest in the work. The assistance of the entire Symphony Orchestra has been enlisted for this occasion, for the score is one of many complications and justice could hardly be done it by a smaller orchestra.

Bantock is only known in Boston by an inconsiderable fragment, the overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute," which was played at the Symphony concerts of last season. This overture is only part of the music which Bantock wrote after the poem of Dowson, nor does it rank among his most distinctive works, pleasing as it was. "Omar Khayyam" was first heard in America last fall at the Worcester festival, when Dr. Mees conducted. The entire setting is divided in three parts, the first part consisting of the first 54 stanzas and constituting in itself an evening's entertainment.

The Poem

In order to make the poem more amenable to musical treatment by associating the stanzas with definite characters and making them appear as utterances of distinct personages, Bantock has provided "dramatis personae." The Poet, the Beloved, the Philosopher, and at times the chorus, express the different motives of the poem. For adopting this method the composer found justification in certain stanzas which Omar evidently supposed to be spoken by the Poet to his Beloved as they recline by the water's edge. These stanzas concern themselves with the beautiful things of life and love. To the Philosopher has been assigned the reflections on the mystery of man's life, his whither and whence; the chorus finally occupies somewhat the position of the chorus of the old Greek drama, commenting in a general manner upon the utterances of the lovers and the Philosopher. Occasionally, however, this chorus becomes more positive, more particularly in those verses to which the poet has imparted the sense of a moving crowd.

In order to give complete and untrammelled expression to his multifarious musical imaginings Bantock has made use of a modern orchestra of unusual proportions and employed two separate choruses, each of which is again at times divided and sub-divided, as well as a semi-chorus. Thus there is a great variety of tonal effects, leaving aside the orchestral virtuosity of the composer. As for the orchestra, the wind instruments called for are more than ordinarily numerous, while the instruments of percussion include a kettle drum, bass drum, side drum, cymbals, tambourine, gong, glockenspiel, raps, a camel bell and an oriental hand drum.

Of Omar, the poet, the philosopher, the astronomist and tentmaker of the eleventh century, it is hardly necessary to speak at length. Today he is known only as a poet, but in his time his greatest fame rested upon his discoveries in mathematics and kindred sciences. In the year 1074 A. D. his aid was sought in revising the Mohammedan calendar. The immense popularity of FitzGerald's masterly translation of the quatrains, since the first appearance of the volume in 1859, is known to all. The frankness of the Persian, his humanity, his directness in dealing with the problems of life and death, make him a "modern" poet, in the real sense of the word, for many a day to come. He scorns hypocrisy and lays much stress upon simple living. He is genuinely devout, but this does not preclude his enjoyment of all beauty, whatever its form, and his melancholy in treating of the ephemeralness of all earthly things. Yet it has been well said, that whatever the religious or philosophic principles of Omar Khayyam, he has set them forth with such rich yet delicate beauty, with such happy imagery, that the abstract ideas are often lost sight of under the lulling fascination of their poetic dress.

Bantock's American Visit

Mr. Bantock, a very active gentleman, conducted performances here in Boston as conductor of the "Gaiety Girls" Company in 1894-95, when Cissy Fitzgerald, famous for her dances and her wink, was before him. He did not read Omar Khayyam according to FitzGerald until his 30th year. In 1898 a copy of the Rubaiyat was among his wedding presents. Mr. Bantock had already given much evidence of oriental tendencies as a composer. He read through the quatrains, three times running, resolved to set them to music, and quickly memorized the text. He considered his setting, it is said, for seven years. The first part, which will be heard next Thursday, was written early in 1896, orchestrated in six weeks of July and August, and produced at the Birmingham Festival of that year. The second part appeared in 1897, and the third in 1899.

The orchestral score is very rich in effects. The introduction opens with the Muezzin's call to prayer at evening. The orchestra discourses of the poet's sadness—of the poet as he lies half dreaming through the night—the languor, the love, the fatalism of the East. There is intimation, at first vague, of the break of the new day. Suddenly the chorus hails the sun, and the orchestra seems to suggest the vibrant morning light. The people clamor for the opening of the tavern door, and reiterate an important phrase—there are more than a half dozen motives which recur significantly in the score—"You know how little time we have to stay." There is a thundering chorus for stanza nine, "What have we to do with Kaikobad the great?" There is then the setting, as a duet for tenor and soprano, of the lines beginning, "A book of verses underneath the bough." "On the duet," says one of the admirers of Mr. Bantock, "breaks the reckless swing and full-throated vigor of the 'Glories of This World' choruses, most joyously vulgar and commonplace, and thus full of a natural truth which marks one of the supreme touches of genius in this work." After the 13th stanza—

"They say the lion and the lizard keep The courts where Jamshyd gloried and drank deep,"

there is an extraordinary postlude, sombre, introspective.

Second Part

This brings an end to the first part of the first part. The second half commences with the poet's lines beginning, "I sometimes think that never blows so red." There is a gay sing-song with an oriental twist for the verse, "And we, that now make merry in the room—" The philosopher puts a riddle or two, and is accompanied by a motive from a Bach Fugue in D from the "Well-tempered Clavichord." Later on, a picturesque idea is conveyed by orchestral depiction of the march of a caravan across the desert, coming from the far distance, with the verse, "A moment's halt—a moment's taste." A fanfare of the brass announces the approach of the procession. The chorus hums over a rhythmic accompaniment and Turkomani melody, and a camel bell is heard in the orchestra. The singers announce the "momentary halt," and the caravan makes haste, as the Muezzin's prayer, which opened the work is again intoned. The first part ends with a brilliant and defiant chorus anent the "fruitful grape."

The soloists on Thursday evening will be Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris, tenor; Robert Maitland, baritone. The concert will begin at precisely 8 o'clock.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mme. Melba will make her only appearance of the season at next week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will sing for her first number the aria "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and for her second number the mad scene from "Hamlet." Both of these numbers she sang with enormous success two weeks ago in New York.

The orchestral part of the programme will begin with Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in E minor. Then will come one of the important novelties of the season—Fritz Delius' English rhapsody entitled "Brigg Fair." This had its first performance in America a short time ago by the Damrosch orchestra in New York. Delius is one of the leading English composers and his "Paris", which was played last year, made a distinct impression on those who heard it. The final number will be the "Der Freischutz" overture by Weber.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

"Omar Khayyam" to Be Heard Thursday.

Cecilia Society Gives First Presentation Here.

Robert McCormack to Sing at the Opera.

On Thursday night of this week at Symphony hall the Cecilia society, Max Fiedler, conductor, will bring Part 1 of Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" to its first hearing in Boston.

The philosophic character of the text permits slight dramatic characterization. The composer has employed three solo voices, a contralto for the Beloved, a tenor for the Poet and a baritone for the Philosopher. The following singers upon this occasion will take the parts in the order named: Margaret Keyes, George Harris Jr and Robert Maitland.

Miss Keyes is a concert singer of beautiful natural voice, of intelligence and fine musical sense. She sang for the first time in Boston at the performances of Beethoven's ninth symphony last spring. She sang the music of the Beloved at the performance of the "Omar Khayyam" at the Worcester festival last September.

Mr Harris sang at a recital given in Symphony hall last season by Mme Lina Cavalieri at her last appearance in Boston.

This concert by the Cecilia society is the first under the alliance with the Symphony orchestra, with Mr Fiedler as conductor. The new relationship holds obvious advantages for the Cecilia. It guarantees an orchestral accompaniment which will be adequate in preparation and in the size of the string choir, two elements which have obviously and necessarily suffered heretofore.

There are three parts to Bantock's setting of Fitzgerald's version of the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. Newspapers, both daily and musical, have made the statement that the performance of part I at Worcester was the first in America. In the name of New England and Massachusetts this was patriotic, but misleading. The belief was doubtless prompted by a statement in the Worcester program book reading: "The present performance is the only complete one of any part of Omar Khayyam in this country," which for the sake of strictest truth is valid, sound and proper.

The author of the notes in the program book made acknowledgment therein to Mr Bantock for conferences with him about the work in London during the summer.

It is said the first performance took place as long ago as 1906 at Birmingham, Eng. It is curious that the piece should be so long in crossing the water.

As a matter of fact, it was performed two years ago in Brooklyn (April 28, 1908) by the Brooklyn choral society, when under the direction of T. Bath Glasson. The Brooklyn orchestral club played. The soloists were Genevieve Wheat and Messrs James and Schneider.

In reply to a personal inquiry about this performance Mr Glasson wrote that the work (first part) "was practically given in its entirety, save for a few minor cuts."

Acknowledgement is also made to Mr Glasson for the copy of a letter of appreciation which he received from Granville Bantock at the time of his concert, in which the composer wrote as follows: "I wish I could see you in person and thank you for the introduction of my 'Omar Khayyam' in America. I feel certain that the glowing accounts of the performance which are given in the New-York papers are richly deserved by you."

The entire Symphony orchestra will e employed at this concert on Thurs- y evening. The membership of the cilia has been enlarged to 175 voices. e rehearsals have been under the ection of Malcolm Lang.

Mme Melba Symphony Soloist.

Mme Melba will make her only appearances of the season at this week's Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will sing for her first number the aria "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and for her second number the mad scene from "Hamlet."

The orchestral part of the program will begin with Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in E minor. Then will come one of the important novelties of the season, Fritz Delius' English rhapsody, entitled "Brigg Fair." This had its first performance in America a short time ago by the Damrosch orchestra in New York. The final number will be the "Der Freischutz" overture by Weber.

Advertiser 1/1910

FIRST CECILIA-SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

Tonight brings at Symphony Hall the first of the Cecilia-Boston Symphony concerts under Max Fiedler as conductor, when the First Part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Knayyam" will have its first performance in this city. The work is a setting of the first 57 quatrains of FitzGerald's version of the Rubaiyat, in which the composer has taken the liberty of giving various of the stanzas now to the Beloved, now to the Poet, now to the Philosopher and now to the chorus. The entire Cecilia Society of 175 voices will be used and the entire Symphony Orchestra of 200 musicians will also be employed.

The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, baritone.

CECILIA-SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The most important musical event of the coming week in more senses than one will be the performance of the first part of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" at Symphony Hall next Thursday evening, Dec. 1, by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Fiedler, conductor. This concert should present to Boston as nearly a perfect choral and orchestral performance as the city has heard.

The work itself is one of great difficulty not only for the chorus, but for the orchestra, and the assistance of the entire Symphony Orchestra has been enlisted. The score is one of many complications and justice could not be done to it with a smaller orchestra.

Bantock, whose overture "Pierrot of the Minute" attracted favorable comment a year ago at the Symphony concerts, is one of the foremost English composers. His setting of the 101 stanzas of Fitz Gerald's version of the "Rubaiyat" is his most important undertaking. The entire setting is divided into three parts. The first part consists of the first 54 stanzas and this in itself makes an evening's entertainment. This part was performed for the first time at the Birmingham, England, festival in 1906. Part II. had its first performance in at the Cardiff Festival in 1907 and Part III. at the Birmingham Festival in 1909. Part I. had its first appearance in America in Brooklyn, N. Y. The work was performed at the Worcester Festival this last season.

In order to make the poem more amenable to musical treatment by associating the stanzas with definite characters, Mr. Bantock has provided dramatis personae for his work: the Poet, the Beloved and the Philosopher and at times the Chorus. At other times the chorus is employed as in Greek drama: to punctuate the course of the poem with reflections on the sentiments expressed by the other characters. The composer found justification for this in certain stanzas which Omar evidently supposed to be [illegible] by the Poet to his Beloved as they are reclining at the water's edge. These stanzas concern themselves with the beautiful aspects of life and with love. To the Philosopher have been assigned reflections on the mystery of man's life, his Whither and his Whence; to the chorus the more universal thoughts called forth by the utterances of the lovers and the Philosopher. Occasionally, however, the chorus represents active participants in the course of events.

Mr. Bantock found it necessary to make use of an orchestra of unusual proportions and to employ two separate choruses, each of which is again at times subdivided, as well as a semi-chorus. The strings of the orchestra are grouped in two distinct sections corresponding to the two choruses. This has made it possible to produce varied tonal effects with greater ease. The wind instruments are more than ordinarily numerous, while the instruments of percussion include a kettle drum, base drum, side drum, symbals, triangle, tambourine, gong, Glockenspiel and harps, and the composer has added a camel bell and an oriental hand-drum.

The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto, George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, baritone.

MELBA AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mme. Melba will make her only appearances of the season at this week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will sing the aria "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and also the Mad Scene from "Hamlet." Both of these arias she sang with great success two weeks ago in New York.

The orchestral part of the program will begin with Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in E minor. Then will come one of the important novelties of the season—Fritz Delius's "English Rhapsody," entitled "Brigg Fair." This was first performed in America a short time ago by Damrosch's Symphony Orchestra in New York. Delius is one of the leading English composers, and his "Paris," which was played here last year, made a distinct impression. The final number will be the overture to "Der Freischuetz," by Weber.

NOTES.

The first performance of Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyam," Part I, is to be given in Symphony hall tonight by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Max Fiedler as conductor. This is the first of a series of three concerts by them. The Bantock work has been long in preparation and the rehearsals promise a performance of unusual merit. The soloists will be Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris, Jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, baritone.

Miss Corene B. Harmon has returned from European study with Godowsky, Pugno and Gabrilowitsch and opened a studio at Huntington chambers.

John Gutterson's first lecture recital of the season was given before the Marlboro Woman's Club; the subject, Verdi's "Il Trovatore."

MUSIC NOTES.

The Cecilia Society, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, will give the first of its three concerts in Symphny Hall tonight at 8 o'clock, when Granville Bantock's "Omar Khayyan" (Part 1) will be performed for the first time in Boston. The solo singers will be Miss Margaret Keyes (The Beloved), George Harris, Jr. (The Poet), Robert Maitland (The Philosopher). The chorus will number 175 and the orchestra 100. The concert should be one of unusual interest, for Mr. Bantock's work has excited admiration wherever it has been performed.

Mme. Melba will sing "Dove Sono," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Ophelia's mad scene from Thomas's "Hamlet," at the Symphony concerts this week. The orchestral pieces will be Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5; "Brigg Fair," a rhapsody founded on an English folk song by Delius (first time here), and Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz." There will be no Symphony concerts next week.

LESSED
S

THE CAUSE OF THE LONG LINE

n.....
ess.....
e.....

STANDARD UNION,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
NOV 27 1910

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 9. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, by all odds the greatest pianist now in America. He will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D Minor No. 4. This should be more than ordinarily interesting. Hofmann is the greatest of Rubenstein's pupils, and no one plays this concerto so nearly like the master as does this young Pole. The rest of the programme will be announced in due time.

From LIFE
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date NOV 9 1910

The Boston Symphony Concert.

A VARIED and charming program was provided for the initial concert of the thirtieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn on Friday evening of last week and the audience was large enough to give the appearance of taking up the entire seating capacity of the Academy of Music, though a very close inspection might have revealed a few vacant seats here and there. At all events it was a very large audience and if anything testified to the increasing popularity of these delightful instrumental concerts. It was also as enthusiastic as Brooklyn musical audiences, which are by no means remarkable for effusiveness, usually are. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, received a distinctly cordial if dignified reception upon his first reappearance and the soloist, Madame Jeanne Jomelli, was encored with considerable, if not compelling, energy after singing in her clear and expressive soprano with the orchestra Saint-Saëns's "Hymn to Pallas Athene" and Azael's recitative "These Joyous Airs" and the aria, "O Time That Is No More," from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." To the writer, who makes no pretense of being a musical critic, the most appealing number on the program was Sibilius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia," with which it came to a conclusion. It has all the plaintive beauty peculiar to the music of northern peoples and it is not to be wondered at if it is true that it evoked such patriotic enthusiasm in the composer's native land that the Russians prohibited its performance there during a recent recrudescence of political disaffection. Its effect upon an impressionable Finnish nature might easily be conducive to knocking a Slav on the head. The Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," was another modern number, but in vivid contrast, its power of appeal being in its stormy and passionate brilliancy. All the numbers referred to were in the first half of the program, which opened with Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," followed by Brahms's Third Symphony in F major. In the audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. Walter H. Crittenden, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Nichols, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Percy S. Mallett, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Mr. R. Huntington Woodman, Miss Seaman, Mr. John Garrett Underhill, Miss Wingate, Mr. and Mrs. William L. Newton, Mrs. George A. Price, Mr. Frank J. Price, Mrs. John Anderson, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Miss Perkins, Miss Elizabeth Tousey, Mr. E. P. Walker and Mr. George E. Hyatt.

om HERALD
dress New York City.
até NOV 20 1910

Only One Woman Wore a Hat.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Saturday. — Society women who attend the concerts and rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra think Mayor John F. Fitzgerald is real mean because he has ordered that the practice of wearing big hats at those affairs be stopped immediately. But they have to obey the order or be responsible for the symphony management having its license revoked. At the sixth concert of the orchestra to-night in Symphony Hall only one hat was worn during the performance and that was so small that the wearer was not requested to remove it. The Symphony management distributed notices to all women attending the concert to-night appealing to them to help the management out of its dilemma.

Mayor Fitzgerald admits that the complaints against the big hats came from men, but he refuses to make public the names of the complainants.

1884

AMERICAN
New York City.
NOV 27 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, and Saturday afternoon, December 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven Concerto in G major, No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's Concerto in E flat major, No.

lished

[92]

LESSED
S

THE CAUSE OF THE LONG LINE

STANDARD UNION,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
NOV 27 1910

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 9. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, by all odds the greatest pianist now in America. He will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D Minor No. 4. This should be more than ordinarily interesting. Hofmann is the greatest of Rubenstein's pupils, and no one plays this concerto so nearly like the master as does this young Pole. The rest of the programme will be announced in due time.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston Symphony Concert.

A VARIED and charming program was provided for the initial concert of the thirtieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn on Friday evening of last week and the audience was large enough to give the appearance of taking up the entire seating capacity of the Academy of Music, though a very close inspection might have revealed a few vacant seats here and there. At all events it was a very large audience and if anything testified to the increasing popularity of these delightful instrumental concerts. It was also as enthusiastic as Brooklyn musical audiences, which are by no means remarkable for effusiveness, usually are. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, received a distinctly cordial if dignified reception upon his first reappearance and the soloist, Madame Jeanne Jomelli, was encored with considerable, if not compelling, energy after singing in her clear and expressive soprano with the orchestra Saint-Saëns's "Hymn to Pallas Athene" and Azael's recitative "These Joyous Airs" and the aria, "O Time That Is No More," from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." To the writer, who makes no pretense of being a musical critic, the most appealing number on the program was Sibilius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia," with which it came to a conclusion. It has all the plaintive beauty peculiar to the music of northern peoples and it is not to be wondered at if it is true that it evoked such patriotic enthusiasm in the composer's native land that the Russians prohibited its performance there during a recent recrudescence of political disaffection. Its effect upon an impressionable Finnish nature might easily be conducive to knocking a Slav on the head. The Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," was another modern number, but in vivid contrast, its power of appeal being in its stormy and passionate brilliancy. All the numbers referred to were in the first half of the program, which opened with Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," followed by Brahms's Third Symphony in F major. In the audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. Walter H. Crittenden, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Nichols, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Percy S. Mallett, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Mr. R. Huntington Woodman, Miss Seaman, Mr. John Garrett Underhill, Miss Wingate, Mr. and Mrs. William L. Newton, Mrs. George A. Price, Mr. Frank J. Price, Mrs. John Anderson, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Miss Perkins, Miss Elizabeth Tousey, Mr. E. P. Walker and Mr. George E. Hyatt.

om HERALD

dress New York City.

até NOV 20

Only One Woman Wore a Hat.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Saturday. — Society women who attend the concerts and rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra think Mayor John F. Fitzgerald is real mean because he has ordered that the practice of wearing big hats at those affairs be stopped immediately. But they have to obey the order or be responsible for the symphony management having its license revoked. At the sixth concert of the orchestra to-night in Symphony Hall only one hat was worn during the performance and that was so small that the wearer was not requested to remove it. The Symphony management distributed notices to all women attending the concert to-night appealing to them to help the management out of its dilemma.

Mayor Fitzgerald admits that the complaints against the big hats came from men, but he refuses to make public the names of the complainants.

1884

AMERICAN

New York City.

NOV 27 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, and Saturday afternoon, December 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven Concerto in G major, No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's Concerto in E flat major, No. 1

ished

[92]

HERALD

New York City.

NOV 25 1910

MUSIC LOVERS TO HEAR FINE CONCERT

Kneisel String Quartet Announces the Programme To Be Produced in Academy of Music.

Music lovers will be interested to know that the Kneisel String Quartet will give its second concert this season before the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences next Thursday evening in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, with Mr. Arthur Foote, of Boston, as assisting artist.

The programme will consist of the quartet in B minor, by Cherubini; the trio No. 3 in B flat major, for piano, violin and 'cello, by Arthur Foote, and Grieg's G minor quartet. The composition by Cherubini is one of the brightest and freshest of all his chamber music works, in spite of the fact that it was written when Cherubini was in his seventy-fourth year. The appearance of Mr. Arthur Foote as pianist, with Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Willeke in one of Mr. Foote's own compositions is a matter of much interest.

Mr. Foote's trio was first performed in Boston two years ago, with the same members of the Kneisel String Quartet, and shows Mr. Foote as a composer at his best.

The quartet in G minor, by Grieg, is as full of beauty and as deeply emotional as Schubert's D minor quartet with the variations on "Death and the Maiden," or Smetana's autobiographic, "Aus Meinem Leben."

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will be given Friday evening, December 9, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Josef Hofman. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. This should be more than ordinarily interesting. The rest of the programme will be announced later.

TIMES

New York City.

NOV 20 1910

A BIG-HAT ORDINANCE.

The Mayor and Council of Boston have ordered the removal of women's hats at all public meetings. Hitherto theatre managers throughout the country have been obliged to make war on big hats unaided by the law, and they have won the fight, as hats are no longer worn by the women in theatres. But the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra have been noteworthy in Boston for the display of elaborate and monstrous headgear. The excuse of the women is that people go to the concerts to hear and not to see. This is not reasonable, but it suffices for a woman's reason. Of course, everybody wants to see the solo singer, whether it is Miss GERALDINE FARRAR or Mr. DAVID BISPHAM. The musically educated wish to follow Mr. MOCK'S motions, and their enjoyment of the music is increased by the sight of the bows moving in unison over the strings. However, nothing in this is exactly to the point. Big hats in public places are nuisances. They ought to be abolished, not only at plays and concerts, but in churches and lecture halls as well.

The Boston ordinance, however, though perhaps justifiable as a matter of public expediency, is open to question. We are getting too many laws. If we have a law affecting headgear in the theatre, why may we not also have one regulating the cut of bodices, another prohibiting the interruption of performances by ill-timed applause? The theatre managers suppressed the big hat, with the aid of a powerful, untrammeled press, with ridicule, censure, and insistence. The big hat hurt their trade, and they overcame it. It is now a matter of custom for women not to wear hats in the theatre. The custom could be established by the same means at concerts and lectures. Laws of all sorts should be made slowly, gravely, with much deliberation of their effect. Boston's big-hat law seems to us superfluous and ill-considered.

WORLD

New York City.

HATS OFF, LADIES, AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mayor Fitzgerald Threatens to Close a Boston Institution if Women Don't Obey Law.

(Special to The World.)

BOSTON, Nov. 18.—The fashionable, music loving women who attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts must take off their hats in Symphony Hall else Mayor Fitzgerald will silence the orchestra, he threatens. The Mayor insists that the city ordinance forbidding women to wear hats at public performances must be obeyed in Symphony Hall as it is in other places of entertainment. Almost sadly he remarks that he had "expected the class of people who go to symphony concerts would be the first to obey the ordinance."

Mayor Fitzgerald has written a letter to Louis M. Mudgett, assistant manager of the symphony organization, in which he says:

"I have received many complaints. I am informed that the ordinance is printed on the programmes and posted in the hall, yet many, if not most, of the ladies who patronize these concerts ignore the law, to the extreme discomfort of their neighbors.

"I hope you will find some means to abolish the nuisance without resorting to extreme measures. It would be a calamity if it should be found necessary to put an end to these concerts for such a trivial cause. But the law is very clear, and distasteful as it is to me, I may be compelled to enforce it even to the point of revoking the license of Symphony Hall.

"I am confident that the wearing of hats at these concerts is simply the result of thoughtlessness on the part of the ladies, and when the matter is presented to them in a proper light their loyalty to the orchestra and their respect for the law itself will bring about the reform asked for."

There is a Symphony concert to-morrow night; it remains to be seen if the women will take off their hats to, or for, Mayor Fitzgerald.

REVOLT AGAINST HAT RULE CRUSHED

BOSTON, Nov. 19.—While Conductor Hadley to-night led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the mazes of "The Culprit Fay," the management of the institution declared the revolt of Boston's fashionable women against the hats off order had been crushed.

Not a hat was visible at to-night's concert, and the Symphony management declared there had been no necessity to use the little cards informing the women patrons they violated the law by wearing their millinery. Mayor Fitzgerald threatened to revoke the license of the hall if the law was not obeyed.

EVE. POST.

New York City.

NOV 26 1910

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, and Saturday afternoon, December 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-Major No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's Concerto in E-flat Major No. 1.

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 26 1910

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 9. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D-Minor No. 4. This should be more than ordinarily interesting. Hofmann is the greatest of Rubinstein's pupils, and no one plays this concerto so nearly as did the master as does this young Pole. The rest of the programme will be announced in due time.

k, 18

n EVE. MAIL

ess New York City.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist for both of the Boston Symphony concerts to be given December 8 and 10 in Carnegie hall. Thursday evening he will play the Beethoven G major concerto in G major, and Saturday afternoon he will play the Liszt E flat major.

Hofmann will give his third recital in Carnegie hall next Saturday afternoon, when he will play a programme opening with Bach-Tausig and including the sonata op. 3 of Beethoven. There will be a group of Chopin, the Schumann C major fantasie, a group of character sketches of his own and two Rubinstein numbers.

MORN. TELEGRAPH

s New York City.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8 and Saturday afternoon, December 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven Concerto in G major No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's Concerto in E flat major No. 1.

TRIBUNE

ss New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, and Saturday afternoon, December 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in G major, No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1.

PRESS

s New York City.

NOV 27 1910

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, and Saturday afternoon, December 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in G major No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major No. 1.

e First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N.Y.

s

NOV 26 1910

The second Boston symphony concert is to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 9. The soloist, Josef Hofmann, is one of the greatest pianists now in America, probably the greatest. He will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor No. 4. No one plays this concerto so nearly like Rubinstein as does this young player, who was a pupil of Rubinstein's. The rest of the programme will be announced later.

[93]

PRESS

ss New York City.

NOV 27 1910

The famous young violinist Mischa Elman will arrive in New York from Europe during the Christmas holidays to pass a week in filling social engagements before beginning his tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Because of the demand for Elman's services throughout America and Canada, he will play in only one recital in New York, to be given in January.

TIMES

ess New York City.

NOV 27

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 8, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in G major No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major No. 1.

***

SUN

ss New York City.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8 and Saturday afternoon, December 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in G major, No. 4 and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1.

m EVE. GLOBE

dress New York City.

te NOV

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 8, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in G major No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1.

WORLD

New York City

NOV 27 1910

The second of the five Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, will be given Friday evening, Dec. 9, at the Academy of Music. On this occasion Josef Hofmann, the great pianist, will be the soloist.

WORLD

ess New York City

NOV 27 1910

Boston Symphony.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at each of the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening Dec. 8 and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 10. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's Concerto in G Major No. 4 and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's Concerto in E flat Major No. 1.

* * *

n PRESS

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

e

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second Boston Symphony concert in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Beethoven's concerto in G major No. 4. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor No. 2, which had its first performance in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra a little over a year ago.

RECORD — PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa. — Philadelphia, Pa.

ENCORE DENIALS NOT JUSTIFIABLE

Patrons of Boston Symphony Concert Disappointed by Melba's Short Program.

NUISANCE AT CONCERT

Suppression of Annoyances at Musical Events—A Young Composer of Promise.

A situation arose during last Monday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, well worth examination. It is declared to be the theory of the management of that orchestra that encores destroy the unity, and therefore the power of the presentation of an evening's program. Even if this idea has any merit, a uniform observance of the rule of no encores, not only ends in sharp disappointment to the audience, but gives distinctly the impression that the rule is not well founded. There is no musical unity in a program composed of selections from different writers. It goes without saying that the rendition of a symphony would suffer serious impairment of unity, if encores were permissible. But it is difficult to see how encores can disturb the unity of a diverse program, or in any way infringe upon its unity. Applause of every variety is indulged frequently during the rendition of a composition. If anything in the world mars unity or breaks continuity, it is applause. Therefore, it would be just as rational to forbid applause as to prohibit encores. The former is irrepressible. The latter are legitimate and thoroughly justifiable. The demand for encores is a form of approbation, similar in principle to applause. If one is permissible the other should be. Encores are a higher form of approval than applause, because they are a demand for a repetition of the pleasure afforded by the music. If encores and applause are similar in principle, as they plainly are, either both should be entirely abolished, or both permitted. The permission of one and the prohibition of the other leave a decidedly bad impression, almost suggesting snobbishness.

The situation in point was the renewed demand, evidenced in applause, for a song from Madame Melba. Her singing was limited to arias. While they were immensely enjoyed, their severe classicism was quite beyond many in the audience. But every person in the audience hoped that the great singer would gladden their hearts by one of her immortal songs. The demand for encore was ignored. It is manifest that Melba's singing not only interrupted, but entirely suspended the musical unity of the orchestral program. Hence there was no justification, even upon an absurd theory, for the refusal to grant the wish of the audience, emphasized in several minutes of applause, for a song from the distinguished artist. People stood in line, outside the Academy, from 5 o'clock until the box office opened, almost entirely for the purpose of hearing Melba sing one or more of her songs. This form of patronage should not only be encouraged, but it should never be disappointed by a practice so entirely unjustifiable. The treatment of the audience resulted in more than a distinct disappointment; it evoked a good bit of warm and adverse criticism, which, it must be admitted, can not in turn be criticised, but ought to be commended. It is to be hoped that a practice, founded upon no maintainable theory, may in the future, be abandoned, as it has been, in some instances in the past.

* * *

ewspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

ITEM

NOV 9 1910

Peggy Shippen's Society Review

The Return of Melba Awakens Memories. Clubs After New Quarters—Contrasting Marriages.

POLLY DEAR: The first Boston Symphony Concert of the season, on Monday last, brought together such an audience as has rarely been seen since the establishment of the Philadelphia Orchestra cut under the Bostonians. Every seat was taken, and, if applause is any indication, by enthusiastic admirers. Friedl is a great leader, my dear, and has his men under marvelous control—but it was not so much the fine Brahms Symphony No. 3 that drew the vociferous crowd of dilettante, my dear, but Melba. Once more was demonstrated the fallacy of Shakespeare's celebrated query: "What's in a name?" Why, to Melba today her name is everything. It means what her voice has been, i. e., not only big money, but mad applause, crowded houses, triumphs, and, which is more, perhaps, the illusion that she is still the leading diva of the lyric stage. For all those things, alas, those who were present on Monday night could not help realizing, are fast becoming things of the past, now embodied in the symbol of her name and in her personality.

* * *

The magic voice that charmed us long ago,
And e'en the critic lulled to gentle mood,
May not be all it was, but yet we know,
We hear it now with more than gratitude.

* * *

As a fact, her voice has lost that downy, mellow roundness of the perfect instrument that her name evokes in the memory of the trained "opera goer." The organ betrays the wind that passes through the lungs. The velvety notes are a little frayed. Of course, the splendid technique of the great coloratura prima donna remains, but even in this respect time is revealing in undesirable plainness certain defects which her brilliant vocal quality once forced into insignificance. Her trills are still of the purest quality, but in the long runs of the mad scene of Ophelia the unevenness of the transition from her upper to her lower register was displayed; and after the last supreme effort of the difficult score she actually gasped, Polly. No, it was no longer the smiling, playful cantatrice, who toys on the high Cs, with liquid, sparklingly crystalline notes, as did the Melba of ten years ago; but it was the artist "quand meme," who can still manage to sing her repertoire, bravely facing the end—and unafraid of destroying the impression created by her superlative excellence in her splendid halcyon days.

From EVE. TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
Address
Date

The second Boston Symphony concert in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Joseph Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major No. 4. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor No. 2, which had its first performance in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra a little over a year ago.

ewspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

EVE. BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 9 1910

NO HATS AT SYMPHONY HALL

Boston, Nov. 19.—Women who attend the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall in the future must remove their hats in accordance with the regulation, or the license may be revoked. Such in brief was the notice sent to Louis H. Mudgett, manager of Symphony Hall, by Mayor Fitzgerald to-day.

The Mayor in his communication calls attention to the number of complaints received by the Mayor's office in relation to the persistent violation of the hat regulation, a violation which increases rather than diminishes as time rolls on.

The Mayor says that he does not wish to embarrass the orchestra and so hopes that the management may find some means to abolish the nuisance without resorting to extreme measure.

1884

ess

NOV 18 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert is to be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 5, with Josef Hofmann as soloist. Mr. Hofmann will play Beethoven's Concerto in C-major, No. 4, for piano and orchestra, and Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E-minor, No. 2, which was performed for the first time in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra about a year ago.

ewspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

novelty of the season for the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. This will be Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E-Minor No. 2, a work which was received with such extraordinary favor in Boston that three weeks after its first performance it was repeated with greater success. It is one of the most notable contributions to modern symphony music. The other orchestral number will be Brahm's Academic Festival overture, and Josef Hofmann, the great pianist who will be the soloist, will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-major.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

ess

Hofmann for Symphony.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 7. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, by all odds the greatest pianist in America at the present time. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in C major, No. 4.

s

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 7. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, by all odds the greatest pianist in America at the present time. He will play Beethoven's concerto in G major No. 4.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess

SECOND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann To Be Soloist, Playing A Beethoven Concerto.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, December 7. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major No. 4.

s

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra takes great pleasure in announcing that famous organization will give a concert in Woolsey hall on Monday evening, December 12. It is six years since the orchestra last visited New Haven, and that concert was one of the most successful this city has ever known. Paderewski was the soloist and Woolsey hall was filled to its utmost capacity. At the coming concert the soloist will be another pianist almost as famous as Paderewski himself. This will be Josef Hofmann who is playing in December 10 concert engagements with the Boston Symphony. Hofmann will play the Rubinstein Concerto in D-Minor and the Symphony will be Beethoven's in C-Minor.

rom

ddress

ate NOV 12 1910

ber 19, at Foot Guard Hall.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Parsons Theater will be filled to capacity Monday night when the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra appears for the first of its series of concerts. It is important that patrons be seated before 8:15 o'clock. The event will doubtless be accounted one of the most brilliant society and musical affairs of the season. A few seats are obtainable at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

[94]

m

lress

BALTIMORE, MD.

NOV 13 1910

AN ARTIST'S IMPRESSIONS

Of Mme. Melba and Rachmaninoff of Boston Symphony.

Mrs. Berenice F. H. Roney, who is a musician of note and a student at the Peabody, in a letter to The American gives her impressions of Rachmaninoff, and Madame Melba, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was here last week. Mrs. Roney says:

It seems so good to have the symphony season again after the gayety and froth of the summer season, and Mr. Feidler was more enthusiastic in his readings than ever before. Of course, Madame Melba, the soloist, was sufficient to enthuse anyone, even the Herr Conductor. In her first number, however, she seemed to lack that "I-don't-know-what," as the French have the expressive idiom. It seemed that she was entirely out of sympathy with the number and portrayed so sharply the only criticism that was ever given her—that of such coldness, absolute lack of warmth and color in her voice. But in the mad scene from "Hamlet" she found and restored herself. In the first place, the aria is a great favorite with the diva, and she sang it with more warmth and color than she ever displayed here before.

But to go on to Rachmaninoff—the very "heart of the symphony," as it were. I sometimes think of the composers of the different periods as men and women of the past and present. I think of the beings who existed in the antebellum days as compared with those of the present generation. Those people were naive, frank and honest, sometimes even blunt. Of course, that is not faithfully recorded. But the modern musicians have caught the modern spirit of restlessness, vague portrayal of thought and emotion which the moderns consider subtle and clever, and this is why I like Rachmaninoff and Russian moderns as opposed to the new French schools and Strauss, just as it is refreshing to meet the person who is not so subtle and vague, because frankness today is a very diplomatic weapon.

It is refreshing to recognize the pure, frank style of this great composer, and yet, like Tschaikowsky, he has that plaintive, sometimes melancholy, imagination which exists in the true Russian heart of the moment and which gives enough variety to the work to be interesting. The third movement—the adagio one—was particularly an epic of the Russian situation, while the others were on more cosmopolitan lines. I predict even greater things for Rachmaninoff.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

JOSEF HOFMANN TO PLAY

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 7. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the greatest pianist in America at the present time. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G Major No. 4.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

e NOV 26

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The announcement that the Boston Symphony orchestra in its entire strength of one hundred men, with Josef Hofmann, the celebrated pianist as soloist, is to give a concert in Woolsey hall on Monday evening, Dec. 12th, has excited a great deal of favorable comment here. There was a time not so many years ago when the orchestra was a regular visitor in New Haven, but of recent years it has seemed to skip this city. As a matter of fact its last concert was given here on March 20th, 1905. Many changes have come in the orchestra since that time. Mr. Gericke, who was then the conductor, has been in retirement for four years, and the orchestra now is under the efficient direction of Max Fiedler, who is now in his third year as conductor. Mr. Fiedler is becoming famous for his programs and he has provided one of exceptional interest for New Haven. It comprises Weber's "Oberon" 'overture, Beethoven's C-Minor Symphony, Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" and Sibelius' tone poem "Finlandia," while Mr. Hofmann will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D-Minor.

The tickets will go on sale at the box office of Woolsey hall on Thursday, Dec. 8th. In the meantime, mail orders may be addressed to the Boston Symphony orchestra, 126 College street, with check made payable to C. A. Ellis. The scale of prices will be $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00. On the night of the concert the gallery will be sold unreserved for 25 cents each.

m JOURNAL

ress

NOV 22 1910

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening at 8:15 o'clock in Infantry Hall. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, pianist.

1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 3 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TUESDAY

Josef Hofmann, who is to be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, on next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall, will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major. It is difficult to see how anybody who is in the least interested in the piano and the literature of the piano can afford to miss an opportunity to hear this very great artist play this concerto, which is one of the greatest in the whole literature of the piano. To be sure, in recent years it has been rather overshadowed by the frequency with which pianists have played the concerto in E flat, but that is merely a matter of fashion, and fashion rules in music as it does in everything else. There are many who believe that this is the greatest of the five concertos Beethoven wrote for the piano.

Hoffmann is by all odds the greatest pianist now in America. All the promise he held out as a "child wonder" 20 odd years ago he has more than fulfilled. No pianist who has been in America in recent years has received such enthusiastic and laudatory notices as he. His technique is said to be flawless and his musical and temperamental qualities are highly developed. He is a pianist who has never resorted to false methods for the sake of publicity, and his quiet, unassuming personality wins friends for him wherever he goes. His appearance with the orchestra here is one of the very important events of the season.

Mr. Fiedler has elected to give Providence at this second concert the great Rachmaninoff Symphony, which has been nothing short of a tremendous sensation in Boston. He put it on two programs within four weeks, and the enthusiasm it created at the second concert was even greater than that which had distinguished it at the first. Rachmaninoff is the greatest of living Russian composers ,and may be considered the true artistic descendant of the great Tschaikowsky. In fact, he openly admits that Tschaikowsky is his ideal, and it is not difficult to see in this symphony what a profound influence Russia's greatest composer has had on this young man. It is intensely modern in spirit, although not in manner, for he follows the traditional symphonic poem, and avoids the acrid dissonances of which the Strauss school is so fond.

The final number will be Brahms' Academic Festival overture, the one in which the composer has made use of familiar German student songs. He wrote it in 1880 as an expression of thanks to the University of Breslau for having bestowed upon him the degree of doctor of philosophy. The program in full is as follows:

Rachmaninoff. Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.
I. Largo, Allegro Moderato.
II. Allegro Molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro Vivace
Beethoven. Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G major, Op. 58.
Allegro Moderato.
Andante Con Moto.
Rondo (Vivace, Presto).
Brahms. Academic Festival overture, Op. 80.
Soloist—Josef Hofmann.

om
ddress
ate

BIG SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS TO PLAY HERE

k, 18

The first apeparance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New Haven since the season of 1904-05 is scheduled for Monday evening, December 12, in Woolsey hall. The greatest of all orchestras is bringing with it as soloist Josef Hofmann, who is by all odds the greatest pianist now in America and one of the very few really great pianists in the world. Hofmann will have played eight concerts with the Boston Symphony by the time it comes to New Haven and will still have some engagements to fill with that organization.

With the Symphony will come Max Fiedler, conductor, who will be a stranger to New Haven and he has arranged an exceedingly interesting program. Its orchestral numbers will comprise the "Oberon" overture of Weber, Beethoven's Fifty Symphony, Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Sibelius' "Finlandia." Hofmann will play the Rubenstein Concerto in D minor.

The sale of seats will open at the box office of Woolsey hall on Thursday, December 8.

WORLD
New York City.
NOV 2 1910

BIG HATTED WOMAN PUT OUT OF SYMPHONY HALL.

Escorted to Door of Famous Concert House, Boston, and Ejected in Midst of Rainstorm.

(Special to The World.)

BOSTON, Nov. 26.—In spite of the edict of Mayor John F. Fitzgerald that patrons of the Symphony concerts must remove their headgear, a dozen women wore their hats through most of this afternoon's programme. One woman who refused to remove her hat was escorted out of the hall into Huntington avenue in the rain

One woman who wore a particularly big hat that was not easy to remove obtained the permission of Manager Ellis to stand at the back of the hall throughout the concert, giving up her reserved seat in row A. A dozen elderly women wore close-fitting bonnets. Twelve women wore large hats during the first half of the concert. All were asked to remove them; six refused. A second request narrowed the offenders to two. Finally one of these took off hers and the other was asked to go.

COURANT.
HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 1 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the series of three by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Parsons Theater Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock sharp. The complete program follows:—

"Symphony in B minor, No. 6," "Pathetic," Op. 74.....Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale; Adagio lamentoso.
Aria—"Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio," Beethoven
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner,—in Rondo Form," Op. 28.....R. Strauss
Aria from "Tannhauser," "Dich theure Halle, gruess' ich wieder".....Wagner
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7.....Sibelius
Soloist—Madame Berta Morena.

Seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

Mr. Winer.

MAY SECURE SINGLE TICKETS.

Music Students Get Reduced Rates at Boston Symphony Concert.

The Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, announces that single tickets to any of the remaining concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be sold to music students vouched for by the federation for $1 each, provided at least 100 students present applications.

Music teachers are requested to send the names of pupils who will take advantage of this reduction of price to Mrs. John R. Hess, 21 Oriole avenue, Providence, the chairman of the committee, before Saturday, Nov. 20. If a sufficient number of names is received an alphabetically arranged list will be placed at Steinert's on the day of the sale and the students whose names are enrolled will be able to buy the regular $1.50 seats for $1 each.

The active members of clubs devoted to the study of music and those enrolled in the extension course of Prof. MacDougall at Brown University are considered as students.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With Josef Hofmann, the famous pianist, as the soloist, the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, in Providence, which will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 22nd, should be fully as interesting as the memorable opening concert. Hofmann is today the greatest pianist now in America, and he is one of the few very great pianists in the world. His success in New York this year has been enormous and Symphony hall in Boston yesterday (Monday) afternoon, when he gave his first recital there, contained the most enthusiastic audience it has held in many a day. With the Symphony orchestra he will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-major, which is one of the greatest works in the literature of the piano. The sale of seats for the concert will as usual open at Steinert's, on next Saturday morning, Nov. 19th.

Morning Tribune
Providence, R.I.
Nov 23 1910

BRILLIANT CONCERT BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Josef Hofmann Asisted in Programme That Awoke Enthusiasm in Notable Audience.

Another large and highly appreciative audience gathered in Infantry Hall last night for the second of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization of wide reputation and solid merit is receiving an endorsement this year from the music-loving people of Providence that is as well deserved as it is complimentary to the good judgment and good taste of those who make up the audiences. It is a gathering before which any musical body might well be pleased to play, being composed of all classes of people, those who understand and appreciate to the full the fine work of the orchestra, those who cannot enjoy it to the full, but are finding in these concerts a means of cultivation of the musical taste, those who move in social circles and those who loom large in the business and professional world. And there is no lack of evidence of appreciation of the opportunity to listen to such a high-class of music as is rendered in so capable a manner by this aggregation of musicians. Providence audiences may be cold at times, but there is nothing even chilly about the reception that is being accorded this orchestra this season.

The programme last evening was one of the best that has been heard in this city for a long time, and not a few of those who enjoyed it were overheard to say in passing out of the hall that it was the best ever given here. It opened with the Rachmaninoff Symphony and closed with Brahm's Academic Festival overture, and between these two selections by the orchestra was set Beethoven's concerto in G-minor, played by Josef Hofmann, the widely celebrated pianist. These three numbers filled the evening and constituted an offering that it would be difficult to surpass:

The programme in detail follows:

Symphony in E-minor, No. 2, Op. 27, Rachmaninoff
I. Largo—Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro moto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58.....Beethoven
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Rondo: Vivace.
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80, Brahms

This symphony took Boston by storm when it was first presented and indeed was so favorably received that it was repeated within a few weeks and awakened as much enthusiasm at its second rendition as at its initial presentation. The audience here was therefore prepared for something of more than ordinary excellence and it was not disappointed, for the music was a character to inspire the hearers. The selection is one of more than ordinary length, occupying more than an hour in its rendition, but it is of such excellence that it did not become tiresome in the least. It is a great production and it was rendered in a style that made a deep impression upon the audience. Those who are familiar with Tschaikowsky's work noticed evidences of the effect of that author's style upon this composer, but these are so slight in comparison with the original work embodied in the symphony that they did not detract in any degree from the reputation of the composer, who has an assured place among modern music writers and gives prohecy of an enviable future. The symphony theme runs through it like a thread of gold cropping out at frequent intervals. The technique is almost faultless and the quality of the tone hardly to be surpassed, while the finale is of a nature to awaken the highest enthusiasm and bring a storm of applause.

Mr. Hoffman is no stranger to Providence, having been heard here from time to time ever since he began his career as a pianist as a mere boy, and he is always warmly welcomed by the host of those who esteem him as one of the best pianists of the day. It was evident last night that he is still growing in his art and increasing his skill. He showed a rapidity of execution and a finished form of instrumentation that are rarely seen in the work of any pianist and he won several calls before the audience would allow him to leave the stage.

The second selection by the orchestra was of a livelier nature than the symphony and was executed with a grace and delicacy that were most enjoyable. It formed a delightful contrast to the more solid style of the symphony and made a very pleasing conclusion to the programme.

The work of the orchestra under the conductor, Mr. Fiedler, was of the same high degree of excellence that marks all its efforts and left nothing to be desired by any lover of the best in music. It is making new friends and strengthening its hold on all its old ones at every concert.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Conductor Max Fieldler promises the first important novelty of the season for the second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in Infantry hall on next Tuesday evening, Nov. 22nd. This will be Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E-minor, No. 2, a work which was received with such extraordinary favor in Boston that three weeeks after its first performance, it was repeated again with even greater success than it had in the beginning. It is one of the most notable contributions to modern symphonic music. The other orchestral number will be Brahm's Academic Festival overture and Josef Hofmann, the great pianist, who will be the soloist, will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-major.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
PROVIDENCE, R.I.
NOV 20 1910

Musical Notes

1884

THE second Boston Symphony concert Tuesday evening will bring as the soloist Josef Hofmann, while the symphony will be Rachmaninoff's in E-minor. The interesting announcement is made by the management that the subscription sale this year is the largest in the history of the local symphony concert series, and that the first concert broke all records in receipts. The programme for Tuesday is as follows:

Rachmaninoff, Symphony in E-minor No. 2, op. 27 (1, largo, allegro moderato 2, allegro molto; 3, adagio; 4, allegro vivace), Beethoven, Concerto for piano No. 4, in G-major, op. 58 (allegro moderato, andante con moto; rondo, vivace presto); Brahms, "Academic Festival Overture," op. 80.

Mr. Hofmann is recognized as among the greatest pianists of the world and undoubtedly the greatest now playing in this country. He shines in conspicuous contrast to some others of his profession by the absence of theatric eccentricities in manner and appearance while his technique and temperamental command of musical interpretation have won the unreserved approval of the critics. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-minor which, though often played a few years ago, has less commonly been heard of late, having for some reason been replaced in many programmes by the Concerto in E-flat.

JOSEF HOFMANN.

Much is expected from the performance of Rachmaninoff's Symphony. He is not a "modern" in the sense of one who revels in bizarre dissonances and goes far in the search for weird tone effects. He is a close follower of Tschaikowsky, writing conservatively and yet with ample command of the beauties of orchestral melody.

The last number of the programme will be Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture." This, as is well known, was written by Brahms in 1880, as an expression of his thanks to the University of Breslau for having given him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. In it he incorporates some of the best-known German student songs. It has not been heard here in a number of years.

Boston Symphony Orchestra This Evening.

The concert at the Parsons Theater this evening will commence promptly at 8:15 o'clock. That the performance of the beautiful Tschaikowsky Symphony may not be marred by late comers the management particularly requests that the audience be in their seats at the above named hour. Gallery admission tickets can be obtained at the door. Subscribers who have not already done so, should call at John M. Gallup & Co.'s store for reserved seat tickets as early in the day as possible.

om
dress
te

JOSEF HOFMAN TO PLAY HERE.

Pianist to be Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night.

Josef Hofman, known as one of the most accomplished pianists in the world, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 22. He received enthusiastic comment in New York last Saturday morning on the work done at his recital in Carnegie Hall on the preceding afternoon.

Hofman may be said to have more than justified the promise of his boyhood. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-major, No. 4, next Tuesday night. The rest of the programme will be arranged within a few days. Tickets may be secured at Steinert's next Saturday morning and after.

[95]

m ..... REGISTER
ress .....
e ..... JAN 22 1910

FIRST CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY.

THE FAMOUS ORCHESTRA MAKES ITS BO—

Brilliant Playing Charms Great Audience.

MADAME MORENA SHOWS RICH SOPRANO.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season at the Parsons Theater last evening, playing before a brilliant audience that completely filled the house. There was unusual enthusiasm displayed and Mr. Fiedler was twice obliged to call on his men to rise and share the applause with him. Of course Mr. Fiedler himself was very warmly greeted and the soloist, Madame Berta Morena, made her first Hartford appearance in a highly successful manner.

The always lovely "Pathetic" symphony by Tschiakowsky had the place of honor on the program and it was played with splendid effect. All the wealth of its melodies was shown, the graceful oddities of tempo seemed more pleasing than ever, the chaotic and beautiful third movement was played at great speed and with splendid clearness and the wonderfully rich finale came, as it always does when the symphony has adequate performance, with a truly tremendous effect. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the work is full of feeling but it never descends to sentimentality; the dramatic values are given, the tonal beauties of the work are made fully apparent, the sentiment is there—but it is sentiment shown in strength and virility.

Madame Morena sang two famous arias, the one from Beethoven's "Fidelio," the other from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser." In each her rich voice was admirably shown and her splendid presence was as much a delight to the eye as was her voice to the ear. The singer is a dramatic soprano—and that means a voice of great range, of power, and, in Madame Morena's case, of much sweetness. Both arias were splendidly phrased and broadly sung and there was much applause accorded the singer. To those who heard her sing last evening it may be of interest to know that Madame Morena is announced as the Elizabeth in "Tannhaeser" at the Metropolitan tomorrow evening and is scheduled to sing on Friday in "Die Walkuere." That would seem to round out a pretty fair week's work for any singer.

When Richard Strauss composed his "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" he showed his great skill in doing strange things musically. The work presents the oddest compound of sounds imaginable; sweet melodies follow passages of the strangest tone-combinations; a climax that is simply tremendous in effect has many measures in which (if one didn't know the orchestra) there might well be the feeling that "someone had binndered." The playing was full of power, of light and shade, and every inflection that it seemed Mr. Fiedler's idea to produce was given perfectly in the voice of the orchestra. "Till Eulenspiegel" is a thing to wonder at, however it is played; it is to be thoroughly enjoyed when it is played as it was last evening. When it was over it was necessary for the players to share the applause with their leader.

"Finlandia," symphonic poem by Jean Sibelius, was the final number on the program and it proved most interesting in its brilliance and breadth and in the splendid melodic fineness of what seemed really a chorale developed into the conclusion of the work. The playing here was of superb quality, the balance of tone was perfect. The finale came all too soon for the audience and conductor and orchestra were given the unusual compliment of long-continued applause after the concert was all over. And for the second time during the evening the players were called on to acknowledge the appreciation that was shown their work.

It is good to hear the Boston Symphony players again. They may not always play programs that are ideal to every music lover in the audience but the playing has always wonderful richness, fineness of quality, depth of effectiveness; and it is always authoritative. A rendition of a symphony by the orchestra means that a splendid talent for leadership has been exercised over a body of splendid musicians whose every technical ability is put to the task of interpreting the work. Great music, as played by such organizations, becomes something more than entertaining, something higher than educational, even; it brings an uplift in its perfection to every person who listens to it. And that is why an organization of the quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the great things of the earth.

m .....
ress .....
e .....

LADIES THERE AND HERE.

The Springfield Republican has been observing the troubles the managers of the Boston Symphony concerts have in persuading the ladies who attend the concerts to remove their hats, and makes some observations on them. Boston has an ordinance requiring ladies to remove their hats in public gatherings. Mayor Fitzgerald, bound that the ordinance shall be obeyed, has ruled that every manager of a public entertainment who does not at least make a strenuous effort to have the law obeyed shall lose his license. Accordingly, the management of the symphony posted this notice:

Ladies wearing hats in Symphony hall during a concert are violating the law.

Will you kindly remove your hat?

You will thereby oblige those seated behind you and aid in observing the law.

"Nevertheless," the Republican observes, "only two or three complied with this courteous request." It admits that many urge the defense that truly cultured people go to symphony concerts to hear, not to see, but guesses that they also go to show off their millinery. It sees in their attitude toward the law the same reasoning that many women employ toward smuggling, and wonders whether women will have any more respect for laws when they help to make them.

The management of the New Haven symphony concerts prints in the program: "Ladies are asked to remove their hats"—just that and no more. At the first concert this season probably 99 per cent. complied with this request, and it is a reasonable assumption that many of those who did not failed to see the notice. In any case, it is fair to draw the conclusion that New Haven, without the assistance of any law, is better off than Boston with the law, and to add that the comparison at least reflects no discredit on the ladies of New Haven.

n .....
ress .....

SOCIETY

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra takes great pleasure in announcing that famous organization will give a concert in Woolsey hall on Monday evening, December 12. It is six years since the orchestra last visited New Haven, and that concert was one of the most successful this city has ever known. Paderewski was the soloist and Woolsey hall was filled to its utmost capacity. At the coming concert the soloist will be another pianist almost as famous as Paderewski himself. This will be Josef Hofmann who is playing in December 10 concert engagements with the Boston Symphony. Hofmann will play the Rubinstein Concerto in D-Minor and the Symphony will be Beethoven's in C-Minor.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

PROVIDENCE R. I.
NOV 13 1910

Boston is looking forward to more choral music than usual, as a result of the alliance of the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra. Chorus singing was once an important feature of musical life in the Hub, but of late years it has dwindled notably in importance. Interest in it is expected to revive as a result of the new alliance, by which three concerts will be given this winter, Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" having been selected for the first. This work had its first performance in America at the last Worcester Festival, where it was more than favorably received and it is scheduled for full performance by a number of choral societies throughout the country. As it has a most elaborate orchestral dress the ability to use the whole of the Symphony Orchestra should enable it to have an extraordinary performance. The soloists engaged for this are Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; George Harris, jr., tenor, and Robert Maitland, basso.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 20 1910

...had a soft spot in my heart for Rhode Island ever since."

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Second Concert Tuesday.

Josef Hofmann, who is to be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert Tuesday night in Infantry Hall, will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-major. It is difficult to see how anybody interested in the piano and the literature of the piano can afford to miss an opportunity to hear this great artist play this concerto, which is one of the greatest in the whole literature of the piano. To be sure, in recent years it has been rather overshadowed by the frequency with which pianists have played the concerto in E-flat, but that is merely a matter of fashion, and fashion rules in music as it does in everything else. There are many who believe this is the greatest of the five concertos Beethoven wrote for the piano.

Hofmann is by all odds the greatest pianist now in America. All the promise he held out as a "child wonder" twenty-odd years ago he has more than fulfilled. No pianist who has been in America in recent years has received such enthusiastic and laudatory notices as he. His technique is said to be flawless and his musical and temperamental qualities are highly developed. He is a pianist who has never resorted to false methods for the sake of publicity, and his quiet, unassuming personality wins friends for him wherever he goes. His appearance with the orchestra here is one of the most important events of the season.

Mr. Fiedler has elected to give Providence at this second concert the Rachmaninoff Symphony, which has been nothing short of a sensation in Boston. He put it on two programmes within four weeks and the enthusiasm it created at the second concert was even greater than that which had distinguished it at the first. Rachmaninoff is the greatest of living Russian composers and may be considered the true artistic descendant of the great Tschaikowsky. In fact, he openly admits that Tschaikowsky is his ideal and it is not difficult to see in this symphony what a profound influence Russia's greatest composer has had on this young man. It is intensely modern in spirit, although not in manner, for he follows the traditional symphonic poem and avoids the acrid dissonances of which the Strauss school is so fond.

The final number will be Brahm's Academic Festival overture, the one in which the composer has made use of familiar German student songs. He wrote it in 1880 as an expression of thanks to the University of Breslau for having bestowed upon him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. The programme in full is as follows:

Rachmaninoff—Symphony in E-minor, No. 2, Op. 27
I. Largo-Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivace.

Beethoven—Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G-major, Opus 58.
Allegro moderato.
Andante con moto.
Rondo (Vivace: Presto).

Brahms—Academic Festival overture, Op. 80.

Soloist—Josef Hofmann.

Tomorrow evening, November 14th, the Bostoon Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, with Anton Witek, who succeeds Willy Hess as concertmeister, gives its first concert of the season. The program as usual, is a notable one, including the Symphony in B minor, No. 6, by Tschaikowsky, which is scored for three flutes, the third of which is interchangeable with piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, one base tuba, a set of three kettle drums, gongs and strings; the great scene for soprano from Beethoven's "Fidelio"; the Rondo opus 28, by Richard Strauss, which is scored for one piccolo, three flutes, three oboes, one English horn, one small clarinet, in D, two clarinets, one bass clarient, three bassoons, one double bassoon, four horns, with the addition of four horns ad lib, three trumpets, with three additional trumpet ad lib, three trombones, one base tuba, kettledrum, snare drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, a watchman's rattle and strings; the great scene and aria from Wagner's "Tannhausser"— "Dich, teure Halle, guess' ich wieder"; and the symphonic poem for orchestra opus 26 entitled "Finlandia" by Sibelius.

The latter number and the Strauss Rondo have never been heard here before and are naturally anticipated with eager curiosity. Mme. Berta Morena, dramatic soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera house, will be the soloist. She is a great artist, and the possessor of a glorious voice, bith of which facts will doubtless secure for her a great triumph here.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau ...
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 20 1910

HATS OFF, LADIES, AT BOSTON'S SYMPHONIES

City Ordinance Must be Obeyed, Fitzgerald Says.

COMPLIANCE IS DEMANDED

Mayor Threatens to Revoke License if Fair Sex Refuses to Yield.—Many Complaints Received, He Says in Letter to Assistant Manager of Organization.

Boston, Nov. 19.—The fashionable, music loving women who attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts must take off their hats in Symphony Hall, else Mayor Fitzgerald will silence the orchestra, he threatens. The Mayor insists that the city ordinance forbidding women to wear hats at public performances must be obeyed in Symphony Hall as it is in other places of entertainment. Almost sadly he remarks that he had "expected the class of people who go to symphony concerts would be the first to obey the ordinance."

Mayor Fitzgerald has written a letter to Louis M. Mudgett, assistant manager of the symphony organization, in which he says:

"I have received many complaints. I am informed that the ordinance is printed on the programmes and posted in the hall, yet many, if not most, of the ladies who patronize these concerts ignore the law, to the extreme discomfort of their neighbors.

"I hope you will find some means to abolish the nuisance without resorting to extreme measures. It would be a calamity if it should be found necessary to put an end to these concerts for such a trivial cause. But the law is very clear, and distasteful as it is to me, I may be compelled to enforce it even to the point of revoking the license of Symphony Hall.

"I am confident that the wearing of hats at these concerts is simply the result of thoughtlessness on the part of the ladies, and when the matter is presented to them in a proper light their loyalty to the orchestra and their respect for the law itself will bring about the reform asked for."

There is a Symphony concert to-night: it remains to be seen if the women will take off their hats to, or for, Mayor Fitzgerald.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ess .....

Local Society

Symphony Concert.

A very large and brilliant audience assembled in Infantry Hall last night for the second Symphony concert of the season. In the gathering were Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. William W. Weeden, Col. H. Martin Brown, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Miss Helen Ostby, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Carpenter, Mrs. James A. Coggesha[illegible]s Corliss, Mr. A. Duncan Chapin [illegible]frs. Gertrude Child Barrows, [illegible]nd Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Mrs. [illegible]e Gilbreth Cross, Mr. and Mrs. S[illegible] Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. James A. Kinghorn, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. Frederick A. Chase, Miss Helen Chase, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Dr. John H. Peters, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Judge and Mrs. William H. Sweetland, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Herreshoff, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Rev. and Mrs. Richard R. Graham, Mr. and Mrs. G. M. Congdon, Col. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mrs. Olney Arnold, Miss Linda Arnold, Miss Ethel Shipman, Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Roth, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Huntoon, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Prof. John H. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian M. Copeland, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Upham Pope, Mrs. S. V. Cushing, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Dr. and Mrs. Jewett, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mr. George Parker Winship, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Mr. Fred Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mrs. D. H. Wellman, Miss Slocum, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Davis, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mr. and Mrs. Gene Ware, Mr. and Mrs. Hans Schneider, Miss Helen Tyler Grant, Miss Edith Gyllenberg, Miss Dorothy Seymour, Miss Ethel Riley.

84

[96]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
From Herald Providence, R.I.
Address
Date Nov 23/10

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Crowded House Marks Second Appearance of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Infantry Hall last night, was marked by a crowded house and much enthusiasm over the splendid performance by the orchestra and Mr. Josef Hofmann, soloist. While the programme was of rather unusual length, the first number alone consuming more than an hour, the attention and interest of the large audience did not flag. The order of the music was as follows:

Symphony in E-minor, No. 2, Op. 27. Rachmaninoff
I. Largo—Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Rondo: Vivace.
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80..... Brahms

The symphony in E-minor by Rachmaninoff is a gorgeous piece of tone painting, enough in itself to make the reputation of a composer. This young man has already won a distinctive place for himself and is justly regarded as the foremost composer of what may be called the new Russian school. He has ideas and a remarkably sure grasp of the technic of instrumentation. Also, it may be said, a tendency to prolixity, as witness the astounding length of the first movement of this symphony. Again and again it seems to be approaching a natural close, but the composer finds it impossible to tear himself away from his powerful principal theme, and takes it up afresh and with renewed vigor. For all that the musical dress is most pleasing and varied, a feeling of strain overtakes the hearer at being held so long in suspense. The other movements, shorter and finely contrasted and ending with a splendidly worked out finale, leave a fine impression.

Rachmaninoff has originality beyond question, yet this symphony is not without elusive hints of the style of Tschaikowsky, and there are times when the combinations of instruments used for certain effects are strangely suggestive of the tricks of that past master of orchestration, Hector Berlioz. But it is great music upon the whole, and one does not wonder that its composer is looked upon to go farther and higher if his career runs its natural course. There is a new note in the music of these Russians, hard to segregate and classify, but distinguished from the product of the other moderns as distinctly as from the style of the old classical masters.

The soloist was Mr. Josef Hofmann, whose place among contemporary pianists is already firmly established—and, be it noted, very close to the top. There are more brilliant concertos for the soloist than Beethoven's in G-major, which he elected to play last night, but whatever he undertakes is so well done that one can but enjoy it. It has been often said that Hofmann has broadened much in his art of late years, and this is undeniably true. Moreover, he is a most excellent and well-rounded musician, a matter that counts heavily, and he always had a technic to be envied. Even that, indeed, is more finished and perfect as the years go by. He played superbly last night and was honored with several recalls.

A spirited performance of Brahms's lively "Academic" overture closed the thoroughly interesting programme. The performance of the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's energetic leadership was, indeed, of highly sustained excellence throughout the evening. The third concert of the series will be given on Tues- evening, Jan. 3.

W. A. P.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 27 1910

...of useful and ornamental articles.

Symphony Concert.

A very large and brilliant audience assembled in Infantry Hall Tuesday night for the second Symphony concert of the season. In the gathering were Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. William W. Weeden, Col. H. Martin Brown, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Miss Helen Ostby, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Carpenter, Mrs. James A. Coggeshall, Miss Corliss, Mr. A. Duncan Chapin, Jr., Mrs. Gertrude Child Barrows, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. James A. Kinghorn, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. Frederick A. Chase, Miss Helen Chase, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Dr. John H. Peters, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Judge and Mrs. William H. Sweetland, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Herreshoff, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Rev. and Mrs. Richard R. Graham, Mr. and Mrs. G. M. Congdon, Col. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mrs. Olney Arnold, Miss Linda Arnold, Miss Ethel Shipman, Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Roth, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Huntoon, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Prof. John H. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian H. Copeland, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Upham Pope, Mrs. S. V. Cushing, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Dr. and Mrs. Jewett, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mr. George Parker Winship, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Mr. Fred Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mrs. D. H. Wellman, Miss Slocum, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Davis, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mr. and Mrs. Gene Ware, Mr. and Mrs. Hans Schneider, Miss Helen Tyler Grant, Miss Edith Gyllenberg, Miss Dorothy Seymour, Miss Ethel Riley.

Symphony Orchestra To-night.

The musical and social event of this evening will be the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall. The soloist will be Josef Hofman, the greatest pianist now in this country, and the programme is as follows: Rachmaninoff, Symphony in E-minor, No. 2, Op. 27; Beethoven, Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G-Major, Opus 58; Brahms, "Academic Festival" overture, Op. 80; soloist, Josef Hofmann, pianist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Providence R.I.
Nov 23/10

BIG AUDIENCE ENJOYS BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A large and enthusiastic audience marked the second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Infantry hall last evening, and music lovers were given an unusual treat, not only by Dr. Max Fiedler and his splendid players, but also by Josef Hofmann, the world-wide pianist, who was the soloist.

As uusal everything about the concert was as near perfection as possible, and the only note of criticism heard was in relation to the length of the first number on the program, which required more than an hour to play it, but the playing was such that this was no hardship, and at no time did the work of the orchestra become tedjous.

The program was:

Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.. ..... Rachmaninoff
I. Largo—Allegro Moderato.
II. Allegro Molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro Vivace.
Concerto in G major, No. 4, for pianoforte, Op. 58..... Beethoven
I. Allegro Moderato.
II. Andante Con Moto.
III. Rondo: Vivace
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80.... ..... Brahms

As a piece of tone painting the symphony in E minor by Rachmaninoff is a most remarkable composition, and while undoubtedly there is much that is absolutely original in the vast work, here and there touches of Tschaikowsky are manifest, and even more so touches of Hector Berlioz, but it certainly is wonderful music, of the new Russian school, and as an exhibition of the mastery of the technic of instrumentation is a model for students to follow.

Josef Hofmann is a pianist, who among the great ones while, perhaps, not quite on the top rung of the ladder, is very far up, and he is evidently an artist who does well everything that he undertakes to do. Perhaps his choice of concerto in G major of Beethoven may not have been as pleasing to many of his hearers as it was to himself, for it is by no means the most brilliant of the great master's works, but his playing was magnificent, while his technic is more finished than it was years ago.

The Academic overture of Brahms is full of snap and life, and was a most fitting close for a splendid program. The orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Fiedler, did some of its very best work, and altogether the concert was one of the best ever given by this great musical organization in Providence. The third concert will be given on Tuesday evening, Jan. 3.

From
Address
Date

THE SOFT ANSWER THAT TURNETH AWAY WRATH.

There are Boston ways of doing things and there are other ways. Sometimes the Boston way is peculiar and sometimes the the way is cultured and leads back to an earlier day, when courting rather than business dominated most of the relations of life. The art of pleasant expression in letter writing, whether of a public or private nature, is a delightful one. Sometimes it is far more agreeable because there is an unselfish and gracious presence behind it.

All who are interested in music here in New England recognize how much they owe to Banker Henry L. Higginson, who has supported and labored untiringly in behalf of the Boston symphony orchestra. There was a great fluttering in the dovecotes last week because Mayor Fitzgerald had declared that ladies must remove their hats at the coming concerts and rehearsals. Many of the ladies did not feel kindly to the mayor, but they very promptly removed their hats on arriving at Symphony hall, where the greatest of New England musical organizations delights the residents of its home city.

One might have thought the incident closed, but the Symphony hall management, and particularly Mr. Higginson, are of the old-fashioned mind that when a lady has to be requested to comply with an order and does so, a fuller explanation is necessary. Mr. Higginson does not find any fault with the mayor, in a communication he sends through the papers to the ladies. In fact, he smooths things over, declaring that the mayor "was loth to vex the ladies, but felt compelled to enforce this law, as he enforces other unpopular laws," and then the gracious and unselfish Higginson says: "It may not be amiss to remind the ladies that many men are bald and suffer from unavoidable draughts, but do not wear their hats. Perhaps the ladies will draw comfort from the fact that their hair, hereafter to be in view, is, at the worst, more attractive than their hats, and is often beautiful."

Few will dispute the present to be the most glorious and prosperous time in the history of the world, but one cannot help thinking there must have been great good in days when such treatment as this distinguished Bostonian extends to the ladies was more common than it now is.

From
Address
Date

The second Boston Symphony orchestra concert will be given this evening at 8:15 o'clock in Infantry hall. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, pianist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date NOV 27 1910

The first concert of the Students' Course will be by the Flonzaley Quartet in Memorial Hall next Friday evening. The programme is to be as follows: Haydn, quartet in G-minor, op. 74, No 3; allegro, menuetto, largo assai, finale; Haendel-Pochon, "Chaconne," for violin and 'cello (Messrs. Pochon and d'Archambeau); Debussy, quartet in G-minor, op. 10; anime et tres decide, andantino doucement expressif, assez vif et bien rythme, tres modere—tres mouvemente et avec passion.

* * *

To-morrow afternoon at 4 o'clock the fourth in the series of free lectures under the auspices of the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs will be given at Manning Hall, Brown University, by Leonard Smith. The lecture will be on the programme of the Flonzaley String Quartet and the music of the Haydn and Debussy Quartet will be played in full. The lecture on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last Monday by Mrs. Emma Winslow Childs was so largely attended that the room at Maxcy Hall was filled to overflowing and arrangements have been made to give the remaining lectures, which are free to the public, at Manning Hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 27 1910

Musical Notes

1884

HOW about encores? Are they an inalienable right of the concert-goer or a favor to be extended or withhheld at will? Philadelphia is musically excited about the question just now, as the result of a Boston Symphony concert situation there the other night, which is thus discussed by Alice Gordon Hogan in the Record of that city:

"It is declared to be the theory of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that encores destroy the unity, and therefore the power, of the presentation of an evening's programme. Even if this idea has any merit, a uniform observance of the rule of no encores, not only ends in sharp disappointment to the audience, but gives distinctly the impression that the rule is not well founded.

"There is no musical unity in a programme composed of selections from different writers. It goes without saying that the rendition of a symphony would suffer serious impairment of unity, if encores were permissible. But it is difficult to see how encores can disturb the unity of a diverse programme, or in any way infringe upon its unity.

"Applause of every variety is indulged frequently during the rendition of a composition. If anything in the world mars unity or breaks continuity, it is applause. Therefore, it would be just as rational to forbid applause as to prohibit encores. The former is irrepressible. The latter are legitimate and thoroughly justifiable.

"The demand for encores is a form of approbation, similar in principle to applause. If one is permissible the other should be. Encores are a higher form of approval than applause, because they are a demand for a repetition of the pleasure afforded by the music.

"If encores and applause are similar in principle, as they plainly are, either both should be entirely abolished, or both permitted. The permission of one and the prohibition of the other leave a decidedly bad impression, almost suggesting snobbishness.

"The situation in point was the renewed demand, evidenced in applause, for a song from Mme. Melba. Her singing was limited to arias. While they were immensely enjoyed, their severe classicism was quite beyond many in the audience. But every person in the audience hoped that the great singer would gladden their hearts by one of her immortal songs. The demand for encore was ignored.

"It is manifest that Melba's singing not only interrupted, but entirely suspended the musical unity of the orchestral programme. Hence there was no justification, even upon an absurd theory, for the refusal to grant the wish of the audience, emphasized in several minutes of applause, for a song from the distinguished artist. People stood in line, outside the Academy, from 5 o'clock until the box office opened, almost entirely for the purpose of hearing Melba sing one or more of her songs. This form of patronage should not only be encouraged, but it should never be disappointed by a practice so entirely unjustifiable.

"The treatment of the audience resulted in more than a distinct disappointment; it evoked a good bit of warm and adverse criticism, which, it must be admitted, can not in turn be criticised, but ought to be commended. It is to be hoped that a practice, founded upon no maintainable theory, may in the future, be abandoned, as it has been in some instances in the past."

om ..... REGISTER
ddress .....
ate .....

GREAT BOSTON SYMPHONY ON DECEMBER 12

The interest in the coming of Boston's great orchestra to New Haven on Monday, Dec. 12, is widespread and is by no means confined to this city for many orders have already been received from the surrounding towns. The position held by the orchestra in the music of America is unique and the only regret is that it has seemed impossible to arrange for its appearances here more often, for six years between concerts is rather long. Possibly after the management has a splendid house here on the evening of the 12th, it will see fit to give at least one concert here every year, for if Hartford has three each season, New Haven at least might have one.

The program that Mr. Fielder has arranged presents many attractions. The Symphony—Beethoven's Fifth—is one of those few masterworks to which one can return time after time and always find intense pleasure and intense artistic satisfaction. It is one of the few works which seems never to grow old and heard half a dozen times in a season sounds as fresh and spontaneous the last time as it did the first. The same is true of Weber's "Oberon" overture which opens the concert.

In building his program Mr. Fielder has devoted the first half of it to the classics, the Weber overture and the Beethoven Symphony, and has given the last half of it to the moderns, although Rubinstein's Concerto in D-minor which Hofman will play may be almost regarded as a classic today. Hofman's performance will be watched with much interest. He is Rubinstein's pupil having been sent to that master when he ended his career as a "wonder child" and it is often said that no one can play this concerto so nearly as Rubinstein played it as this pupil does. The last two numbers are in a sense ultra-modern. Strauss's "Don Juan" tone poem based on Lenau's poem of the same name, is one of his earlier works and by the same token is regarded by many as one of his greatest for there is a considerable number of connoisseurs who believe that Strauss reached the highest point of his genius in his "Don Juan" and in his "Death and Transfiguration," the work which immediately followed it. It is exceedingly brilliant and demands not only a very large orchestra, but is most exacting in its demands upon the players. Sibilius, who will be represented by his "Finlandia" is a Finn who ranks among the foremost composers of our times. The "Finlandia" was inspired by the wrongs of his native country and is a work full of emotional excitement.

The concert will begin at 8:15 precisely.

The sale of seats for the concert which is to be given in Woolsey hall, will open at the box office, Woolsey hall, next Thursday morning, December 8th, at nine o'clock.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
n .....
ress .....
e .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES ON DEC. 12

Once, twenty-two or twenty-three years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra in one of its western trips had arranged to have the local chorus give a short choral work under the direction of its own conductor. When the time came for rehearsal the conductor mounted the podium, and it was easy to see that he was not only nervous, but decidedly scared, and it was questionable whether he had ever conducted an orchestra, much less than one like the Boston Symphony. The chorus was present, but before it began the director made a little speech to the orchestra in which he informed them that his experience in orchestral conducting was very slight, and he did not know what he could do, therefore, "would the gentlemen of the orchestra kindly follow their concert master, Mr. Kneisel, and pay no attention to his beat, ond he would try to take care of the chorus alone." It is a matter of record that never has the orchestra given more valiant aid to a conductor than it did that day and the young musician who had the baton in his hand made a reputation as a talented conductor from which he never recovered.

The first appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New Haven in six years will be in Woolsey hall, Monday evening, December 12. The sale of tickets will open at the box oce, Woolsey hall, on Thursday, December 8, but mail orders addressed to the Boston Symphony orchestra, 126 College street, with checks payable to C. A. Ellis will be filled in order of receipt before the opening of the public sale.

REGISTER
ss .....
DEC 6 - 1910

FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ON DEC. 12

It was William J. Henderson, music critic of the New York Sun, who said a few years ago that the secret of the wonderful playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is now in the 30th year of its existence, lay not merely in its being a virtuoso orchestra, but an orchestra of virtuosi and one of the first published comments on the orchestra by Max Fiedler, its present conductor, was in praise of the way the different choirs have been selected. The brass choir is composed almost entirely of Germans, who are the best players of brass instruments in the world. The wood-wind choir is of Frenchmen, who excel in this department of orchestral music, and the string are of Slavs, Germans, Austrians and Americans, the best products of the great teachers of Brussels, Prague, Vienna and Berlin.

But the end is not reached merely with accomplished musicians. These musicians must have good tools to work with and must have been together long enough to get thoroughly en-rapport with each other. It is questionable whether any orchestra in the world counts so many valuable violins, violas and 'cellos as the Boston Symphony and this fact is one of the secrets of the wonderful brilliancy and plangency of its strings. It has been said with truth that there is not a medicore instrument in the string choirs while most of them are choice examples of great masters. So too it is with the wind choir, wood-wind and brass. Greatest care has been used in the selection of the instruments and every improvement which has proved its worth is adopted.

The first appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New Haven in six years will be in Woolsey hall, Monday evening, December 12. The sale of tickets will open at the box oce, Woolsey hall, on Thursday, but mail orders addressed to the Boston Symphony orchestra, 126 College street, with checks payable to C. A. Ellis, will be filled in order of receipt before the opening of the public sale.

...Li
Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
rom .....
ddress .....
ate .....

"RUSH" TICKETS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

There seems to be a certain amount of misunderstanding regarding the "rush" tuckets at 25 cents each which will be sold for the Boston Symphony concert in Woolsey hall on next Monday evening. There are 388 seats in the gallery and 388 tickets will be sold, so that everybody will have a seat, but no seats will be reserved and the sale will open at seven o'clock in the evening. Moreover, in order that everybody may have an equal chance it should be distinctly understood that only one ticket will be sold to each purchaser. In other words, everybody who expects to take advange of this exceedingly generous offer will have to stand in line. This is the custom which is followed in Boston and Philadelphia where 25 cent tickets are sold, and only in this way can the prospective purchaser be treated fairly, as it would not be just that one person could come and buy half a dozen or more tickets and distribute them among friends who are not in the line.

ANSONIA, DERBY, SHELTON, SEYMOUR.
EVENING, DECEMBER 10, 1910.
THE EVENING SENTINEL

WOOLSEY HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New Haven in six years, will be in Woolsey hall, Monday evening, December 12. The season of 1910-1911, the thirtieth of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will break all records that have been made in the past by that organization. It will give the largest number of concerts it ever has—one hundred and seventeen, including the two concerts for the pension fund—and it is playing this year to the largest audiences it has ever had. On its first southern trip in early November, when it gave the first of its series of concerts in New York, Washington, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Brooklyn, it must easily have made a record for any orchestra in the world. Seven concerts were given, two in New York and one each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn and Hartford, and at every one of these concerts every seat in the house was sold and everywhere many were turned away unable even to secure admission.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NEW HAVEN ON DEC. 12

When the Boston Symphony orchestra was organized in the fall of 1881 with George Henschel as its conductor it consisted of 65 musicians drawn entirely from residents of Boston. This season, when it is in its 30th year, it has for the first time on its roll 100 musicians, which makes it by all odds the largest permanent orchestra in the world. For ordinary symphonic needs 85 men is sufficient for on that number can be built a classical symphony orchestra on a basis of 16 first violins, 14 seconds, 10 violas, 10 'cellos and eight double basses. Modern music, however, demands so many extra instruments in the wind choirs and in the percussion department that it is necessary to increase the size of an orchestra materially. With all other orchestras in the world it is the policy to call in extra musicians when some special modern work of large dimensions is being given but with the Boston Symphony it is the rule to have all the men needed for any work under contract with the orchestra and thus have their exclusive services. In this way the orchestra is always sure of having musicians of highest quality whenever extra men are needed. It is a fact that there are men under 35 weeks' contract with the orchestra who may play not more than 15 or 20 times during an entire season yet they always report at every rehearsal and enjoy the same benefits in respect to the pension fund and other things that men do who play at every single concert.

The first appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New Haven for six years will be in Woolsey hall, Monday evening, December 12. The sale of tickets will open at the box office, Woolsey hall, on Thursday, December 8, but mail orders addressed to the Boston Symphony orchestra, 126 College treet, with checks payable to C. A. Ellis, will be filled in order of receipt before the opening of the public sale.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om .....
dress .....
te .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Back in 80's One Manager of a Rural Theater Wanted a Street Parade Before the Concert.

The late Fred R. Comee, who for so many years was the assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, used to tell many times of the scores of experiences he had in the early days when the orchestra went traveling through the west. One of the best of these stories concerns a prosperous city in New York state. It was in the mid-80's. The orchestra was to give a concert there and unquestionably it was the first time anything of the kind had ever happened in the town. The special train arrived about noon and Mr. Comee went to the theater immediately to see if all arrangements were made for the concert. He was met by the manager who had a most worried appearance. Before Mr. Comee could say a word the manager asked him with great anxiety about the street parade. Mr. Comee was rather taken back and asked him what he meant.

"Well," said the manager, "we never give a minstrel show here without a street parade and if you don't parade you won't have no house." Mr. Comee, after he had recovered his breath, took the manager quietly aside and informed him that wile there were no ladies in the troupe, they were not giving a minstrel show and the parade would have to be postponed until their next visit.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday, December 7. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. He will play the Beethoven Concerto in G major No. 4. If this artist could be persuaded to substitute the "Emporer" Concerto for the work chosen, it would mean an additional treat, for his interpretation of the "Emporer" Concerto is wonderfully interesting.

COURIER
ss .....
DEC 6 - 1910

A VIOLIN TALE

How an Effort to Improve String Choir of Boston Symphony Failed.

Hidden away under a mass of accumulated "properties" in Symphony Hall, Boston, are thirty fine modern violins representing an investment of several thousand dollars. Thereby hangs a tale illustrative of how nothing has been spared either in effort or money to make the Boston Symphony orchestra the most perfect instrument in the world.

The string choir of the orchestra has long been famous, but some years ago Mr. Gericke, then the conductor, thought it could be improved. He conceived the idea that if all the violins had instruments of uniform make there would be a richness and brilliancy of tone such as never had been heard. He proposed the plan to Mr. Higginson, who told him to go ahead, with the result that an order for thirty specially designed violins was placed with the most celebrated maker of these instruments in Vienna.

The most celebrated makes of violins are to be found in the Boston Symphony, this one fact accounting in part for the beautiful tone of the choir—Stradivarius, Guarierius, Guadagini and Landolfi are some of the masters represented. But on the arrival of the new fiddles, the famous ones were cast aside. The experiment was a complete failure. The violins were very good, but the tone from them was not to be compared with the tone given out by the other instruments. Consequently, after a few concerts they were consigned to the store room where they have since remained, voiceless, dusty and absolutely useless.

The first appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New Haven in six years will be in Woolsey hall Monday evening, December 12. The sale of tickets will open at the box office, Woolsey hall, on Thursday, December 8th, but mail orders addressed to the Boston Symphony orchestra, 126 College street, with checks payable to C. A. Ellis, will be filled in order of receipt before the opening of the public sale.

REGISTER

FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY'S BIG CONCERT

A very important part of the equipment of the Symphony orchestra is its library; that is to say, the scores and parts of music to be played. Under the present system of publishing music the scores as a rule are very expensive and many of the modern scores cannot be sold, they can only be rented. In Symphony hall, Boston, there is a room which excites the envy and enthusiasm of musicians—the library of the great orchestra. The orchestra has been in existence now for 30 years and naturally it has a tremendous collection of music. This is all under the direct supervision of John Sauerquell, who has been the librarian for more than 20 years. The library comprises several thousand titles and represents a total investment of close to a quarter of a million dollars. At the same time these could not be replaced for such a sum of money, for many of the scores in it are not to be had in the open market today at any price. This library, supplemented by the famous Brown collection of music in the Boston public library, gives Boston the finest collection in this country, not even excepting that in the Congressional library in Washington.

The first appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New Haven in six years will be in Woolsey hall, Monday evening, December 12. The sale of tickets will open at the box office, Woolsey hall, on Thursday, December 8, but mail orders addressed to the Boston Symphony orchestra, 126 College street, with checks payable to C. A. Ellis, will be filled in order of receipt before the opening of the public sale.

ANSONIA, DERBY, SHELTON, SEYMOUR

TURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 3, 1910

WOOLSEY HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven, on Monday, December 12th, when it will give a concert in Woolsey hall, is a musical event of utmost importance not only for New Haven, but for all the cities adjacent to it. It is six years since the great orchestra visited New Haven, and every indication is that it will have one of the largest audiences that ever was gathered in that beautiful hall of Yale University. The fame of the orchestra is more surely established than ever. Now in its thirtieth year, it has no rival in America, and the chances are it has no rival in the world. The present conductor, Max Fiedler, is one of the most popular men who ever held that important post and everywhere the orchestra goes it is greeted by crowded houses. An extraordinarily fine program has been made for the concert and added to this the soloist will be no less a person than Josef Hofmann, the renowned pianist. Mr. Hofmann will play the Rubinstein Concerto in D-Minor. There is no one so well fitted to present this work for Hofmann was Rubinstein's favorite pupil and Rubinstein elected him as his true successor.

The sale of seats for this concert will open at the box office, Woolsey Hall, on next Thursday morning at nine o'clock. The prices will be $1, $1.50 and $2. Mail orders addressed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 126 College street, New Haven, with checks payable to C. A. Ellis, will be filled in the order of their receipt before the opening of the public sale and seats allotted as near to the desired location as possible.

POST

ess ..... Washington, D. C.

DEC 4 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given at the National Tuesday afternoon, December 6, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Hofmann, since he came to this country twenty years ago as a "wonder child," has developed into one of the great pianists of our time. He is still a young man, and it is freely prophesied that long before he has reached the end of his career he will stand alone among the pianists of the age. It is significant of the esteem in which he is held that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has engaged him as soloist at ten consecutive concerts. Here he will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-major No. 4.

The symphony that Mr. Fiedler has chosen for this concert is Dvorak's "From the New World," a work which was written while Dvorak was a resident of this country, and was inspired by various negro melodies he heard while here, for ington one of the greatest novelties of local amusement history.

The ballet is accorded a recognition in Russia unknown anywhere else in the world. It is supported by the government, which maintains schools devoted to that art with a twelve years' course of instruction before public appearances are permitted.

The management of the American tour terms its attraction "ocular opera," or "opera in action," and is carrying three complete scenic productions. The tour will be interrupted by two engagements of three weeks each with the Metropolitan Opera Company, with which Anna Pavlowa and Mikail Mordkin made their first American appearance last March, when they were declared the sensation of the opera season.

HERALD

ss ..... Washington, D. C.

DEC 4 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, December 6, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will be heard in Washington with an orchestra for the first time in many years, and this in itself is sufficient to give an unusual interest to the concert. Hofmann, since he came to this country twenty years ago as a "wonder child," has developed into one of the very great pianists of our time. He is still a young man, and it is freely prophesied that long before he has reached the end of his career he will stand alone among the pianists of our time. It is significant of the esteem in which he is held that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has engaged him as soloist at ten consecutive concerts, a compliment which has never been paid to any other artist. Here he will play Beethoven's concerto in G major, No. 4, which is one of the greatest masterpieces of pianistic literature.

The symphony that Mr. Fiedler has chosen for this concert is Dvorak's "From the New World," a work which has always been a great favorite. The other work of large proportions will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," an extraordinary composition. "The Roman Carnival," by Berlioz, will also be given.

m ..... HERALD

dress ..... Washington, D. C.

NOV 27 191

te .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 6, at 4:30. The soloist will be Hofmann, by all odds the greatest [illegible]. He will play

TIMES

ress ..... Washington, D. C.

DEC 4 - 1910

te .....

HOFMANN TO PLAY AT CONCERT HERE

Pianist to Give Beethoven Concerto at Boston Symphony Recital.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will be heard in Washington with an orchestra for the first time in many years. Hofmann, since he came to this country twenty years ago as a "wonder child," has developed into one of the great pianists of this day. He is still a young man. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has engaged him as soloist at ten consecutive concerts, a compliment which has never been paid to any other artist. Here he will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major No. 4.

The symphony that Mr. Fiedler has chosen for this concert is Dvorak's "From the New World," a work which was written while Dvorak was a resident of this country, and was inspired by various plantation melodies he heard while here. The question of whether this symphony is representative of American folk-music has been the subject of controversy since its first performance in New York, almost seventeen years ago. Whatever the merits of the controversy, the fact remains that the work is permeated with the flavor of plantation music, and it is one of the most melodious symphonies in the literature of the orchestra. Another work of large proportions will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

Mr. Fiedler is an ardent admirer of the genius of Strauss and is one of his greatest interpreters, and his performances of this particular work have always been memorable.

The overture will be "The Roman Carnival" of Berlioz.

POST

m .....

dress ..... Washington, D. C.

te .....

DEC 7 - 1910

The second Boston Symphony concert of he season attracted yesterday its largest audience in this city in years. Not one seat or box was left, and the National Theater was filled to its capacity.

The audience yesterday was, as usual, a brilliant one. Mrs. Taft occupied one of the boxes, and with her were the Attorney General and Mrs. Wickersham, Mrs. Boardman, and Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming.

Mrs. Leiter, in another box, entertained Mme. Jusserand, Dr. and Mrs. Roland Cotton Smith, Mrs. John R. Williams, and Mrs. Joseph Leiter.

Mrs. Richard Ballinger was a guest in Mrs. Charles A. Williams' box.

Mrs. I. T. Mann also entertained a box party, having with her Mrs. Thomas H. Carter and the Misses Hickey.

Mrs. James McMillan also entertained guests in her box. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's guests in her box included Mme. de Riano, wife of the Minister from Spain; Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle, and Miss Carlisle. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had another box.

Others in the audience were the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, the Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon. Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Gen. and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver, and Miss Oliver, Mrs. Clarence Moore. Mrs. A. Garrison McClintock, Miss McClintock, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Margaret Perin, Lady Johnstone, Miss Morgan, Miss Wetmore, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Samuel Hill, Mrs. Murray Cobb, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Miss Frances Noyes, Mrs. Ward Brown, the Bishop of Washington, the Misses Harlan, Miss Ruggles, Miss Squire, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. Horace Westcott, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Hinckley, Mrs. Ten Eyk Wendell, Mrs. J. Van Vechten Olcott, Mrs. Richard Harlow, Mrs. Robert L. Taylor, Mrs. William Harryman Rapley, Mrs. Huidekoper, Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Miss Ethel Barrymore, Mr. Justice White, the second secretary of the British Embassy and Mrs. Kennard, Mr. William Bowie Clarke, Mrs. Carl Joerissen, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. Charles Parker Stone, Mrs. Charles Fairfax, Mrs. Fremont Smith, Mrs. J. M. Culp, Miss Culp, Mrs. W. F. Dennis, Mrs. Green Clay Goodloe, Mrs. Bourne, wife of Senator Bourne, of Oregon; the Misses Cullen. Mrs. M. Lewis Clarke, Miss Ernst, Mr. and Mrs. Perry Johnson, Mrs. R. C. Bulmer, Mrs. Peyton Russell, the Misses Lee, Mrs. Duncan McKim, Miss Sophy Siebert, Miss Grace Carroll, Mrs. Heaton, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Jennings, Miss Legendre, Mr. and Mrs. Victor G. Fisher, Mr. Reginald Huidekoper, Mr. Clinton Stewart, Mr. William Hemmick, Admiral O'Neil, Count Pourtales, Baron Heyl, of the German embassy, Mrs. Crosby, Miss Marian Crosby, Mrs. J. J. White, and Dr. and Mrs. Randolph.

[99]

TIMES

ress ..... Washington, D. C.

te .....

DEC 4 - 1910

THE ETERNAL FEMININE AND THE BONNET.

A woman's devotion to her headgear presented some perplexing illustrations at one of Boston's Symphony concerts recently. The result of the efforts to require her to remove her obstructive confection leaves the solution of the question as barren as before.

Mayor Fitzgerald had insisted all along that no hats should be worn at these concerts, but the Daughters of Eve and Virot paid no more attention to him than if he had been warbling one of his favorite ditties. A round dozen of them wore their newest creations through most of the program. Then the management began the process of elimination. All but two finally yielded, and one of these asked permission to stand in the rear of the hall, while the other was bodily ejected.

Mere man can only marvel why one persistent sister preferred to stand at the rear of the house, where no one, of course, could see her beautiful bonnet, rather than remove it. It punctures the theory that women wear these marvels of tulle and feathers for the Pharisaical purpose of being seen of men. And, again, one wonders why the other obstinate beauty should have gone to the extreme of being ushered out into the night, with a fine rain falling, which soon reduced her aigrettes to the condition of a Dominicker on a damp day.

Those things occasionally happen in France, where the name of the milliner is sure to be found in the bonnet, and creeps into the newspapers along with the other features of the sensation. It was thus the sheath gown leaped into fame. But so far as the evidence discloses, the offenders in the present instance were the real heads or wings of perfectly domestic families, with no special love for the calcium.

It must be simply a part of the willfulness which has prevailed ever since

Adam gave up Paradise for plowing,
And Eve took up the art of millinery

THE SPEAKER AND THE

m ..... EVE. STAR

dress ..... Washington, D. C.

te ..... DEC 4 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, December 6, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will be heard in Washington with an orchestra for the first time in many years. Hofmann, since he came to this country twenty years ago as a "wonder child," has developed into one of the very great pianists of our time. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has engaged him as soloist at ten consecutive concerts, a compliment which has never been paid to any other artist. Here he will play Beethoven's "Concerto" in G major, No. 4.

The symphony that Mr. Fiedler has chosen for this concert is Dvorak's "From the New World," a work which was written while Dvorak was a resident of this country, and was inspired by various melodies he heard while here, for which he had unbounded admiration. The question of whether this symphony is representative of American folk-music has been the subject of bitter controversy since its first performance in New York, almost seventeen years ago, the date being December 15, 1893. The other work of large proportions will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

m ..... EVE. STAR

dress ..... Washington, D. C.

te ..... DEC 7 - 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was well attended at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Especial interest attached to the appearance of the famous pianist, Josef Hofmann, whose performances were enthusiastically applauded. The orchestra rendered the Roman carnival overture by Berlioz, Dvorak's Symphony of the New World and "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss.

ARTICLE INCOMPLETE

EVE. STAR

Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 6, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He will play Beethoven's concerto in G major, No. 4.

POST

Washington, D. C.

NOV 27

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National on Tuesday afternoon, December 6, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the greatest pianist now in America. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major No. 4.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

HOFMANN TO PLAY TOMORROW NIGHT

Will Be Soloist With Boston Symphony—Balalaika Orchestra at Forrest.

BUSY WEEK FOR POHLIG

Popular Concert Wednesday Evening—"From the New World" Symphony.

Rachmaninoff's symphony in E Minor No. 2 is the principal feature of the second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Musical Philadelphia is not unfamiliar with the work for its first performance in America took place in this city a year ago and was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Rachmaninoff's symphony has taken hold of the public much in the same manner as that of its great predecessor, Tshaikowsky's "Pathetic."

Fiedler placed the Rachmaninoff work on the second Boston program this fall, and so decided was the success of the symphony that he repeated it in Boston three weeks later. On the last Southern trip he played the symphony in Baltimore and New York and the applause always overshadowed that given to soloists on the same program.

One of the most interesting features of the present season is the manner in which Josef Hofmann has come into his own and has been admitted by the connoisseurs of America into that very small company of really great pianists. His development long the lines of profundity and poignancy of emotion has been most remarkable. He has lost none of his mastery of the technique of his instrument, he has still his cunning in his mixture of pianistic colors and to these he has added a new emotional quality which has placed him quite in a class by himself. Here he will play Beethoven's G-Major Concerto No. 4, a work which has been somewhat neglected by pianists in recent years. The other number on the program will be Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3.

* * *

INQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the central feature of the occasion was the second symphony of Rachmanninoff, which made such a favorable impression last season on its first production here by the Philadelphia Orchestra. This impression was rather deepened than at all impaired by its repetition. It is unquestionably a vital, beautiful and genuinely original composition to which a high place among modern productions in the class to which it belongs may unhesitatingly be accorded. It was admirably played last evening, with the utmost beauty of tone, refinement of finish and lucidity of statement and it was evident that the audience enjoyed it greatly. The only other orchestral number was Beethoven's overture, "Leonora" No. which received a splendidly effective interpretation. Mr. Josef Hofmann, who was heard in Beethoven's G major pianoforte concerto No. 4, which he rendered in a way well worthy of his reputation as one of the greatest of living pianists, was the assisting artist. In spite of the storm a good sized crowd was present and there was no lack of applause.

From PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 6 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY SECOND CONCERT

Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E. Minor Admirably Given by Director Fiedler.

HOFMANN THE SOLOIST

rk, 1884

Program.

Rachmaninoff. Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.
I. Largo—Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Beethoven. Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Rondo: Vivace.
Beethoven. Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72.
Soloist, Mr. Josef Hoffmann.

Only a little more than a year ago, on November 26, 1903, Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, was introduced to this city as composer-conductor, directing the Philadelphia Orchestra in his Symphony in E minor, No. 2. Last evening this composition was the symphony played by the Boston Orchestra at its second concert here this season.

This Symphony is quite modern in its scoring. There is little clear-cut melody, but the composer handles his instruments to bring out finished moods and rhythmic effects in such a way as to convey his message with clear and exacting intelligence. He has developed his figures and themes from movement to movement with a master hand, and while only here and there gushing, flowing melody creeps in, yet he never fails in coherency, and the whole is woven into marvelous climactic effect. There is a great variety in this Symphony which makes its every note vital, and entrances an audience more at each rehearsing. There are four movements. The second and fourth command the most attention. The second movement is playful throughout. The dance rhythms are voluptuous in their varied coloring. The adagio, or third movement, is noble in its message, but its full meaning is hardly discernable, except after a close study. The finale movement presents the combination of themes that have been previously heard in such a way as to arouse an audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and at the conclusion of the Symphony last night Conductor Max Fiedler was applauded with so much enthusiasm that he compelled his instrumentalists to stand and share with him the credit bestowed by a most delighted audience.

Josepf Hofmann, the pianist, made his third appearance at the Academy this season, and his playing delighted the audience as much as at any previous performance in this city. Mr. Hofmann selected as his solo number, Beethoven's Concerto in G minor, No. 4, a work which, in the entire repertoire of compositions for the piano and orchestra, gives him the opportunity which every pianist most desires, of not only showing his perfected art in all its various phases, but accompanies with it melody of the most divine character.

In the playing of the Concerto Hofmann combined the second and third movement as one. His reading, at all times, was noble and beautiful, and he never failed to give evidence of the fire of the enthusiastic artist. This enthusiasm he was able to convey to his audience to such an extent that the tremendous and prolonged applause that followed brought him out to bow acknowledgment half a dozen times. His technique was, as always, flawless, and the ease and the grace with which he accomplished the many brilliant passages of this beautiful Concerto, were so marked that he well deserved all the approbation that was accorded him.

The final number on the program was Beethoven's familiar overture, "Leonora," No. 3, which Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra gave in their usual careful and conscientious way. In spite of the bad night, the Academy of Music was crowded to capacity.

The third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts will be given on Monday evening, January 9, with Mischa Elman, violinist, as soloist.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

The second Boston Symphony concert in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in G Major No. 4. Director Fiedler has placed on the program Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor No. 2, which had its first performance in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra a little over a year ago.

* * *

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

The second Boston Symphony concert in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Beethoven's concerto in G major No. 4. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme Rachmaninoff's symphony in E

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 4 -

JOSEF HOFMANN, PIANIST

Boston Symphony Concert

The second concert this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow evening in the Academy of Music. The symphony which will be interpreted under the baton of Max Fiedler will be Rachmaninoff's E minor, which the Philadelphia Orchestra gave here for the first time last season. Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will be the soloist and will be heard in the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4. The concluding number will be the Beethoven overture, "Leonora" No. 3.

This is the complete program:

Symphony in E minor No. 2.....Rachmaninoff
Concerto for piano in G major No. 4.Beethoven
Overture—"Leonora" No. 3.....Beethoven
Soloist .....Josef Hofmann

The new musical organization, the Imperial Russian Balalaika Orchestra, under the direction of W. W. Andreef, has been winning unusual praise from critical sources in New York during the last week. These artists will be heard in concerts at the Forrest Theater tomorrow afternoon and at a Tuesday matinee. Eva Mylott, the contralto, will be a special soloist.

The balalaika is something like a guitar, and it is said to be capable of musical effects of rare beauty. Other odd instruments which will be used by the orchestra are the domra, the dulcimer, the wooden spoon, which sounds like a more mellow castanet; the shepherd's reed and the reed pipe. The orchestra has only a leave of absence from Russia, and its tour in this country is restricted to eight weeks.

EVE. TELEGRAPH

Philadelphia, Pa.

The World of Music

Four Orchestral Concerts — The Russian Balalaika — Rich and Hofmann Week's Soloists — Other Events.

PLENITUDE of orchestral music will mark the coming week. The Boston Symphony's second, with Josef Hofmann as soloist; the first Philadelphia appearance of the Russian Balalaika Orchestra, the ninth pair by own band with Thaddeus Rich for soloist; the fourth of the "pops" are the symphony concerts listed. Various other events are also on the calendar.

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy on Monday evening, when Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. The orchestral feature of the programme will be Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor No. 2. To the Philadelphia Orchestra fell the honor a year ago of giving the first performance of this work in America. Mr. Fielder put it on his second Boston programme this fall and that was sufficient to convince connoisseurs that in this second symphony Rachmaninoff had made probably the most important contribution to symphonic literature since Tschaikowsky wrote the "Pathetic." Rachmaninoff demonstrates in this work that for a composer to be a modern does not necessarily mean that he should deal chiefly in acrid dissonances nor that he should stretch the various instruments of the orchestra out of their own particular idiom. If there is one thing noteworthy about this symphony it is that all its various parts lie in the most grateful registers of the various instruments employed. His two recitals here have proved that Mr. Hofmann has added to his art an emotional depth which has not always been present. He is to play Beethoven's Concerto in G major No. 4, a work which has been more or less neglected in the last few years. The other number will be Beethoven's Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

[100]

472

PUBLIC LEDGER

VOL. CXL.—NO. 198. PHILADELPHIA, TUESDAY MORNING, JANUARY 8, 1906.

WAR TALK CONTINUES AT FRENCH CAPITAL

TROUBLE OVER MOROCCO GREATLY ANTICIPATED

GERMAN ATTITUDE PRESENTED

GERMANY SCOFFS AT IDEA OF WAR

M'CALL RESIGNATION RUMOR CONFIRMED

OPERATORS ARCHER BANKS

RUSSIAN TO RENEW

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann the Soloist in Beethoven Concerto.

PROGRAMME.

Rachmaninoff.....E minor Symphony
Beethoven.....Pianoforte Concerto in G major
Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonora," No. 3

Practically every seat was taken at the Academy last ev[illegible] at the Boston Symphony Orches[illegible]ore was the usual patient file of waiting applicants outside the gallery door. Josef Hofmann was the soloist at this, his second, concert of the 26th season of this superlative organization in Philadelphia. He played the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4, and elicited politely tumultuous enthusiasm. Mr. Hofmann's playing this year is the last word in the technique of his art; not even Paderewski could have delivered his fingers of those marvelous runs more fluently and easily. But it is a fair question whether Hofmann does not over-particularize the separate notes; he makes each one stand forth in salient relief till the hearer in his admiration of the faultless chiseling—sometimes so pitilessly hard and clear—misses the divine fire, the careless rapture, the melting tenderness that outsoars and outshines any possible disclosure of technical proficiency. And it is a question whether Mr. Hofmann is not overdoing, and tiring himself. Last night he seemed fatigued, as at his recent recital. It will be recalled that when he appeared her as a "Wunderkind" of ten, in 1887, he was called upon to give 52 concerts in two months, his health gave way, and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty effectively intervened to prevent the progressive assassination of his finely adjusted musical sensibilities.

The Rachmaninoff symphony—as the programme book pointed out—was first played in America when it was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra last season, under the composer's baton. Philip Hale, the erudite author of the critical commentary, quoted at length Mr. Philip Goepp's remarks anent the symphony, from the Philadelphia programme book. The first movement alone takes 25 minutes, and many were the late unfortunates who were shut out by the proper Draconian rule against tardy and disconcerting entrances. The whole symphony occupies an hour. It is a wonderful work of musical architecture, and the wonder grows when one reflects that the composer is but 37 years of age and has already made for himself an imperishable name. The work is not without sterile and academic stretches, where the well-spring of inspiration is dubious, if not quite dry. This is especially true of the last movement, despite the rousing climax. But the first two movements and the forepart of the third are almost thoroughly fine and compelling: in the opening largo there was the subsidence and resurgence of the waves of the sea, in which the basses, bassoons and brasses largely figured—the latter coming in, ever and anon, as vividly as the riven lightning across the seascape.

In the second movement the second violins were pursued by the first violins through a crisp and vigorous fugue. How clear is the tone of the violin chorus of this orchestra—so free from rasping and rough edges! They played last night with plentiful spirit, although Witek, the concertmeister, was absent from his desk—as was Schroeder, the first 'cellist—owing to an invasion of grip amid the orchestral ranks. In the slow movement the limpid utterance of the clarinet defied analysis or description.

The "Leonora" overture was rendered most impressively, the fine and clear-cut tone of the first violins again maintaining an impeccable standard worthy of emulation. By a most amusing and singular coincidence, just after the famous "horn behind the scenes" was heard for the second time there came faintly floating into the auditorium from afar the notes of some ambitious practitioner of the cornet.

The third concert will be given on the evening of Monday, January 9.

EVE. BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

—o—

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, when Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. The orchestral feature of the program will be Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E-minor. No. 2, which was first performed in this country by the Philadelphia Orchestra a year ago. Rachmaninoff demonstrates in this work that a composer to be modern need not necessarily deal chiefly in acrid dissonances, and that he should not stretch the various instruments of the orchestra out of their own particular idiom. If there is o enthing notable about this symphony it is that all its various parts lie in the most graceful registers of the instruments employed. Still, while the composer clings to the classical symphonic poem, the spirit of the work is distinctly modern and entirely Russian. Mr. Hofmann will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-major, No. 4, a work which he has more or less neglected in the last few years, and the other number will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3.

—o—

Special notice is given that, owing to the proximity of Christmas, the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra scheduled for Saturday evening, December 24, will be held instead on the preceding Thursday evening, December 22. All tickets purchased for Saturday evening will be good on the

INQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 27

The second Boston Symphony concert in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2, which had its first [illegible] America by the Philadelphia [illegible] over a year ago.

EVE. STAR

Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 6, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He will play Beethoven's concerto in G major, No. 4.

POST

Washington, D. C.

NOV 27

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National on Tuesday afternoon, December 6, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the greatest pianist now in America. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major No. 4.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

HOFMANN TO PLAY TOMORROW NIGHT

Will Be Soloist With Boston Symphony—Balalaika Orchestra at Forrest.

BUSY WEEK FOR POHLIG

Popular Concert Wednesday Evening—"From the New World" Symphony.

Rachmaninoff's symphony in E Minor No. 2 is the principal feature of the second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Musical Philadelphia is not unfamiliar with the work for its first performance in America took place in this city a year ago and was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Rachmaninoff's symphony has taken hold of the public much in the same manner as that of its great predecessor, Tshaikowsky's "Pathetic."

Fiedler placed the Rachmaninoff work on the second Boston program this fall, and so decided was the success of the symphony that he repeated it in Boston three weeks later. On the last Southern trip he played the symphony in Baltimore and New York and the applause always overshadowed that given to soloists on the same program.

One of the most interesting features of the present season is the manner in which Josef Hofmann has come into his own and has been admitted by the connoisseurs of America into that very small company of really great pianists. His development long the lines of profundity and poignancy of emotion has been most remarkable. He has lost none of his mastery of the technique of his instrument, he has still his cunning in his mixture of pianistic colors and to these he has added a new emotional quality which has placed him quite in a class by himself. Here he will play Beethoven's G-Major Concerto No. 4, a work which has been somewhat neglected by pianists in recent years. The other number on the program will be Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3.

* * *

INQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the central feature of the occasion was the second symphony of Rachmanninoff, which made such a favorable impression last season on its first production here by the Philadelphia Orchestra. This impression was rather deepened than at all impaired by its repetition. It is unquestionably a vital, beautiful and genuinely original composition to which a high place among modern productions in the class to which it belongs may unhesitatingly be accorded. It was admirably played last evening, with the utmost beauty of tone, refinement of finish and lucidity of statement and it was evident that the audience enjoyed it greatly. The only other orchestral number was Beethoven's overture, "Leonora" No. which received a splendidly effective interpretation. Mr. Josef Hofmann, who was heard in Beethoven's G major pianoforte concerto No. 4, which he rendered in a way well worthy of his reputation as one of the greatest of living pianists, was the assisting artist. In spite of the storm a good sized crowd was present and there was no lack of applause.

From PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 6 - 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY SECOND CONCERT

Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E. Minor Admirably Given by Director Fiedler.

rk, 1884

HOFMANN THE SOLOIST

Program.

Rachmaninoff..Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27.
I. Largo—Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Beethoven..Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Rondo: Vivace.
Beethoven..Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72.
Soloist, Mr. Josef Hoffmann.

Only a little more than a year ago, on November 26, 1903, Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, was introduced to this city as composer-conductor, directing the Philadelphia Orchestra in his Symphony in E minor, No. 2. Last evening this composition was the symphony played by the Boston Orchestra at its second concert here this season.

This Symphony is quite modern in its scoring. There is little clear-cut melody, but the composer handles his instruments to bring out finished moods and rhythmic effects in such a way as to convey his message with clear and exacting intelligence. He has developed his figures and themes from movement to movement with a master hand, and while only here and there gushing, flowing melody creeps in, yet he never fails in coherency, and the whole is woven into marvelous climactic effect. There is a great variety in this Symphony which makes its every note vital, and entrances an audience more at each rehearsing. There are four movements. The second and fourth command the most attention. The second movement is playful throughout. The dance rhythms are voluptuous in their varied coloring. The adagio, or third movement, is noble in its message, but its full meaning is hardly discernable, except after a close study. The finale movement presents the combination of themes that have been previously heard in such a way as to arouse an audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and at the conclusion of the Symphony last night Conductor Max Fiedler was applauded with so much enthusiasm that he compelled his instrumentalists to stand and share with him the credit bestowed by a most delighted audience.

Josepf Hofmann, the pianist, made his third appearance at the Academy this season, and his playing delighted the audience as much as at any previous performance in this city. Mr. Hofmann selected as his solo number, Beethoven's Concerto in G minor, No. 4, a work which, in the entire repertoire of compositions for the piano and orchestra, gives him the opportunity which every pianist most desires, of not only showing his perfected art in all its various phases, but accompanies with it melody of the most divine character.

In the playing of the Concerto Hofmann combined the second and third movement as one. His reading, at all times, was noble and beautiful, and he never failed to give evidence of the fire of the enthusiastic artist. This enthusiasm he was able to convey to his audience to such an extent that the tremendous and prolonged applause that followed brought him out to bow acknowledgment half a dozen times. His technique was, as always, flawless, and the ease and the grace with which he accomplished the many brilliant passages of this beautiful Concerto, were so marked that he well deserved all the approbation that was accorded him.

The final number on the program was Beethoven's familiar overture, "Leonora," No. 3, which Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra gave in their usual careful and conscientious way. In spite of the bad night, the Academy of Music was crowded to capacity.

The third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts will be given on Monday evening, January 9, with Mischa Elman, violinist, as soloist.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

The second Boston Symphony concert in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in G Major No. 4. Director Fielder has placed on the program Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor No. 2, which had its first performance in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra a little over a year ago.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

The second Boston Symphony concert in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Beethoven's concerto in G major No. 4. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme Rachmaninoff's symphony in E.

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 4

JOSEF HOFMANN, PIANIST

Boston Symphony Concert

The second concert this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow evening in the Academy of Music. The symphony which will be interpreted under the baton of Max Fiedler will be Rachmaninoff's E minor, which the Philadelphia Orchestra gave here for the first time last season. Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will be the soloist and will be heard in the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4. The concluding number will be the Beethoven overture, "Leonora" No. 3.

This is the complete program:

Symphony in E minor No. 2.....Rachmaninoff
Concerto for piano in G major No. 4.Beethoven
Overture—"Leonora" No. 3.....Beethoven
Soloist .....Josef Hofmann

The new musical organization, the Imperial Russian Balalaika Orchestra, under the direction of W. W. Andreef, has been winning unusual praise from critical sources in New York during the last week. These artists will be heard in concerts at the Forrest Theater tomorrow afternoon and at a Tuesday matinee. Eva Mylott, the contralto, will be a special soloist.

The balalaika is something like a guitar, and it is said to be capable of musical effects of rare beauty. Other odd instruments which will be used by the orchestra are the domra, the dulcimer, the wooden spoon, which sounds like a more mellow castanet; the shepherd's reed and the reed pipe. The orchestra has only a leave of absence from Russia, and its tour in this country is restricted to eight weeks.

EVE. TELEGRAPH

Philadelphia, Pa.

The World of Music

Four Orchestral Concerts — The Russian Balalaika — Rich and Hofmann Week's Soloists — Other Events.

PLENITUDE of orchestral music will mark the coming week. The Boston Symphony's second, with Josef Hofmann as soloist; the first Philadelphia appearance of the Russian Balalaika Orchestra, the ninth pair by own band with Thaddeus Rich for soloist; the fourth of the "pops" are the symphony concerts listed. Various other events are also on the calendar.

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy on Monday evening, when Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. The orchestral feature of the programme will be Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor No. 2. To the Philadelphia Orchestra fell the honor a year ago of giving the first performance of this work in America. Mr. Fiedler put it on his second Boston programme this fall and that was sufficient to convince connoisseurs that in this second symphony Rachmaninoff had made probably the most important contribution to symphonic literature since Tschaikowsky wrote the "Pathetic." Rachmaninoff demonstrates in this work that for a composer to be a modern does not necessarily mean that he should deal chiefly in acrid dissonances nor that he should stretch the various instruments of the orchestra out of their own particular idiom. If there is one thing noteworthy about this symphony it is that all its various parts lie in the most grateful registers of the various instruments employed. His two recitals here have proved that Mr. Hofmann has added to his art an emotional depth which has not always been present. He is to play Beethoven's Concerto in G major No. 4, a work which has been more or less neglected in the last few years. The other number will be Beethoven's Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

100

472 Hyde and Sebastian Brooks' Advertising Agency PUBLIC LEDGER

PUBLIC LEDGER

VOL. CXL.—NO 108. PHILADELPHIA, TUESDAY MORNING, JANUARY 5, 1909.

WAR TALK CONTINUES AT FRENCH CAPITAL

TROUBLE OVER MOROCCO GENERALLY ANTICIPATED

GERMAN ATTITUDE RESENTED

Post That Kaiser Went to Tangier to Proclaim Sultan's Independence" Not Forgotten

GERMANY SCOFFS AT IDEA OF WAR WITH FRANCE

EDMUNDS HEADS NEW BOARD OF EDUCATION

OTHER OFFICERS NAMED AND BYLAWS ADOPTED

HE TELLS OF WORK TO BE DONE

CALL RESIGNATION RUMOR CONFIRMED

[illegible] Postoffice Department as to the [illegible] but opposed [illegible] this year [illegible] surprised [illegible] unalterably [illegible] bill, also [illegible] legislation [illegible] opinion [illegible] leader [illegible] Postmaster [illegible] request will [illegible] cordially [illegible] They will probably [illegible] they [illegible] effort [illegible] absence [illegible] but [illegible] will [illegible] they [illegible] thing [illegible]

[illegible] Symphony major No. 3 [illegible] the ton the [illegible] certainly [illegible] He played the [illegible] in G major, No. 4, and [illegible] tumultuous enthusiasm.

[illegible]mann's playing this year is the [illegible]word in the technique of his art; not even Paderewski could have delivered his fingers of those marvelous runs more fluently and easily. But it is a fair question whether Hofmann does not over-particularize the separate notes; he makes each one stand forth in salient relief till the hearer in his admiration of the faultless chiseling—sometimes so pitilessly hard and clear—misses the divine fire, the careless rapture, the melting tenderness that outsoars and outshines any possible disclosure of technical proficiency. And it is a question whether Mr. Hofmann is not overdoing, and tiring himself. Last night he seemed fatigued, as at his recent recital. It will be recalled that when he appeared her as a "Wunderkind" of ten, in 1887, he was called upon to give 52 concerts in two months, his health gave way, and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty effectively intervened to prevent the progressive assassination of his finely adjusted musical sensibilities.

The Rachmaninoff symphony—as the programme book pointed out—was first played in America when it was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra last season, under the composer's baton. Philip Hale, the erudite author of the critical commentary, quoted at length Mr. Philip Goepp's remarks anent the symphony, from the Philadelphia programme book. The first movement alone takes 25 minutes, and many were the late unfortunates who were shut out by the proper Draconian rule against tardy and disconcerting entrances. The whole symphony occupies an hour. It is a wonderful work of musical architecture, and the wonder grows when one reflects that the composer is but 37 years of age and has already made for himself an imperishable name. The work is not without sterile and academic stretches, where the well-spring of inspiration is dubious, if not quite dry. This is especially true of the last movement, despite the rousing climax. But the first two movements and the forepart of the third are almost thoroughly fine and compelling: in the opening largo there was the subsidence and resurgence of the waves of the sea, in which the basses, bassoons and brasses largely figured—the latter coming in, ever and anon, as vividly as the riven lightning across the seascape.

In the second movement the second violins were pursued by the first violins through a crisp and vigorous fugue. How clear is the tone of the violin chorus of this orchestra—so free from rasping and rough edges! They played last night with plentiful spirit, although Witek, the concertmeister, was absent from his desk—as was Schroeder, the first 'cellist—owing to an invasion of grip amid the orchestral ranks. In the slow movement the limpid utterance of the clarinet defied analysis or description.

The "Leonora" overture was rendered most impressively, the fine and clear-cut tone of the first violins again maintaining an impeccable standard worthy of emulation. By a most amusing and singular coincidence, just after the famous "horn behind the scenes" was heard for the second time there came faintly floating into the auditorium from afar the notes of some ambitious practitioner of the cornet.

The third concert will be given on the evening of Monday, January 9.

EVE. BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

—o—

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, when Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. The orchestral feature of the program will be Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E-minor. No. 2, which was first performed in this country by the Philadelphia Orchestra a year ago. Rachmaninoff demonstrates in this work that a composer to be modern need not necessarily deal chiefly in acrid dissonances, and that he should not stretch the various instruments of the orchestra out of their own particular idiom. If there is o enthing notabie about this symphony it is that all its various parts lie in the most graceful registers of the instruments employed. Still, while the composer clings to the classical symphonic poem, the spirit of the work is distinctly modern and entirely Russian. Mr. Hofmann will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4, a work which he has more or less neglected in the last few years, and the other number will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3.

—o—

Special notice is given that, owing to the proximity of Christmas, the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra scheduled for Saturday evening, December 24, will be held instead on the preceding Thursday evening, December 22. All tickets purchased for Saturday evening will be good on the

INQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 27

The second Boston Symphony concert in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2, which had its [illegible] America by the Philadelphia over a year ago.

m NORTH AMERICAN

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

te DEC 6 1914

HOFMANN EXCELS IN A BEETHOVEN CONCERTO

Brilliant Pianist Shows His Mastery of Instrument to Academy Audience

ORCHESTRA'S FINE WORK

Boston Symphony Brings Out New Beauties in Difficult Composition by Rachmaninoff

By H. T. Craven

THE presence of Josef Hofmann at the piano, reinforced by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra, made the performance of the Fourth Beethoven concerto at the Academy of Music last evening an artistic gem of ray serene and compelling beauty. The composition ranks with the "Emperor" concerto among the most memorable of Beethoven's contributions to pianoforte music.

Mr. Hofmann is at his best in the interpretation of such works. Indeed, it is doubtful if Eugene D'Albert, whose reputation as a virtuoso rests largely on his ability to give complete expression to Beethoven piano music, could better the poetic and, from the technical viewpoint, masterful presentation of this concerto.

Mr. Hofmann is a finely equipped artist, but there is a certain conservative sobriety to his work which accords more harmoniously with a concerto than with compositions written exclusively for the piano. In other words, his performance last evening exhibited the sterling qualities of his art to a degree unrevealed in either of his two recent recitals here.

There was noble dignity and breadth of treatment in his handling of the first movement, while the limpid clarity of the rondo and the reassuring fluency of treatment illuminated the finale with a loveliness and radiance that is the ultimate word in the consideration of such masterworks.

The symphony was the E minor of Rachmaninoff, played for the first time in America last season by the Philadelphia Orchestra. The musical web of this work is woven with a solidity and compactness that renders its beauties not too obvious on a first or even a second hearing. There are many fine moments in the score, but though the scholarship never fails, the inspiration is not unflagging throughout. The most impressive passages are in the finale, where the broad and flowing basic theme is developed to a climax of telling power. The composition as a whole is likely to become less popular than Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of Death," which is more objective in manner and, of course, in theme, decidedly more picturesque.

The beauties of the symphony lie deeper, and Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for making some more of them apparent. The overture "Leonore" No. 3, which no custom can stale, received an eloquent reading as the final number.

m INQUIRER

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

te concert stage in this country.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor No. 2 is the principal feature of the second Boston symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Musical Philadelphia is not unfamiliar with the work, for its first performance in America took place in this city a year ago, and was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is many years since any new orchestral work of large dimensions has found such immediate favor with the public. Mr. Fiedler placed it on his second Boston program this fall and so decided was its success that he repeated it in Boston three weeks later. On the last Southern trip he played it in Baltimore and New York, and it is significant that wherever it has been played the applause given to it has overshadowed the applause given to the soloists on the same program. The soloist tomorrow evening will be Josef Hoffman, who will play Beethoven's G major concerto No. 4, a work which has been somewhat neglected by pianists in recent years. The other number on the program will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

PUBLIC LEDGER

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

Rachmaninoff's magnificent symphony in E minor No. 2 is the principal feature of the second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Musical Philadelphia is not unfamiliar with the work, for its first performance in America took place in this city a year ago and was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is many years since any new orchestral work of large dimensions has found such immediate favor with the public. The popularity of Elgar's symphony was largely the result of artificial stimulation. Rachmaninoff's symphony, however, has taken hold of the public much in the same manner as that of its great predecessor, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." Rachmaninoff frankly confesses that Tschaikowsky has established the ideal toward which he strives and traces of the influence of the great Russian can easily be found in this work.

Mr. Fiedler placed this symphony on his second Boston programme this fall, and so decided was its success that he repeated it in Boston three weeks later. On the last Southern trip he played it in Baltimore and New York, and, curiously enough, whenever it has been played the applause given to it has overshadowed the applause given to the soloists on the same programme. In this symphony Rachmaninoff gives ample proof that to be a modern one does not have to be dissonant. Master of the orchestra that he is, he has so written it that the music lies in the most graceful parts of the instruments employed, and the result of this is a richness of color that is seldom found even in the works of the great masters.

One of the most interesting features of the present season is the manner in which Josef Hofmann has finally come into his own, and has been admitted by the connoisseurs of America into that very small company of really great pianists of our age. His development along the lines of profundity and poignancy of emotion has been most remarkable. He has lost none of his mastery of the technique of his instrument, he has still his cunning in his mixture of pianistic colors, and to these he has added a new emotional quality which has placed him quite in a class by himself. Here he will play Beethoven's G major concerto No. 4, a work which has been somewhat neglected by pianists in recent years. The other number on the programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3. The order of the programme is as follows:

Rachmaninoff Symphony in E minor No. 2
Beethoven Concerto for piano in G major No. 4
Beethoven Overture, "Leonora," No. 3
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

om PUBLIC LEDGER

ldress Philadelphia, Pa.

ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann the Soloist in Beethoven Concerto.

PROGRAMME.

Rachmaninoff.....E minor Symphony
Beethoven.....Pianoforte Concerto in G major
Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonora," No. 3

Practically every seat was taken at the Academy last evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there was the usual patient file of waiting applicants outside the gallery door. Josef Hofmann was the soloist at this, his second, concert of the 26th season of this superlative organization in Philadelphia. He played the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4, and elicited politely tumultuous enthusiasm. Mr. Hofmann's playing this year is the last word in the technique of his art; not even Paderewski could have delivered his fingers of those marvelous runs more fluently and easily. But it is a fair question whether Hofmann does not over-particularize the separate notes; he makes each one stand forth in salient relief till the hearer in his admiration of the faultless chiseling—sometimes so pitilessly hard and clear—misses the divine fire, the careless rapture, the melting tenderness that outsoars and outshines any possible disclosure of technical proficiency. And it is a question whether Mr. Hofmann is not overdoing, and tiring himself. Last night he seemed fatigued, as at his recent recital. It will be recalled that when he appeared her as a "Wunderkind" of ten, in 1887, he was called upon to give 52 concerts in two months, his health gave way, and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty effectively intervened to prevent the progressive assassination of his finely adjusted musical sensibilities.

The Rachmaninoff symphony—as the programme book pointed out—was first played in America when it was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra last season, under the composer's baton. Philip Hale, the erudite author of the critical commentary, quoted at length Mr. Philip Goepp's remarks anent the symphony, from the Philadelphia programme book. The first movement alone takes 25 minutes, and many were the late unfortunates who were shut out by the proper Draconian rule against tardy and disconcerting entrances. The whole symphony occupies an hour. It is a wonderful work of musical architecture, and the wonder grows when one reflects that the composer is but 37 years of age and has already made for himself an imperishable name. The work is not without sterile and academic stretches, where the well-spring of inspiration is dubious, if not quite dry. This is especially true of the last movement, despite the rousing climax. But the first two movements and the forepart of the third are almost thoroughly fine and compelling; in the opening largo there was the subsidence and resurgence of the waves of the sea, in which the basses, bassoons and brasses largely figured—the latter coming in, ever and anon, as vividly as the riven lightning across the seascape.

In the second movement the second violins were pursued by the first violins through a crisp and vigorous fugue. How clear is the tone of the violin chorus of this orchestra—so free from rasping and rough edges! They played last night with plentiful spirit, although Witek, the concertmeister, was absent from his desk—as was Schroeder, the first 'cellist—owing to an invasion of grip amid the orchestral ranks. In the slow movement the limpid utterance of the clarinet defied analysis or description.

The "Leonora" overture was rendered most impressively, the fine and clear-cut tone of the first violins again maintaining an impeccable standard worthy of emulation. By a most amusing and singular coincidence, just after the famous "horn behind the scenes" was heard for the second time there came faintly floating into the auditorium from afar the notes of some ambitious practitioner of the cornet.

The third concert will be given on the evening of Monday, January 9.

RECORD

ss Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 6 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff Work and Solo by Hofmann on Program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Joseph Hofmann as soloist, played before a capacity audience in the Academy of Music last night. The program was one of especial interest, opening with Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor, which won such golden opinions on the occasion of the American premiere with the Philadelphia Orchestra last November, when the work was conducted by the composer. The repetition by the Boston Orchestra served to reveal new beauties, necessarily unassimilated on the previous hearing. Conductor Fiedler's conception of the work and his manner of reading it were of extreme interest. The last movement, particularly, was developed in a brilliant and striking manner, bringing to the conductor and orchestra an unrestrained ovation.

Hofmann, who gave a magnificent rendition of Beethoven's rather neglected G major concerto, seemed a very familiar figure at the piano, this being his third appearance here this season.

There can be no doubt of his ability in ensemble playing, though his big tone, tremendous technique and general breadth of style seem less overwhelming when heard with an orchestra than in recital. This concerto of Beethoven was a splendid medium for Hofmann's unusual equipment. The first movement, with its many beautiful scale passages, was played in a dazzlingly brilliant style, forming a strong contrast to the poetic measures of the Andante, which Hofmann brought out in an unexpectedly expressive manner. The entire work was interpreted so originally that it assumed undreamed of importance. The third and last number on the program was Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3. The Boston Orchestra seems to gain continually, not only in tonal balance, but in ability in gradations of tone that are unapproached by other orchestras. The brass section is a model of what that important portion of an orchestra should be. Never permitted to detach itself from the general rich tone of the orchestra, it is no more conspicuous than the wood wind, or any other section of the combination. There is never a harsh or blatant note from the brass, but always a pure, mellow tone that supports the lighter strings with an organ-like quality that is indescribably smooth, soft and musical.

EVE. TELEGRAPH

ss Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor had its second performance here within a year, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. The previous performance, on November 26, 1909, was also the first performance of the work in America, and Rachmaninoff himself conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra for the occasion. The enthusiasm of the audience last night, untinctured this time by the sense of novelty or of a personal attitude toward the composer, was nevertheless as unbounded as on that auspicious afternoon. The singing third movement and the vigorous, closely coherent fourth especially aroused the listeners. The symphony has its permanent, perennial place in orchestral programmes.

Herr Fiedler's conducting of the work naturally suggested comparison with the conducting of its composer, just as unusual interest of comparison was to be felt, under the special circumstances, between the execution by our own orchestra and that of our New England neighbors. Something of the authority of the composed appeared in the way Rachmaninoff's conducting educed coherency and occasional poignancy, where at times, last night, especially in the first two movements, the same assertion was not felt.

The symphony was well associated with the two Beethoven works that followed it. The essential healthfulness, the sanity of the feeling, wherever it may range, is the same. Josef Hofmann's solo number was the Beethoven concerto in G major. The fine accordance of pianist and orchestra was a joy of finish in a performance that showed Mr. Hofmann at his very best as poetic interpreter of the greatest music and as supreme technician. He was recalled continually and at last pointed perforce to the shunted piano and shook his head wearily before the audience would settle back for the familiar Leonora overture that closed the programme.

The Academy of Music had its usual Boston Symphony crowd in spite of the sudden cold and snow.

m

dress

te

Second Boston Symphony.

Next Wednesday evening brings the second of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will be heard here with orchestra for the first time in many years. Hofmann today is one of the very few really great pianists in the world and he is one of the very few really great pianists in the world and it is freely prophesied that before his career is ended he will stand as the greatest pianist of his time. He will play the Beethoven Concerto in G major No. 4, which is one of the great masterpieces of pianistic literature.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's fifth in E minor, the most brilliantly scored of all Tschaikowsky's works. It has not been heard here in a number of years. The other orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's brilliant "Roman Carnival" overture and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

[101]

m EVE. BULLETIN

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

e DEC 6

...in many a musical moon.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Second Concert of the Season, With Hofmann as Soloist

It was truly a music masters' night at the Academy last evening. Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra held the stage; Josef Hofmann was the soloist, and Beethoven and Rachmaninoff provided the scores for what proved to be one of the most delightful concerts of the symphonic type held thus far this season in Philadelphia. In spite of the turbulent weather the audience was all that could be desired both in point of numbers and in enthusiasm.

Mr. Hofmann selected Beethoven's Concerto in G Major, N. 4, for a display of his talents, and, as events showed, his selection was a wise one, partly for the reason that the work, because of its technical difficulties gave fullest oportunity for his powers as a pianist, and partly because it is written in a highly sympathetic and melodious vein, typical of Beethoven at his best. The adagio movement particularly, with its rich singing qualities, caught the fancy of the audience, while the sprightly rondo vivace movement which followed lent a pleasing contrast.

Evidently Hofmann has taken a leaf out of Paderewski's notebook, for he showed marked improvement in his pedaling as compared with his work of several years back. The clarity of his tones and the delicacy of his touch was a source of delight to the trained musician while his melodic handling of the denzas caused the audience as a whole to clamor for an encore. Five times he responded with a bow to the hand-clapping, but Fiedler effectually blocked any chance of a piano solo by ordering the instrument moved back from the centre of the stage.

The Rachmaninoff symphony, in E minor, No. 2, which the composer himself conducted with the Philadelphia Orchestra during his visit to this country in November a year ago, was the other important work of the evening, and the players from Boston, be it said to their credit, made as much out of it as it is possible to get. The work is too long and loses interest at times, particularly in the opening polyphonic movement. Its extreme brilliancy in the finale, however, compensates to a degree for this defect. Beethoven's well known "Leonora" overture completed the program.

om NEWS

dress Baltimore, Md.

te

HOFMANN IN SECOND APPEARANCE TONIGHT

Piano Virtuoso Will Be Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Joseph Hofmann, the great piano virtuoso, will make his second appearance in Baltimore this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric tonight. Mr. Hofmann's former appearance here was at one of the early Peabody recitals of the year, when he played a big program, creating the deepest impression.

His number tonight will be the B major Concerto of Beethoven, one of the works for which he is most famous. The symphony of the evening will be Tschaikowsky's No. 5, in E Minor, and the other number will be Berlioz's overture, Opus 9, "The Roman Carnical," and Brahm's Academic Festival Overture, Opus 80. The overture is one of two written by Brahms in 1880, coming between the D Major Symphony and the one in F Major. The companion work is the "Tragic" Overture, which, although bearing the later opus mark, was really written first.

The Orchestra is playing Washington this afternoon, a number of the members stopping in Baltimore yesterday afternoon and proceeding to the Capital City this morning. Frederick H. Gottlieb entertained several of them at an informal musicale at his home on Eutaw place last night, in which all hands, including Mr. Gottlieb, who is a brilliant amateur player of the flute, took part.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the ... AMERICA

om

dress

te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric Theater tonight, beginning at 8:15 sharp. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist. Max Fiedler will be the conductor, and the program will be as follows:

Berlioz—Overture, "The Roman Carnival."
Tschaikowsky—Symphony in E Minor, No. 5.
Beethoven—Concerto for Piano in G Major, No. 4.
Brahms—Overture, "Academic Festival."
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

Baltimore Journal, Donnerstag, den 8. Dezember 1910.

Zweites Symphonie - Conzert.

Gediegenes Programm wird vollendet vorgeführt. — Herr Max Fiedler dirigiert meisterhaft. — Josef Hofmann, der polnische Klaviervirtuose bezaubert durch sein wundervolles Spiel. — Lyric - Theater war vollzählig besetzt.

Ganz gefüllt war das Lyric - Theater gestern Abend von einem musikliebenden, fashionellen Publikum, um den zweiten Conzerte des Bostoner Symphonie - Orchesters in unserer Stadt zu lauschen. Mit der blitzblanken Technik jedes einzelnen Orchestermitgliedes bot Herr Max Fiedler's geniale Leitung den Empfindungsreichthum der vorgeführten Compositionen in ausgiebister Weise dar!

Die Ouvertüre „Der römische Carnival", von H. Berlioz, eröffnete das genußreiche Conzert. Dieses Opus 9 war lange ein Lieblingsstück in Europa. Es ist ein glänzendes Tonstück, das neben mancher bizarren und betäubenden Stelle dem Musiker sehr viel Schönes bietet. Das schlicht anhebende Andante ist ganz reizend; immer stärker werdend, steht es schließlich im vollen Prunke des Orchesters da. Das energische Allegromotiv, eine jubelnde Windsbraut, wird gleichfalls auf das geistreichste gesteigert. Der begeisterten Wiedergabe des in blendendes Bengalfeuer getauchten „Römischen Carnivals" seitens des berühmten Orchesters folgte rauschender Applaus.

Tschaikowskys Fünfte Symphonie in E-Moll war die nächste Nummer. Zuerst wurde die sechste Symphonie (die pathetische) dieses russischen Meisters bekannt und hat rückwirkend die fünfte und vierte nach sich gezogen. Man könnte füglich diese fünfte Symphonie Programm - Musik nennen; ihre Sätze sind inhaltlich enge verbunden. Diese Musik trägt die Stempel des wirklich Erlebten und Empfundenen und das ist ihr ästhetischer Werth. Aus dieser Eigenschaft ist auch die Freiheit und theilweise neue Führung der Form entsprungen. Sehr viel Interessantes und Schönes bietet jeder der vier Sätze dieser Tondichtung.

„Tschaikowsky's Stil steht besonders dem Schumann's nahe, hat sich aber Liszt'schen und Wagner'schen Einflüssen nicht verschlossen, soweit sein im Grunde durchaus lyrisches Talent das zuließ", sagt Dr. Hugo Riemann.

„Seine Werke sind blühend in ihrer oft ergreifenden Melodik, wohllautsatt, doch ungleich an Werth und voll widersprechendsten Eigenschaften: bald eine weibliche Zartheit und Sinnigkeit, dann wieder eine halbasiatische Wildheit", liest man in „Abriß der Musikgeschichte", von Kothe-Prochazka.

Die Wahrheit dieser Urtheile erbrachte die gestern Abend gespielte „Fünfte Symphonie." Wenn auch, wie Dr. Riemann voraus sagt, manche Klavierstücke und Lieder Tschaikowsky's sich der Zukunft nicht erhalten werden, kann man doch seinen Orchesterwerken, und darunter auch der „Fünften Symphonie" ein langes Leben prophezeien.

Dem glanzvollen Vortrag durch die Bostoner folgte ein anhaltender Sturm von Applaus.

Nach der Pause ergriff der Klassiker Beethoven das Wort. Sein reizendes Klavier - Conzert in G-Dur fand unter den Händen von Josef Hofmann, begleitet vom Orchester, eine vollendete Wiedergabe. Nach der überreichen Chromatik der vorhergehenden Nummern, that das klassische Verweilen in der Tonart dem Ohre so wohl. Das ansprechende Conzerto erinnert im ersten und letzten Satze öfters an Mozart; doch fehlt es nicht an den Titanenblitzen. Durchaus Beethovenisch ist der Klavierpart. Spielend überwand Josef Hofmann die technischen Schwierigkeiten; sein Vortrag war einzig, ideal. Besonders lieblich macht sich der zweite Satz in dem sinnigen Zwiegesang zwischen Orchester und Klavier. Das Soloinstrument schwelgt geradezu in farbenreichen Akkorden.

Josef Hofmann besitzt neben seiner bewundernswerthen Technik den wahren künstlerischen Adel, eine hochgesteigerte Fähigkeit, musikalisch zu denken und zu fühlen. Er ist einer der ersten lebenden Virtuosen; den „neuerwachten Rubbinstein" hat man ihn genannt. Er bedankte sich mehrmals für enthusiastischen Beifall.

Ein würdiger Schluß des Conzertes bildete Brahms's „Akademische Fest-Ouvertüre", eine famose Composition, über bekannte Studentenlieder großartig aufgebaut, allgemein gefällig, und von der großen Hörerschaft auch höchst beifällig aufgenommen.

C. F. M.

---

ress .....

e .....

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

MUSIC LOVERS TO HEAR HOFMANN PLAY

Famous Pianist Will Be Here With Boston Symphony.

Next Wednesday evening will bring the second of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will be heard here with orchestra for the first time in many years. To him has been given the distinction this year of playing at 10 consecutive concerts with the Boston Symphony, which is a compliment that has never been paid to any other artist. He will play here the Beethoven Concerto in G major No. 4, which is one of the great masterpieces of pianistic literature.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fifth in E minor, which, if it has not always enjoyed the great popularity given to its successor, the "Pathetic," has come to be regarded now as the greatest of the six.

The other orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's brilliant "Roman Carnival" overture and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, beloved by all students, since it is built on well-known German student songs. The program, in its order, is as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Symphony No. 5, in E minor.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for Piano No. 4, in G major.....Beethoven
Overture, "Academic Festival".....Brahms
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Josef Hofmann To Be The Soloist. House Sold Out.

Tonight's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be one of the most interesting ever given by the orchestra in Baltimore. The house is practically sold out. Mr. Josef Hofmann is to be the soloist.

The complete program for tonight is as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9 ..... Berlioz.
Tschaikowsky.....Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64.
1. Andante; Allegro con anima.
2. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
3. Valse: Allegro moderato.
4. Finale: Andante maestoso; allegro vivace.

Concerto in G major, No. 4, for pianoforte, Op. 58.....Beethoven.
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Andante con moto.
3. Rondo: Vivace.

Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80 ..... Brahms.

ss .....

Josef Hofmann To Be Soloist.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, December 7. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, regarded by many as the greatest pianist in America. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major No. 4.

1884

---

m .....

ress .....

8 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TREAT

188

Cleanness of Musical Diction Was a Predominant Feature.

Rarely, if ever, has a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra been heard in which the clearness of the musical diction equaled that of last night. From beginning to end there was intent and purpose in the music, which, thanks to Director Fiedler's well nigh perfect reading and the wonderful co-operation of his men, was brought out.

This was largely attributable to the absence of all work of an ambiguous character; neither did the novice in composition have an opportunity to display the results of his researches. The program consisted of the mature thought of inspired creators, and its effect was deep and lasting. Not until the ultra-modern tendencies of the day have crystalized will we hear anything to compare with Tschaikowsky's Symphony in E minor.

The program also was admirably constructed, the Berlioz overture fittingly prefacing the symphony and the Brahms' bringing it to a decisive conclusion.

In looking back it seems to the writer that one of the points of greatest effectiveness was the strong underlying and twofold principal rythms that pervaded several of the numbers. All polyphonic music is woven as a fabric as well as wrought with embellishment, but seldom are composers successful in creating, continuedly, a distinct train of thought which is formed of the composite of two or more distinct primary pulsations. The device of thematic augmentation frequently produces this result, but seldom to the extent of those episodes referred to. It was as if the music were heard in cross-sectional area, revealing a vast wealth of multicolored strata.

They presented the following program:

Berlioz—Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9.
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 5, in E Minor, Op. 64.
I. Andante; Allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse: Allegro moderato.
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.
Beethoven—Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Rondo: Vivace.
Brahms—Academic Festival Overature, Op. 80.

Count Wielhorski is said to have told Berliots frankly that he did not understand the "Roman Carnival" overture at all; but certainly it is a work of great brilliance, quite in accord with modern development and sincere and logical in context. It contains a direction of utterance that carries with it conviction and leave with one the assurance that gladness as well as grief may be a passion. Certain of the incidental crescendos are thrilling in their intensity, and many of the modulations, while simple in structure, are astoundingly effective in treatment.

The sympathy is a marvel of mood, and one is almost tempted to discriminate between it and the "Pathetic," in B minor. If only the master could have lived to continue in the paths he sought and found, at last, in these two works! Countles points occur which merit extended review; but suffice it to say here that never were themes of greater pregnancy created than those which dominate this symphony.

The notion still held to by some that a massive composition must close fortissimo, is, in this case, if ever, forever dispelled. Whatever may be the opinions regarding this symphony's construction, it is indisputably the work of one who has penetrated the veil of spiritual obscurity, and we can only harken with awe to the message he gives us.

Josef Hofmann approached his work with his wonted enthusiasm and sincerity and gave a splendid presentation of a seldom-played concerto. But it seemed to fail of its full effect on the program owing to too great an organic change of style which had until its performance prevailed. However, its rendition was magnificent and but increased the desire to hear him more. He is very close to all hearts in the musical world.

In the Brahms' "Academic" overture was felt with certainty the genial fellowship expressed therein, and the audience dispersed, the better for his manifold expressions of joy.

May we have the privilege of many more concerts as thoroughly enjoyable as this one was.

J. N. H.

---

om ..... NEWS .....

ddress ..... Baltimore, Md.

ate .....

Hofmann Piano Soloist With Boston Symphony

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric Theater tonight, beginning at 8.15 o'clock sharp. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist. The program is as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Symphony in E Minor, No. 5.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano in G Major, No. 4.....Beethoven
Overture, "Academic Festival".....Brahms
Josef Hofmann, soloist.

1884

[102]

Baltimore Journal, Mittwoch, den 7. Dezember 1910

Bostoner Symphonie Orchester.

Veranstaltet heute Abend sein zweites diesjähriges Conzert im Lyric Theater. — Joseph Hofmann, der ausgezeichnete, Pianist, als Solist. — Ein äußerst interessantes Programm aufgestellt.

Heute Abend um 8 Uhr 15 wird das Bostoner Symphonie Orchester unter Leitung seines Dirigenten Max Fiedler im Lyric Theater sein zweites Conzert dieser Saison veranstalten. Es ist ein äußerst interessantes und in künstlerischer Hinsicht hochstehendes Programm aufgestellt worden, welches bei den hiesigen Musikliebhabern zweifellos großen Beifall finden wird. Der Solist ist Joseph Hofmann, der berühmte Pianist, der Beethoven's 4. Klavier - Conzert in G-Dur spielen wird. Die andern Programm-Nummern sind: Berlioz' Ouvertüre „Der römische Karneval", Tschaikowsky's 5. Symphonie in E-Moll und Brahm's „Akademische Fest - Ouvertüre".

---

a .....

ess .....

e .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening brings as soloist Josef Hofmann, who has not been heard here with an orchestra for a great many years. This gives a flavor of novelty to the concert which will be welcomed by the music lovers because Hofmann is by all odds the greatest pianist now in America and one of the very few really great pianists in the world. He is to play Beethoven's D-major Concerto No. 4, which is one of the great masterpieces of pianistic literature.

Mr. Fiedler in this program has confined himself to well-tried favorites, no novelties appearing in the list of orchestral works to be played. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fifth in E Minor, a work which, although somewhat overshadowed by the great popularity given to its successor, the Pathetic, is generally regarded now by connoisseurs as being the greatest of the six symphonies he wrote. The other orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture.

1884

---

om .....

dress .....

te .....

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Josef Hofmann Will Be Soloist—An Interesting Program.

Next Wednesday evening brings the second of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will be heard here with orchestra for the first time in many years. He will play the Beethoven concerto in G major No. 4, which is one of the great masterpieces of pianistic literature.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's fifth in E minor. The other orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's brilliant "Roman Carnival" overture and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

The program in its order is as follows: Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, No. 5; Beethoven's concerto for piano in G major, No. 4, and Brahms' overture, "Academic Festival."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

om .....

ddress ..... BALTIMORE, MD.

ldress ..... DEC 7 - 1910

Symphony Concert Tonight.

The second Baltimore concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre tonight, beginning at 8.15 sharp. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist. The program is as follows:

Overture—The Roman Carnival.....Berlioz
Symphony in E minor, No. 5.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano in G major, No. 4.....Beethoven
Overture—Academic Festival.....Brahms
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

From MORN. TELEGRAPH

Address New York City.

Date DEC 8 1910

New York Soon Will Be in Need of a New Concert Hall.

Carnegie Hall, say the real estate rumorists, may soon be changed into an apartment house. The reason for this, according to the practical men in the land market, is that the benevolent soul after whom it is named does not find the receipts from it profitable enough. That this is possible any one who remembers that Carnegie Hall earns little or nothing during six months of the long, sad year will readily admit. Yet we should have thought that the very fact that it was called Carnegie Hall, being largely devoted to the performance of such writers as Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms and Strauss, should keep it fresh and green in the memory of the star-spangled Scotsman after whom it was named. Such nomenclature is, of course, a recognition of the noble and affecting fortune he has felt it his duty to his country and a protective tariff to accumulate. In Carnegie Hall and the Carnegie libraries scattered through the Scotticized universe Mr. Carnegie has already built himself monuments more perennial than brass. It would be grave pity, therefore, if this particular mausoleum-in-advance should degenerate into a mere habitation for human beings, with the raucous-voiced and sledge-hammering pianolo, that fine fruit of modern culture and avid heart hunger, taking the place of the mystic-voiced orchestras that so long have enmusicled this stately shrine.

Then there is a possibility which Mr. Andrew Carnegie is begged to hold in mind. Should Carnegie Hall become defunct, Henry Clay Frick might build a Frick Hall and eclipse his former partner.

Already does the Frick Building overtop the narrow world of Pittsburg like a Colossus, and the Carnegie Building right near to it hides its diminished head. That would never do here. Mr. Carnegie will surely arrange that we shall still go to a Carnegie Hall and not to a Frick Hall, a Cholly Schwab Hall, or, too horrible even to mention, to an Alec Peacock Hall.

As a matter of fact, if that somewhat dreary if well and courteously managed music box be allowed to run down, what should happen is this, that a number of public-spirited men should club together and build a hall, to be called the New York Music Hall. It should smack of the public and the civic in appearance and management. It should be simple in its exterior and its interior. To the standard musical societies of New York—and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is virtually one of these—its rent should be nominal, but money making concerts, pure and simple, should be made to sustain it. It should contain a large hall and a smaller hall.

It would thus unite the functions and enjoy the incomes now shared by Carnegie Hall and Mendelssohn Hall, which is also about to die the death. We do not think such an undertaking would be either unprofitable, either in the good report of those who build it or as an actual and cold-blooded investment.

EVE. SUN

New York City.

DEC 3 - 1910

Boston Explains.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN—Sir: In your issue of Monday last you were moved to raise your voice in lamentation over the failings of your country neighbors, moralizing, as is the New York pharisaical wont, upon the sad plight, mental and moral, of all humans who choose to dwell without your lofty walls. In your editorial "Trouble in the Suburbs," beginning doubtfully and far away, you first meditate upon the melancholy days of autumn, then report the findings of certain Jersey gendarmes, and finally quote the leading exponent, of a Bigger, Better and Busier Boston: the ensemble showing a creditable knowledge of the elements of philosophy, sundry police court records and the interstices of the Boston heart.

In your grief o'er the graft rampant in exclusive Montclair, you fail to recall that that faubourg forty-five minutes from Broadway is thickly settled by ex-New Yorkers, who fled the baleful fogs arising from the city's encircling sea of oil, sugar, bank, high-cost-of-living and municipal scandals. But, alas! in their hegira this body of righteous pilgrims carried with it the inevitable number of unregenerate camp followers, who soon were up to their old tricks, by their knaveries (as listed in your editorial), besmirching the fair name of their new home. So that, while to the casual observer this blaze of dishonor in Montclair may appear to be a spontaneous combustion, yet in reality it is of incendiary origin, and those guilty of the arson are the still unregenerate camp followers whose original demesne was on the hither side of the Hudson.

As for Boston and its be-hatified Symphony Concerts, over which you weep wildly with one eye and wink broadly with the other, there are no doubt several reasons why hats have been almost de rigueur at these concerts. First of all, the Friday afternoon devotee (always feminine gender) once within the sacred precincts, forgetting all but the feast of harmony that is in store for her, makes directly for her seat and the programme book, to read therein the "dope" offered in elucidation of the music of the day. So engrossed is she in this delight that for the mere doffing of her chapeau she has not a second to spare, and when the first strains of music float out upon the expectant air she sinks back in her chair with a sigh of joy and closes her eyes tight; "soft stillness and the night become the touches of sweet harmony." Therefore, whether she or her sister enthusiasts are be-hatted or de-hatted she neither knows nor cares, and that is one reason why "hats on" is the custom.

Again, at some concerts "hats on" would be very much the lesser evil. Imagine struggling to see through 2,000 heads of hair standing on end "like quills on the fretful porcupine," and held rigidly aloft by the spell of a crashing, shuddering symphony of Strauss, Rachmaninoff, Mahler, or some other of the fearfully modern composers! Horrible thought! Ladies, keep thy hats on!

Needless to say, these explanations of the hat habit are offered only in defence of the real Bostonians. Their tasty, trim and tiny chapeaux would, de facto, be wholly unobjectionable. But on that sad day when our busy Mayor made his epoch-making descent upon Symphony Hall, most likely there was present a goodly number of fair Manhat-tanites, bedecked as to the head with all the breadth and brilliance of ultra Fifth avenue. And Mr. Mayor, aghast at such law-breaking lids, unable to discern through the forest of feathers and furbelows that the wearers thereof were aliens, was impelled to utter his famous edict "Hats off." Thus it is that Boston, through the empty vanity of its younger and giddier sister, has now to hear its music in a Symphony Hall where the lid is on, but the lids are off.

Boston, Nov. 30. JAMES A. FIDDY.

EVE. SUN

New York City.

DEC 9 - 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

JOSEF HOFMANN AND BOSTON SYMPHONY TOGETHER.

Season's Premier Pianist and the "Prima Donna" Band—"Salome" as London Swallows It Is a Lesson for Broadway—"The Girl" Rehearsed to Tears, Cheers and Curtain-Calls.

With Joseph Hofmann as their soloist, the Boston Symphony players on their second visit of the season essayed no new orchestral attempt, no joy untried. There was, however, in a somewhat familiar programme, at least the novelty of such a finished performance of Tschaikowsky's martial and stirring Fifth symphony as to bring forth applause in such volume and so persistent that Max Fiedler and his whole band of 100 men had to bow their united acknowledgment. There will be no cry for "novelty" from those who helped to crowd Carnegie Hall last night. The performance which evoked all this enthusiasm, was one of most remarkable precision and clarity, obtained, however, without sacrifice of any of the rich sonority and warmth which marks so many passages in the great Russian war-song.

The Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture was the opening number and Brahms's "Academic" overture brought a rather generous programme to a brilliant conclusion.

Josef Hofmann was heard in Beethoven's G-major concerto. There was eloquence in every note of his playing, a reserve as well as sentiment which made a deep appeal to his discriminating hearers. The modest demeanor of this great artist was changed not a whit by the many recalls which his masterly work elicited.

To-night the borough of Brooklyn also hears its second Boston Symphony concert of the season. The big piece is Rachmaninoff's Second symphony. The second number will be Rubinstein's concerto in D minor No. 4, played by that master's pupil, Hofmann, and the programme ends with Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3.

To-morrow's second matinée in Carnegie Hall brings another repetition of Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," Liszt's E flat concerto for Hofmann, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration."

The "Leonore" No. 3 will also be played at the matinée. If this piece could be banished for five years, the constant concertgoer might hear it once more without feelings akin to murderous.

---

om

ldress

ate

Daily Eagle, Brooklyn N. Y.

DEC 10 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Fine Programme With a New Symphony by Rachmaninoff, and Hofmann as Soloist.

Mr. Fiedler of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is acquiring a reputation as a programme maker, but seldom has he put together a more completely satisfactory programme than that for the second concert of his Brooklyn series, heard at the Academy of Music last night.

The foundation of the structure was a new symphony by Rachmaninoff, a work of such strength and at the same time of such immediate popular appeal, that it is likely to hold a prominent place in orchestral programmes in the future. A few Americans saw this Russian composer during his brief tour here last winter, and a good many more have heard two of his preludes for piano, which have sprung into a popularity almost as great as that of the Liszt Rhapsodies twenty years ago and quite as well deserved. But as a symphonist he is a new voice and the reception accorded to his music last night shows that this composition at least is sure of a wide popularity. It is so pleasant to hear music unmistakably modern which the ordinary concertgoer need not wait to "grow up to." They have been telling us for a good many years now that we should "grow up" to Brahms, but a good many of us still find him dry, in spite of his interludes of liquid beauty. The same prophecy has been made in regard to Strauss and Debussy, and, alas, we are rapidly grown to Strauss, the lesson of whose symphonic poems seems to be that a man need not have form if only he makes enough unexpected noises in unusual places.

But there is nothing of this straining after effect with Rachmaninoff. The ear trained on Beethoven and Schumann can follow this second symphony with no sense of surprise and with a restful confidence in the adequacy and soundness of the man's workmanship.

A fondness for Berlioz and Dvorak will quicken your enjoyment of the picturesque and sparkling second movement and of the spirited finale, but those are classics on the concert platform.

The new work is Russian through and through and reveals the strongest voice that has yet come out of Russia, save Tschaikowsky. He does not storm the heights of tragedy as does Tschaikowsky, nor does he so much suggest the proverb, "Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar." But this first movement has the fundamental Russian melancholy, set forth with a power which carries it close to the borderland of tragedy. The themes are so varied and transformed by the harmonic treatment that very likely this movement will reveal greater beauty on a second hearing than a first, but from the first it leaves no doubt that it is a cry of sadness from the heart of a strong and sincere man, while its treatment shows the resourceful and soundly trained musician. But with the second movement all doubt vanished. The brilliancy, the sparkle, the crispness of those dance rythms took the ear and imagination captive and by them the popular success of the symphony was established. The slow third movement is filled with melody, while the fourth carries the thing through to a brilliant finish with a rush of rhythmic and melodic power. The use of clearly marked earlier themes in this last movement gives to music a homogeneity and workmanlike finish very satisfying to old-fashioned ears.

The symphony was followed by Rubenstein's fourth piano concerto, played by Josef Hofmann. His welcome as he came upon the stage proved that Hofmann is held in the esteem which he deserves in Brooklyn. To play this fourth concerto at all a man has to be a good many kinds of a good pianist and Hofmann is all the kinds that there are. It is a massive, not to say a husky, work which carries the warning, "Hands off," to all merely ordinary pianists in its first dashing cadenza. Hofmann played its riotous first movement with a rush of power which was inspiring, but even in the fastest passages his playing was clear and he did not pound, save perhaps in the climax, where piano and orchestra were all down on the field in a genuine football scrimmage, and one could not be sure of the quality of the tone. But there are men who could play that first movement effectively who would yet smother the poetry of the second movement in a volume of sound. Hofmann's playing of it was marked by extreme delicacy and by poetic feeling. His unfailing technical skill was shown everywhere, but perhaps most strikingly in those passages in which he matched the tone quality of his piano strings with that of the clarinets. This concerto, indeed, gives the whole range of dynamics which is covered by a piano recital and something approaching as wide a range of feeling. For that reason it is a most satisfying concert work—when you can hear it played by a master like Hofmann.

Mr. Fiedler concluded with the "Leonore No. 3" overture, by Beethoven. Perhaps it needed this familiar overture, which everybody plays, to remind the audience of the superiority of this Boston band in purity of tone and delicacy and exactness of shading. Certainly the performance of it last night left not one smallest thing to be desired. The appeal, both to the ear and to the imagination, was potent, and the work dismissed the audience under the spell of great creative art. Thank heaven, Beethoven could modulate from key to key without planting a gutter band on the sidewalk to tell you he was moving.

Daily Citizen,

Bro DEC 9 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE AGAIN ON FRIDAY NEXT

Will Play Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony.

DEUTSCHER CONCERT, DEC. 7.

Apollo Club's First Appearance of Season on Wednesday Evening—Music Notes.

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season on next Friday evening, Dec. 9, Brooklyn will hear that orchestra play Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, which, as played by the Boston Symphony and interpreted by Conductor Max Fielder, has been the musical sensation of the present season. Not since Tschaikowsky gave his "Pathetic" to the world has any symphony made such an impression on music lovers of all classes.

This is all the more interesting because Tschaikowsky was a Russian as is Rachmaninoff, and Rachmaninoff was a pupil of the great master. Moreover, Rachmaninoff frankly admits that Tschaikowsky is for him the ideal figure among moderns. It is significant, too, in connection with the extraordinary success that has been given to the symphony that Rachmaninoff, while full of modern spirit, has found expression for that in the classical form and has not found it necessary to resort to strange and bizarre modes of utterance to attain his end.

His melodic invention is of a very high order and none of the modern writers for orchestra is a great master of the various idioms of the different instruments employed than this serious Russian, who just a year ago was soloist with the Boston Symphony. Because of his mastery of this part of his art, his symphony sounds, as very few modern works do, and no work in the repertory of the Boston Orchestra reveals to such a degree the tonal beauties it is capable of.

The programme, in fact, might almost be called Russian, for the second number will be Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4, which will be played by Josef Hofmann. If Rubinstein had few of those qualities in his music which mark the Russians of the school of Tschaikowsky and his followers, he must none the less be classed among the great Russian composers, not merely because that was the country of his nativity, but percause of the enormous influence he exerted in that country during his life. When Hofman gave up his concerts as a "wonder child," he went directly to Rubinstein and was taught by him up to the time of Rubinstein's death, and if there is any one who approaches Rubinstein's performance of this splendid concerto, it is this young Pole.

The final number on the programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

EVE. MAIL

ss New York City.

TACT THAT CONQUERS.

Were the observer at the Office Window called upon to name the most tactful man in Boston he would unhesitatingly designate Major Henry L. Higginson, and for reasons which are herewith briefly stated: On the morning following a recent matinee performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he is a generous patron, Major Higginson published a letter thanking the women who attended for their consideration in removing their hats. He pointed out that men who are bald and extremely sensitive to draughts would not think of keeping their hats on during such a performance, and added: "Perhaps the ladies will draw comfort from the fact that their hair, hereafter to be in view, is at the worst more attractive than their hats, and is often beautiful."

Could there be anything more diplomatic than that final sentence? The chances are that the woman who keeps her hat on at the next symphony concert will be suspected by all the other women there of coming without having had her hair dressed.

[103]

The
Brooklyn Citizen

Telephone, 2924 Main
Connecting All Branches

The Great Home Paper
Daily, One Cent Sunday, Three Cents

Borough of Brooklyn
New York City

Dear Sir:
I take pleasure in enclosing you a clipping of Theatrical Notice which appeared in recent issue of The Brooklyn Citizen.

Yours very truly,
JOHN N. HARMAN,
Dramatic Editor
The Brooklyn Citizen

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE AGAIN ON FRIDAY NEXT

Will Play Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony.

DEUTSCHER CONCERT, DEC. 7.

Apollo Club's First Appearance of Season on Wednesday Evening—Music Notes.

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season on next Friday evening, Dec. 9, Brooklyn will hear that orchestra play Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, which, as played by the Boston Symphony and interpreted by Conductor Max Fielder, has been the musical sensation of the present season. Not since Tschaikowsky gave his "Pathetic" to the world has any symphony made such an impression on music lovers of all classes.

This is all the more interesting because Tschaikowsky was a Russian as is Rachmaninoff, and Rachmaninoff was a pupil of the great master. Moreover, Rachmaninoff frankly admits that Tschaikowsky is for him the ideal figure among moderns. It is significant, too, in connection with the extraordinary success that has been given to the symphony that Rachmaninoff, while full of modern spirit, has found expression for that in the classical form and has not found it necessary to resort to strange and bizarre modes of utterance to attain his end.

His melodic invention is of a very high order and none of the modern writers for orchestra is a great master of the various idioms of the different instruments employed than this serious Russian, who just a year ago was soloist with the Boston Symphony. Because of his mastery of this part of his art, his symphony sounds, as very few modern works do, and no work in the repertory of the Boston Orchestra reveals to such a degree the tonal beauties it is capable of.

The programme, in fact, might almost be called Russian, for the second number will be Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4, which will be played by Josef Hofmann. If Rubinstein had few of those qualities in his music which mark the Russians of the school of Tschaikowsky and his followers, he must none the less be classed among the great Russian composers, not merely because that was the country of his nativity, but because of the enormous influence he exerted in that country during his life. When Hofman gave up his concerts as a "wonder child," he went directly to Rubinstein and was taught by him up to the time of Rubinstein's death, and if there is any one who approaches Rubinstein's performance of this splendid concerto, it is this young Pole.

The final number on the programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

ess

The Boston symphony concerts are scheduled for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Upon both occasions Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Thursday night he will play the Beethoven concerto in G major, and on Saturday afternoon he will be heard in Liszt's E flat major concerto.

The programme for Thursday evening will include Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Tschaiowsky's fifth symphony and Brahms's "Academic Overture." Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler will begin his programme with Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and it will include Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" tone-poem and Beethoven's Leonore overture No. 3.

1 STANDARD UNION,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
ess
DEC 10 1910

A RUSSIAN SYMPHONY HEARD AT THE ACADEMY.

How much will Russian genius contribute to the music of the future? This is a question which has aroused numerous and diversified opinions from all ends of the musical world. It is a most interesting one, and in the finality resolves itself for solution not so much in the past achievements of Tschaikowsky as in the direction taken by those who, coming after him, have nevertheless felt the sway and power of his influence. That Tschaikowsky was a great voice there is no doubt, but his followers will have to preach to a different and more modern public, and they will necessarily need to mould their thoughts and expressions so as to satisfy a broader and more sophisticated state of receptiveness.

For this reason a great deal of attention naturally centres upon any new work of importance from the pen of a Russian composer, and especially of Sergei Rachmaninoff, whose career so far has been one of great promise, and who, in fact, has already done things of significant value to modern art. Furthermore, one can hope that with Rachmaninoff the seeds planted in the fertile soil of Tschaikowsky will in time ripen into a rich and bountiful fruition. But whether his music will carry the distinction of lasting and imperishable greatness is a fact of which present evidence offers but a limited assurance.

For instance, in Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor No. 2, performed for the first time in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, one was left indifferently cold to pronounced elements of thought. The emotional fervor with which Tschaikowsky actually thrills at times is absent from the E minor, although this condition does not in the least indicate a lack of sincerity of seriousness on the part of the composer. On the contrary Rachmaninoff is apt to become deeply absorbed in his subject and is fully capable of reaching into extraordinary lengths of conception, as was shown in his other orchestral pieces, and especially his "Isle of Death," which was heard in Brooklyn last season.

But in this symphony Rachmaninoff practically departs from the general scheme of programme music. He depicts no struggle of souls, as Tschaikowsky, or of life and fate, as Beethoven, aims for no picture, no symbolism, excepting so much of these ideas as may be within the conventional reaches of sound. There is a striving constantly for tonal euphony and harmoniousness, and in this respect the composer's purpose is most excellently accomplished. The melodies are conceived with a circumspection that is masterly, and their treatment, first, as themes, and secondly, as subjects for harmonic development, reveal on the whole a well-mannered if not altogether brilliant workmanship.

The first movement has a sombre introduction, moving on a background of sustained chords over which the leading motive carried by the strings soon makes its appearance. The scoring for the violins then continues for the first half of the movement in a persuasive, melodious mood, until a change in color finally occurs with a fanfare of brass following a rather passionate crescendo of the chief theme. In the closing of this first section, the listener is brought back to the sadness and melancholy of the opening phrases.

In the second movement, allegro molto, one hears a spirited dance motive, which is developed in a free and graceful style. To musicians the figures and designs in which the composer indulges must be interesting, but to the average hearer these clever decorative devices add but little to the relevance and continuity of the music. There is a sudden secession of the dance rhythm and the following episode is serious in character. But the transition is only momentary, for again the dance figures break into the text, doubling and tripping over each other in charming, tuneful repetition. But towards the end sadness again steals over the scene and the music gradually dies off into impressive silence.

The third movement is the most lyrical section of the symphony. Three melodies occur in succession, and they are treated eloquently by violins and wood winds. The music here rises and falls in swaying, undulating waves, now gently sentimental and then passionately emotional, leaving in its wake a spirit of sweetest longing and beauty. These are perhaps a few of the most precious moments in the entire symphony. The finale, allegro vivace, is vigorous, and more or less climactic in its progress. The composers give his music in this portion of the work a more decisive character, combining the two elements of lyrism and power to marked advantage.

Max Fiedler's reading of the symphony was a studious one. He trusted to the sagacity of the composers implicity, and never once endeavored to add an original touch or two, which might have indeed given the work a trifle more color than it really possesses. Instead, the symphony, although most authentically rendered on the part of conductor and musicians, seemed wanting in inspiration, and left the audience without any recollection of having been moved. Pleasing and interesting—of course the symphony was all that, but great in the sense of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, never.

Josef Hofmann was the soloist, and he also helped to make the concert a memorable one. His playing in the Rubenstein Concerto was distinguished by intellectual as well as artistic power. His is a talent which apparently grows and grows, ever bringing the musician in him into a stronger and more superb light. The concerto is a beautiful one in itself, and when played with so much feeling and artistry as Hofmann reveals it simply grips the mind of the listener with its wonderful expressiveness. As for technique and tone, Hofmann is well-nigh an example of perfection itself.

Beethoven's overture "Leonora," No. 3, was played as the closing number of the concert. The piece wears well, although possessing but few of the qualities which made Beethoven truly great.

EVE. MAIL

ss New York City.

MUSIC.

Hofmann Plays with Boston Symphony and Gives Fine Performance.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

A sold out house greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra and Mr. Fiedler upon their second visit this season last night in Carnegie hall. Josef Hofmann was the soloist, and he was especially welcome, as he played one of the noblest works ever written for the piano, the Beethoven concerto in G major.

In days like these when instrumental artists at ur symphony concerts are rare occurrences it is an especial joy to hear one of the best deliver a message of such importance and such splendor as that contained in the great old classic, which is as fresh and as completely satisfying as the most modern work we have heard.

Hofman sounded the profound depths and the splendid heights of his playing, which was aways impeccable from the technical standpoint, and as to interpretation there are few living who could invest it with the same flow of purity and the same eloquence and dignity of expression, the same genial appeal as he does. He was recalled many times. Mr. Fiedler presented no novelties, but his programme was nevertheless one of decided interest with the ever-welcome fifth symphony of Tschaikowsy, the Belioz "Roman Carnival" and the Brahms Academic Festival overture. The orchestra played with great brilliancy and tonal beauty.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

There were kings before Agamemnon—and after. The eminent Puccini could not keep the crowds from Carnegie Hall to hear the band from Boston, and to hear once more, as solo performer with this band, Josef Hofmann. Mr. Hofmann played the Liszt concerto, E flat major, No. 1, challenging technicians of the past, as Rosenthal, for example. But Mr. Hofmann need fear no longer any comparisons. His art satisfies on every side. Technically his performance yesterday was dazzling, if one cared to be dazzled. Mostly one does not when he plays. He scattered the golden raindrops of his treble; with a fine restraint, he brought out the clear, clean rhythm, and he carried the concerto through to a conclusion masculine and jubilant.

The orchestra played the "New World" symphony, which is perhaps more significant in its American inspiration than the opera last night; Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and the Leonora overture, No. 3. The huge audience was very warm in its applause.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 10 191

Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra go on their way rejoicing after to-day's Carnegie Hall matinée.

Josef Hofmann, the soloist, is to return Jan. 17 for his fourth recital.

[104]

Daily Citizen,
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 10 1910

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS RACHMANINOFF SYMPHONY

His Second Proves Interesting, but a Bit Disappointing.

HOFMANN IS THE SOLOIST.

Heard in Rubenstein Concerto—The "Leonore," No. 3, Overture Finely Done.

Rachmaninoff's second symphony, in E minor, which has been highly praised in Boston and Manhattan, was the feature of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. It is interesting; of this there can be no doubt. But the large audience seemed to find it not quite up to expectations. It abounds in lovely passages, especially those for woodwinds in the third movement, and impresses one as being distinctive. But, as played last night, anyway, it seems to need liberal dashes of acid. The strings seem too much in evidence; more of the clangor of brass, more sharply accentuated color, would make its length of more varied appeal. At times it was a bit monotonous. As a medium of exhibiting the tonal qualities of such a superb orchestral instrument as the Boston Symphony Society is it is surpassed by few compositions.

The second movement, with its sudden change to a suggestion of a wildly abandoned dance, its touch of the bizarre contrasting with phrases that are like hymnal chants, and its splendid fugue, was well worth hearing. So, too, is the finale, with its joyous introduction and its passionate climax. A rehearing would be desirable.

Josef Hofmann was the soloist, appearing in the Rubenstein concerto, No. 4, in D minor. Both Mr. Hofmann and the orchestra were at their best in this, and there was prolonged applause as it ended. The pianist has grown to full musical stature, has become the great artist. His playing last night exhibited greater beauties than ever before. His tone was deliciously limpid; it sang delightfully. And when there was call for power, power was there, and ability to thrill and move.

The great Beethoven "Leonore" overture, No. 3, concluded the programme. In this the orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, played with such glorious tone and color that the audience sat as if entranced. The shading was exquisite; the contrasts were developed with great effectiveness. None of the glorious beauties of the overture was overlooked.

This was the second concert of the series scheduled for the Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music. The third will be given on Friday evening, Jan. 13.

AMERICAN

s New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHARMS

Josef Hofmann Is the Feature of Concert in Carnegie Hall.

Again the Boston Symphony Orchestra delighted a great audience at Carnegie Hall last night by the faultless way in which it played a programme of varied interest. The scheme included Berlioz's well known "Roman Carnival" overture, a marvel of spirit, color and dramatic power; Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, and Beethoven's Concerto in G major (No. 4, Op. 58), with Josef Hofmann as pianist.

Perhaps we are having a little more Tschaikowsky than we need just now. His "Fifth" is surely not his finest work. He himself (as was frankly mentioned in the printed anaysis of the work) wrote rather unfavorably of it. And Brahms, who heard it played, was not impressed by the last movement.

The symphony lacks unity of form and thought. The second movement contains passages of unusual beauty. In the third part of the symphony the composer departed boldly from the method of his predecessors by substituting a rather depressing waltz for the usual scherzo. The final episode is painfully noisy and borders on vulgarity.

The most fascinating feature of the concert was the Concerto, which Josef Hofmann interpreted with his accustomed art, taste and skill.

STANDARD UNION,
ess BROOKLYN, N. Y.
DEC 3 1910

masterpieces of modern

The second Boston Symphony concert will take place next Friday evening at the Academy of Music.

EVE. GLOBE

New York City.

DEC 9 - 1910

The Boston Symphony.

EVERY season seems to have its symphony as every age has its reputation. Perhaps this season's is to be the fifth of Tschaikowsky. Already Mr. Mahler had led it here at a concert of the Philharmonic Society when Mr. Fiedler came over from Boston to make it the pièce de résistance of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. The season is still in its youth, and Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Altschuler, and the others are to be heard from.

The newspaper reviewers may fret with ample reason against having to listen to the same work at concert after concert in so short a time. The conductors would probably reply (and not without reason, even their victims must admit) that their programmes for the year are not designed for the men that must hear all concerts (or nearly all), but for the particular followings of their several organizations, which are very, very far from being identical. And so it happens that Tschaikowsky's No. 5 is the symphony of the moment, if not of the season.

But the plaint of the fretful reviewers so far cannot be against the performances, but against the symphony itself. They may conceivably detest the work, at least when administered too often, but they cannot conceivably withhold admiration from the way the work has been played under the leadership of Mr. Mahler and Mr. Fiedler. The virtuoso band from Boston covered itself with glory in the performance last night. The last movement in particular developed a Cossack fury that swept all before it. No wonder Mr. Fiedler was recalled with tempestuous applause and no wonder he bade his men rise to share the honor with him.

The soloist of the concert was Josef Hofmann and his choice of a piano concerto Beethoven's in G major. In the first movement Mr. Hofmann was hardly at his best, but with the wondrous andante he came into his own, and through that movement and the final rondo he played unsurpassably. The overlong programme began with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and ended with Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, both of which were played brilliantly.

MAX FIEDLER,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau DRAMATIC MIRROR

From ..... New York City

Address .....

Date ..... NOV 10 1910

A Great Opportunity

THE MAYOR OF BOSTON, JOHN F. FITZGERALD, is paying considerable attention to the theatre and other amusements. The breadth of his interest is shown in his recent declaration that if women did not take off their hats at the Boston Symphony concerts he would revoke the license of the hall where the concerts are given. There is still—thanks to woman's habit of doing what she pleases—some question as to whether the license will be revoked.

More important, in a way, is Mayor FITZGERALD'S idea—delivered something like an ultimatum—that Boston shall see plays of the better sort as soon as New York sees them. He thinks Boston is being ill-treated by producing managers. He saw in New York a year ago several plays that but now are becoming known in Boston. "This is one of the best cities in the country for performances, and I wonder that the public stands for this sort of thing," he says. "If we cannot get more of the original companies in the best plays when they are put on, let us have the best second companies that can be got together. We want the plays just as early as New York gets them, and it is about time that we let the managers know it."

Truly here is an admirable combination of civic pride and timely curiosity. But managers cannot make simultaneous productions of plays in New York and Boston, and hope to come out even by the operation, valuable as Boston's theatrical patronage may be. And Mayor FITZGERALD takes no account of the views of Boston's dramatic critics, who quite likely would damn a play beyond recovery—at least in New England—if it should be presented in that city by a number two company of any calibre.

There is one thing that Mayor FITZGERALD might busy himself about profitably to his public, and in justice to the theatre. Some of the very best plays now before the public cannot be performed in Boston because of the arbitrary and unreasonable law of Massachusetts against the appearance of children on the stage.

This law, which will be marveled at as a freak of modern legislation by future generations, just as the present generation marvels at the Blue Laws of Puritanism, should be repealed. And Mayor FITZGERALD should lead the campaign against it, for while it operates the artistic representation of many plays will be out of the question in that Commonwealth.

STAATS ZEITUNG

...s ..... New York City.

DEC 9 - 1910

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das zweite Paar der Symphonie-Konzerte des berühmten Bostoner Orchesters ist für kommenden Donnerstag Abend, resp. kommenden Samstag Nachmittag unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler und unter solistischer Mitwirkung von Herrn Josef Hofmann angekündigt. Das Donnerstag-Programm umfaßt Berlioz' „Römischer Karneval"-Ouverture; Tschaikowsky's Fünfte Symphonie; Brahms' „Akademische Ouverture" und Beethoven's G-Dur-Piano-Konzert. Das Samstags-Konzert umfaßt Dvorak's „Neue Welt"-Symphonie; Strauß' „Tod und Verklärung"; Beethoven's „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3 und Liszt's Erstes Piano-Konzert.

Die Philharmoniker treten unter Gustav Mahler's Leitung in der laufenden Woche ihre erste Tournee an, die sie nach Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse und Utica führt.

Das Programm des kommenden Freitag Nachmittag-Konzertes der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft bringt als Wagner-Programm eine Reihe der populärsten Nummern aus des Meisters Musikdramen. Das Programm am kommenden Sonntag schließt u. A. zwei Novitäten von Hugo Kaun und Schubert's unvollendete Symphonie ein.

PRESS

...ress ..... New York City.

DEC 9 1910

Hofmann with Boston Symphony.

Carnegie Hall was packed last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the season there. It was easy to account for the extraordinary size of the audience. Josef Hofmann appeared as the soloist, playing Beethoven's piano concerto in G major, No. 4, opus 48. The other offerings were Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," which opened the programme; Brahms's Academic Festival overture, which closed it, and Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, No. 5, which came second on the list.

Beethoven's G major piano concerto not only holds an exceedingly high place among the great composer's works, but is one of the most beautiful compositions of its kind in the literature of music. To say that Hofmann played it in a way that was worthy of its creator only half expresses how admirably the pianist rose to his task. His performance was masterly from every point of view, going far below the surface, if one can speak of surface in a work so profoundly inspired. His reading of the wonderful Andante alone was something to treasure in one's memory.

Max Fiedler, who gave Hofmann excellent orchestral assistance, delighted the audience with a caloric performance of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, but one that did not always reveal the Boston Orchestra to its best advantage. It would be hard to assert that the conductor always preserved perfect dynamic balance and rhythmical precision.

It is of interest to record that he took the waltz movement at a tempo considerably faster than that established by Safonoff and followed approximately by Arnold Volpe on March 13 last spring. In this he agreed with Walter Damrosch. His tempo at the beginning of the finale also tallied with that adopted by Damrosch, being faster again than Safonoff's pace. In the [illegible]vace section which follows Fiedler [illegible] Damrosch, but fell behind Safonoff [illegible] Volpe.

TRIBUNE

...m .....

...dress ..... New York City.

...te ..... DEC 9 - 1910

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler had Mr. Josef Hofmann to help him last night at the second evening concert of the Boston orchestra, and therefore needed nothing new in the programme to challenge especial interest on the part of the public. Mr. Hofmann played Beethoven's concerto, played it chastely, beautifully, eloquently, convincingly and—because he had an audience that was discriminating to play to—he stirred it to the depths of its heart and charmed its sense and taste. The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnaval," Tschaikowski's fifth symphony and Brahms's "Academic Overture"—played brilliantly, as usual.

...m EVE. WORLD

...dress ..... New York City.

Josef Hofmann Soloist With Boston Orchestra

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THERE have been murmurings among musicians that we are getting too much Tschaikowsky in our concert programmes this season; but who that heard his beautiful fifth symphony played so superbly by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night would have preferred something else? The great audience fell completely under its spell, and at the end called out Mr. Fiedler time and again, finally forcing the whole orchestra to rise in acknowledgment of its plaudits. Such musicianship is rare, and Mr. Fiedler conducted altogether admirably.

Josef Hofmann was the soloist in Beethoven's fourth piano concerto. He played with the technical power and the artistic understanding of the master pianist that he is become, and the orchestra kept pace with him in worthiness.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture was the opening number, and the concert closed with Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture.

The

Brooklyn Citizen

Telephone, 2924 Main
Connecting All Branches

The Great Home Paper
Daily, One Cent Sunday, Three Cents

Borough of Brooklyn
New York City

Dear Sir:

I take pleasure in enclosing you a clipping of Theatrical Notice which appeared in recent issue of The Brooklyn Citizen.

Yours very truly,

W. OESTREICHER

Dramatic Editor
The Brooklyn Citizen

Baxter

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 9. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D-Minor No. 4. This should be more than ordinarily interesting. Hofmann is the greatest of Rubinstein's pupils, and no one plays this concerto so nearly as did the master as does this young Pole. The rest of the programme will be announced in due time.

SUN

...ress ..... New York City.

DEC 9 - 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Josef Hofmann, the Soloist, Plays Beethoven's G Major Concerto.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night had one fault, which is becoming altogether too common. It was too long. No concert of highly specialized music can chain the attention for more than an hour and three-quarters. When the hands of the clock pass 10 people should be on their way home with their minds filled with lovely memories. Conductors appear to be extremely stiffnecked in regard to this matter. It is evident that most of them are deeply enamoured of their own music.

The programme consisted of the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Beethoven's G major concerto for piano and orchestra and Brahms's "Academic Overture." The solo performer was Josef Hofmann. In the list of compositions there is no music calling for discussion for its own sake. Nor was there anything in the interpretation of the orchestral numbers under the baton of Max Fiedler to require profound comment.

Were it essential to the repose and security of this community an observer might ruminate on the various degrees of speed at which different parts of the Tschaikowsky symphony are taken by different conductors. But perhaps the wisest comment that can be made is that despite all the conflicting points of view the composition remains a compendium of characteristic Tschaikowsky music.

Mr. Fiedler appeared to have more sympathy with the vigor of the barbaric outbursts than with the more languishing cantabiles. At any rate he did not permit his musicians to dwell and swell on these themes as sentimentally as some conductors do. Whether this treatment was closer to the intent of the composer than the more familiar one shall not be decided here. The music sounded beautiful as it was played last night and only the first bassoon threw questionable phrases into the general utterance.

Mr. Hofmann's performance of the Beethoven concerto was such as should be expected from a pianist of his rank. Without doubt many of his hearers found his playing of the first portion of the opening movement somewhat hard and overforceful, but before the movement was more than half done the pianist had softened his tone and rounded his style to its accustomed finish.

Of his delivery of the great slow movement nothing but praise can be uttered. This was a dignified, highly conceived and tenderly delivered interpretation of Beethoven's thought coupled with wonderful daintiness of touch. In the last movement Mr. Hofmann played exquisitely throughout. The orchestral support was admirable.

...ss .....

MUSIC

BROOKLYN HEARS SECOND RACHMANINOFF SYMPHONY

By Harry Chapin Plummer.

Sergei Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E-minor (opus 27), was the principal offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducting, at its second concert of the season in the New Academy of Music, Brooklyn, last night. In Anton Rubinstein's D-minor concerto for pianoforte, Josef Hofmann was heard with the orchestra, which rendered as the concluding number of the evening the "Leonore" overture No. 3 of Ludwig van Beethoven.

Barring an interval of unbalanced rhythmic maintenance and tone production in the first movement, the symphony was executed with rare beauty of melodic and harmonic utterance; the allegro divisions being marked by splendid animation in the playing of every choir of instruments employed. The rendition of the third movement was of such admirable unity as to suggest its especial qualification for separate performance in the recital programs of eminent organists heard regularly throughout the Greater City.

Hofmann's delivery of the massive soli of the mighty Rubinstein concerto, which, almost half a century ago, was classed with the "Tannhaeuser" overture of Wagner as a "chaotic and incomprehensible" type of work, wanted little of mastery and heroic authority. His forti were striking in their superbly controlled virility and potentiality of attack; his shading in lighter vein partook of an idyllic repression with a resulting limpidness of lore enchanting to the ear. The treatment accorded the orchestration emphasized the concreteness of structure of the composition.

A reading of the "Lenore" overture that was remarkable for its fidelity to the spirit, as well as the letter of the idee fixe of "Fidelio" was realized.

[105]

EVE. GLOBE

New York City.

DEC 9 - 1910

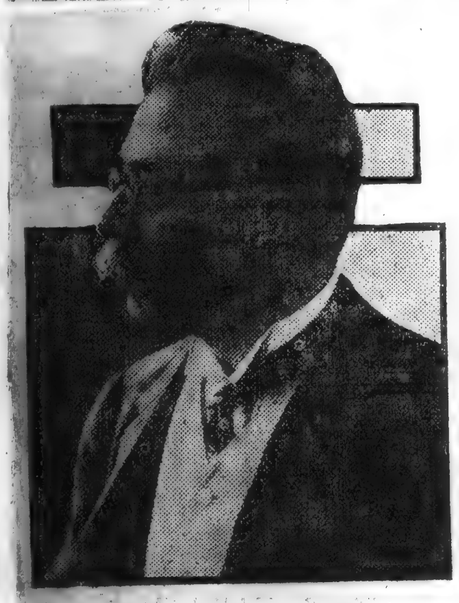
The Boston Symphony.

EVERY season seems to have its symphony as every age has its reputation. Perhaps this season's is to be the fifth of Tschaikowsky. Already Mr. Mahler had led it here at a concert of the Philharmonic Society when Mr. Fiedler came over from Boston to make it the pièce de résistance of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. The season is still in its youth, and Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Altschuler, and the others are to be heard from.

The newspaper reviewers may fret with ample reason against having to listen to the same work at concert after concert in so short a time. The conductors would probably reply (and not without reason, even their victims must admit) that their programmes for the year are not designed for the men that must hear all concerts (or nearly all), but for the particular followings of their several organizations, which are very, very far from being identical. And so it happens that Tschaikowsky's No. 5 is the symphony of the moment, if not of the season.

But the plaint of the fretful reviewers so far cannot be against the performances, but against the symphony itself. They may conceivably detest the work, at least when administered too often, but they cannot conceivably withhold admiration from the way the work has been played under the leadership of Mr. Mahler and Mr. Fiedler. The virtuoso band from Boston covered itself with glory in the performance last night. The last movement in particular developed a Cossack fury that swept all before it. No wonder Mr. Fiedler was recalled with tempestuous applause and no wonder he bade his men rise to share the honor with him.

The soloist of the concert was Josef Hofmann and his choice of a piano concerto Beethoven's in G major. In the first movement Mr. Hofmann was hardly at his best, but with the wondrous andante he came into his own, and through that movement and the final rondo he played unsurpassably. The overlong programme began with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and ended with Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, both of which were played brilliantly.



MAX FIEDLER,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PRESS

New York City.

Hofmann with Boston Symphony.

Carnegie Hall was packed last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the season there. It was easy to account for the extraordinary size of the audience. Josef Hofmann appeared as the soloist, playing Beethoven's piano concerto in G major, No. 4, opus 48. The other offerings were Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," which opened the programme; Brahms's Academic Festival overture, which closed it, and Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, No. 5, which came second on the list.

Beethoven's G major piano concerto not only holds an exceedingly high place among the great composer's works, but is one of the most beautiful compositions of its kind in the literature of music. To say that Hofmann played it in a way that was worthy of its creator only half expresses how admirably the pianist rose to his task. His performance was masterly from every point of view, going far below the surface, if one can speak of surface in a work so profoundly inspired. His reading of the wonderful Andante alone was something to treasure in one's memory.

Max Fiedler, who gave Hofmann excellent orchestral assistance, delighted the audience with a calorific performance of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, but one that did not always reveal the Boston Orchestra to its best advantage. It would be hard to assert that the conductor always preserved perfect dynamic balance and rhythmical precision.

It is of interest to record that he took the waltz movement at a tempo considerably faster than that established by Safonoff and followed approximately by Arnold Volpe on March 13 last spring. In this he agreed with Walter Damrosch. His tempo at the beginning of the finale also tallied with that adopted by Damrosch, being faster again than Safonoff's pace. In the allegro vivace section which follows Fiedler outran Damrosch, but fell behind Safonoff and Volpe.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau DRAMATIC MIRROR

From ..... New York City.

Address .....

Date .....

A Great Opportunity

THE MAYOR OF BOSTON, JOHN F. FITZGERALD, is paying considerable attention to the theatre and other amusements. The breadth of his interest is shown in his recent declaration that if women did not take off their hats at the Boston Symphony concerts he would revoke the license of the hall where the concerts are given. There is still—thanks to woman's habit of doing what she pleases—some question as to whether the license will be revoked.

More important, in a way, is Mayor FITZGERALD'S idea—delivered something like an ultimatum—that Boston shall see plays of the better sort as soon as New York sees them. He thinks Boston is being ill-treated by producing managers. He saw in New York a year ago several plays that but now are becoming known in Boston. "This is one of the best cities in the country for performances, and I wonder that the public stands for this sort of thing," he says. "If we cannot get more of the original companies in the best plays when they are put on, let us have the best second companies that can be got together. We want the plays just as early as New York gets them, and it is about time that we let the managers know it."

Truly here is an admirable combination of civic pride and timely curiosity. But managers cannot make simultaneous productions of plays in New York and Boston, and hope to come out even by the operation, valuable as Boston's theatrical patronage may be. And Mayor FITZGERALD takes no account of the views of Boston's dramatic critics, who quite likely would damn a play beyond recovery—at least in New England—if it should be presented in that city by a number two company of any calibre.

There is one thing that Mayor FITZGERALD might busy himself about profitably to his public, and in justice to the theatre. Some of the very best plays now before the public cannot be performed in Boston because of the arbitrary and unreasonable law of Massachusetts against the appearance of children on the stage.

This law, which will be marveled at as a freak of modern legislation by future generations, just as the present generation marvels at the Blue Laws of Puritanism, should be repealed. And Mayor FITZGERALD should lead the campaign against it, for while it operates the artistic representation of many plays will be out of the question in that Commonwealth.

STAATS ZEITUNG

...s ..... New York City.

.....

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das zweite Paar der Symphonie-Konzerte des berühmten Bostoner Orchesters ist für kommenden Donnerstag Abend, resp. kommenden Samstag Nachmittag unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler und unter solistischer Mitwirkung von Herrn Josef Hofmann angekündigt. Das Donnerstag-Programm umfaßt Berlioz' „Römischer Karneval"-Ouverture; Tschaikowsky's Fünfte Symphonie; Brahms' „Akademische Ouverture" und Beethoven's G-Dur-Piano-Konzert. Das Samstags-Konzert umfaßt Dvorak's „Neue Welt"-Symphonie; Strauß' „Tod und Verklärung"; Beethoven's „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3 und Liszt's Erstes Piano-Konzert.

Die Philharmoniker treten unter Gustav Mahler's Leitung in der laufenden Woche ihre erste Tournee an, die sie nach Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse und Utica führt.

Das Programm des kommenden Freitag Nachmittag-Konzertes der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft bringt als Wagner-Programm eine Reihe der populärsten Nummern aus des Meisters Musikdramen. Das Programm am kommenden Sonntag schließt u. A. zwei Novitäten von Hugo Kaun und Schubert's unvollendete Symphonie ein.

TRIBUNE

m .....

dress ..... New York City.

te ..... DEC 9 - 1910

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler had Mr. Josef Hofmann to help him last night at the second evening concert of the Boston orchestra, and therefore needed nothing new in the programme to challenge especial interest on the part of the public. Mr. Hofmann played Beethoven's concerto, played it chastely, beautifully, eloquently, convincingly and—because he had an audience that was discriminating to play to—he stirred it to the depths of its heart and charmed its sense and taste. The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnaval," Tschaikowski's fifth symphony and Brahms's "Academic Overture"—played brilliantly, as usual.

[105]

...m EVE. WORLD

...dress ..... New York City.

...te .....

Josef Hofmann Soloist With Boston Orchestra

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THERE have been murmurings among musicians that we are getting too much Tschaikowsky in our concert programmes this season; but who that heard his beautiful fifth symphony played so superbly by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night would have preferred something else? The great audience fell completely under its spell, and at the end called out Mr. Fiedler time and again, finally forcing the whole orchestra to rise in acknowledgment of its plaudits. Such musicianship is rare, and Mr. Fiedler conducted altogether admirably.

Josef Hofmann was the soloist in Beethoven's fourth piano concerto. He played with the technical power and the artistic understanding of the master pianist that he is become, and the orchestra kept pace with him in worthiness.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture was the opening number, and the concert closed with Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture.

The
Brooklyn Citizen

Telephone, 2924 Main
Connecting All Branches

The Great Home Paper
Daily, One Cent Sunday, Three Cents

Borough of Brooklyn
New York City

Dear Sir:

I take pleasure in enclosing you a clipping of Theatrical Notice which appeared in recent issue of The Brooklyn Citizen.

Yours very truly,
JOSEPH F. BRADY
Dramatic Editor
The Brooklyn Citizen

Butler

W. OESTREICHER

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 9. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D-Minor No. 4. This should be more than ordinarily interesting. Hofmann is the greatest of Rubinstein's pupils, and no one plays this concerto so nearly as did the master as does this young Pole. The rest of the programme will be announced in due time.

SUN

...ress ..... New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Josef Hofmann, the Soloist, Plays Beethoven's G Major Concerto.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night had one fault, which is becoming altogether too common. It was too long. No concert of highly specialized music can chain the attention for more than an hour and three-quarters. When the hands of the clock past 10 people should be on their way home with their minds filled with lovely memories. Conductors appear to be extremely stiffnecked in regard to this matter. It is evident that most of them are deeply enamoured of their own music.

The programme consisted of the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Beethoven's G major concerto for piano and orchestra and Brahms's "Academic Overture." The solo performer was Josef Hofmann. In the list of compositions there is no music calling for discussion for its own sake. Nor was there anything in the interpretation of the orchestral numbers under the baton of Max Fiedler to require profound comment.

Were it essential to the repose and security of this community an observer might ruminate on the various degrees of speed at which different parts of the Tschaikowsky symphony are taken by different conductors. But perhaps the wisest comment that can be made is that despite all the conflicting points of view the composition remains a compendium of characteristic Tschaikowsky music.

Mr. Fiedler appeared to have more sympathy with the vigor of the barbaric outbursts than with the more languishing cantabiles. At any rate he did not permit his musicians to dwell and swell on these themes as sentimentally as some conductors do. Whether this treatment was closer to the intent of the composer than the more familiar one shall not be decided here. The music sounded beautiful as it was played last night and only the first bassoon threw questionable phrases into the general utterance.

Mr. Hofmann's performance of the Beethoven concerto was such as should be expected from a pianist of his rank. Without doubt many of his hearers found his playing of the first portion of the opening movement somewhat hard and overforceful, but before the movement was more than half done the pianist had softened his tone and rounded his style to its accustomed finish.

Of his delivery of the great slow movement nothing but praise can be uttered. This was a dignified, highly conceived and tenderly delivered interpretation of Beethoven's thought coupled with wonderful daintiness of touch. In the last movement Mr. Hofmann played exquisitely throughout. The orchestral support was admirable.

...s .....

MUSIC

BROOKLYN HEARS SECOND RACHMANINOFF SYMPHONY

By Harry Chapin Plummer.

Sergei Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E-minor (opus 27), was the prinicipal offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducting, at its second concert of the season in the New Academy of Music, Brooklyn, last night. In Anton Rubinstein's D-minor concerto for pianoforte, Josef Hofmann was heard with the orchestra, which rendered as the concluding number of the evening the "Leonore" overture No. 3 of Ludwig van Beethoven.

Barring an interval of unbalanced rhythmic maintenance and tone production in the first movement, the symphony was executed with rare beauty of melodic and harmonic utterance, the allegro divisions being marked by splendid animation in the playing of every choir of instruments employed. The rendition of the third movement was of such admirable unity as to suggest its especial qualification for separate performance in the recital programs of eminent organists heard regularly throughout the Greater City.

Hofmann's delivery of the massive soli of the mighty Rubinstein concerto, which, almost half a century ago, was classed with the "Tannhaeuser" overture of Wagner as a "chaotic and incomprehensible" type of work, wanted little of mastery and heroic authority. His forti were striking in their superbly controlled virility and potentiality of attack; his shading in lighter vein partook of an idyllic repression with a resulting limpidness of lore enchanting to the ear. The treatment accorded the orchestration emphasized the concreteness of structure of the composition.

A reading of the "Lenore" overture that was remarkable for its fidelity to the spirit, as well as the letter, of the idee fixe of "Fidelio" was realized.

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date DEC 11

HOFMANN SOLOIST WITH BOSTONIANS

Large Audience in Carnegie Hall Greets Brilliant Playing with Loud Applause.

At its second concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra again presented Josef Hofmann as soloist, and there was an undeniable look of satisfaction on the faces of the large audience when he made his appearance.

While the entire programme was interesting, the attention of the house was centred on the Liszt concerto in which Hofmann played the piano part. This particular concerto (E flat major) appears to be a favorite of the pianists who have appeared with the Boston orchestra, for it has been played by almost all of them, from Paderewski, Rosenthal and De Pachmann to Adele Marguiles, Julia Rive-King and Olga Sumaroff.

However, it is doubtful if any of these artists has given a more brilliant reading than was heard yesterday. Hofmann managed the difficulties with a facility that might have denoted indifference and produced tones that suggested the softness of a 'cello or the singing of a flute. When he finished there was great enthusiasm, and he returned to the stage again and again to acknowledge the prolonged applause.

The orchestra opened the concert with Dvorak's "New World" symphony, which it gave for the first time in seven years. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the Bohemian's tribute to America was full of exquisite shading, careful and well-judged emphasis and symmetrical phrasing. Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3, completed the programme.

STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City.

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Kecker Humor war gerade nicht eine der charakteristischen Eigenschaften von Johannes Brahms' Künstlerschaft, aber der „Akademischen Fest-Ouverture" ist ungeachtet ihres überwiegend ernsten Inhalts doch ein Abglanz der fröhlich-derben Studentenzeit eigen. Dazu tragen die von Brahms benützten Studentenlieder natürlich am Meisten bei; diese feuchtfröhlichen Gesänge erregen immer Behagen, lösen häufig Jugenderinnerungen aus und verleihen dem Stück, mit dem Brahms für die Verleihung des Doktortitels der Breslauer Universität dankte, ein anheimelndes Gepräge. Auch gestern wirkten diese Citate stark, und als zum Schluß, von den Violinfiguren in Zweiunddreißigstel von den Bässen kontrapunktlich gehoben, das Bläserchor mit den dröhnenden Posaunen als das schwere Geschütz „Gaudeamus igitur" anstimmte, da war der Effekt ein großer.

Die meisterhafteste Leistung der gestrigen Veranstaltung aber war Tschaikowsky's Fünfte Symphonie, die Herr Fiedler mit strammem Rhythmus und weitausgreifendem Temperament dirigirte. Das unterdrückte Feuer, die Hoffnungslosigkeit im ersten Satz, die erst gegen Schluß einem Hoffnungsschimmer Platz macht, die weite Skala der Dynamit vom dröhnendsten Forte bis zum verflüchtigsten Pianissimo machte gewaltigen Effekt. Traumverloren, wie die weite Steppe, erschien der zweite Satz mit dem schwermüthigen Klagegesang (welch' herrliche Kantilene des Horns und der Klarinette), wogegen das Scherzo in Anmuth und zarter Melodik des reizvollen Walzers erstrahlte. Das gewaltige Ringen des Schlußsatzes gelangte ungemein breit und wuchtig zum Ausdruck, und der glänzende E-Dur-Schluß der Trompeten, deren Kraft bei aller künstlerischer Beherrschung gestern geradezu pompös und ungemein klang, brachte die Wirkung zum Höhepunkt. Begeistert klang der Beifall durch den bis zur Fassungskraft gefüllten Saal.

Glanz und Freude, auf welchen Grundton das gestrige Konzert gestimmt war, kam auch in der koloristisch ungemein scharf und genau gebrachten „Carneval Romain"-Ouverture von Berlioz zur Geltung, wenn wir uns auch das Tempo noch fortdrängender denken konnten. Wieder müssen wir hier der wundervollen Blechbläser gedenken, welche namentlich die schwierigen Staktati in lockendem Festesglanz brachten.

Als Solist spielte Herr Joseph Hofmann mit Orchesterbegleitung Beethoven's 4. Piano-Konzert, und zwar mit einer reifen Kunst und Selbstbeherrschung, die Bewunderung entfesseln mußte. Es war ein wirkliches Zwiegespräch des Pianos mit dem Orchester, das die köstlichsten Nuancen vermittelte. Hofmann wurde enthusiastisch gefeiert.

H.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date DEC 9 - 1910

MR. HOFMANN PLAYS PIANO BRILLIANTLY

Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Earns Honors with Its Men.

Mr. Josef Hofmann was the soloist at the concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, the second of the season. He played Beethoven's G major piano concerto so well that he stirred the large audience to enthusiasm. It was admirable piano playing, full of poetry in the andante and of brilliancy in the rondo. He was recalled half a dozen times.

The orchestra's performance of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony was, however, even more applauded than Mr. Hofmann's piano playing. The Boston musicians and their leader were on their mettle and gave the famous symphony with great vigor and finish. After the final movement the conductor was recalled so many times that he asked his men to rise and share the applause with him.

The concert began with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and ended with Brahms' "Academic" overture in which he uses German student songs. Both were finely played and much applauded.

[illegible] where obscurity is fatal to the composer's effect. Mr. Fiedler took the symphony throughout with even more than "a certain license" in the matter of tempo that the composer not only authorizes, but directs. He allowed himself much freedom in this matter; and freedom even to such an extent is not misplaced in this work. There were splendid sonority and gorgeous color in the performance, and its appeal to the audience was immediate.

Mr. Hofmann played Beethoven's concerto with consummate mastery and the purest artistic beauty; with an obvious affection and tenderness for the gracious and poetic charm of the work, which are as fresh and unfaded to-day as when it came from the composer's hand more than a century ago. Delicacy and crystalline purity of tone and exquisite nuance in the treatment of phrase and passage were unfailing in Mr. Hofmann's playing, which was filled with sentiment of the most intimate sort. Such a performance does not excite to turbulent enthusiasm; yet it clearly touched and delighted the audience profoundly, for Mr. Hofmann was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge applause.

The orchestra's playing of the two overtures that began and ended the concert was brilliant and substantial.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 10 1910

MUSICAL.

Second Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra Brings a New Symphony.

A new orchestral work of importance among modern compositions was offered at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series last night. It was the Symphony in E minor, the second work of this class, by Rachmaninoff, the Russian contemporary composer, and had a hearing in this country a year ago, and at the November concert of the Boston Orchestra in Manhattan. The symphony is in the usual four movements, and while modern in spirit, it is conservative as to form. The composer has seemed to work with the viewpoint that musical value lies more in the quality and worth of ideas rather than in radical departure from approved standard lines of procedure in making these ideas known. Rachmaninoff has confessed to a veneration for Tschaikowsky, and this symphony is a sort of confession of it, a reflection of that romantic feeling of which Tschaikowsky was a most distinguished exponent. The symphony heard last night is, however, a composition of definite and original merit, with ideas of its own, well brought out, with a beautiful adagio as a third movement. Mr. Fiedler conducted its performance, and with players responded, with a careful regard for bringing out its every significance.

Another feature of the concert of particular interest was Josef Hofmann's playing with the orchestra of Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, and once again this pianist gave an exhibition of polished refinement in execution and authoritative mastery of interpretation that gave great pleasure to his hearers. The concert closed with the performance of the Beethoven "Leonore" Overture No. 3.

om EVE. JOURNAL

ldress New York City.

The next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Josef Hofmann will be the sosoist at both, playing the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4, at the first and the Liszt concerto in E flat major, No. 1, at the second. The rest of the programme on Thursday will consist of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. On Saturday afternoon Conductor Max Fiedler will play Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3.

[106]

m STAATS ZEITUNG

dress New York City.

te

Konzerte.

Das Samstags-Konzert der Bostoner hatte einen ganz gefüllten Saal in Carnegie Hall gezogen und entfesselte lebhaften Beifall. Das Orchester spielte unter Herrn Fiedler's Leitung die Dvorak'sche „Neue Welt"-Symphonie, die „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3 und Strauß' „Tod und Verklärung" in der üblichen klangprächtigen und künstlerischen Weise. Der Solist war Herr Joseph Hofmann, der Liszt's Erstes Piano-Concert zu höchster Wirkung brachte. Hofmann steht heute bekanntlich als emotioneller und bravouröser Spieler ebenso hoch, denn als tief eindringender und geistig ausschöpfender. Kein Wunder, wenn er hinreißend wirkte und enthusiastisch gefeiert wurde.

[illegible] hatte kein allzu großes Publikum nach dem New Theatre gelockt. Die Anwesenden aber unterhielten sich sehr gut, denn Herr Walter Damrosch hatte mit seinem Wagner-Programm viel Glück. Die Excerpte aus „Rienzi", „Meistersinger", „Rheingold", „Siegfried", „Tannhäuser" und „Parsifal", die Herr Damrosch mit geschickter Hand ausgewählt hatte, machten große Wirkung und wurden lebhaft beklatscht.

In Mendelssohn Hall hörten wir letzten Freitag den Violinisten Herrn Henry Such Bach's „Prélude und Fuge" in C-Dur aus des Meisters 5. Sonate für Violine allein und Max Bruch's Zweites Violinkonzert spielen. Der Künstler verfügt über eine gute und theilweise polirte Technik, doch ist seine Intonation vorderhand zu unsicher, um dauerndes Behagen aufkommen zu lassen.

Im gestrigen Sonntags-Konzert des Metropolitan Opera House trat der neuengagirte Tenor Herr Sciaretti zum ersten Mal auf und errang namentlich nach dem temperamentvollen, klangschönen Vortrag von Verdi's "La donna è mobile" einen sehr warmen Erfolg. Das Publikum rief ihn wohl zehnmal und schien sich vorgenommen zu haben, die eiserne „No Encores"-Regel sprengen zu wollen, was aber nicht gelang. Der Sänger hat eine klangvolle, schön timbrirte und gut ausgebildete Tenorstimme und singt mit viel Geschmack, so daß es interessant wäre, ihn einmal eine dramatische Partie versuchen zu lassen. Sonst wirkten noch die Damen Morena und Flahaut und die Herren Hinckley und Hinshaw verdienstlich mit. Das Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Pasternack spielte mehrere Pièces sehr annehmbar.

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date

Music

PERHAPS, with the holiday mood of gladness and jollity approaching perhaps with the spirit of this time of year already in possession of your mind, it would hardly be well to strike any harmonic undertone of sadness.

Yet, perhaps you may pause a moment, and dally with reality, in spite of all the too Yuletidy gayety that is in the air. For there is to be a passing consideration of Peter Tschaikowsky and his fifth symphony, which was played last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and neither Tschaikowsky nor this symphony of his could be considered in any manner approaching gayety.

Tschaikowsky's life was lived beneath a pall of inward and introspective sadness. The futility of many things was an ever conscious substratum of thought with him. His own Russia passed him by, and only the veriest few saw the fire of genius in his work while he was still alive.

The fifth symphony is almost unrelieved sadness. At its very beginning there is published a theme significant of the grip of futility, and ever afterward, throughout the whole four movements of the work, this theme recurs at pregnant moments.

One hears the struggle to escape from this fateful conscious futility and its failure; a beautiful yearning melody sings its way through the second movement, but again the chief theme, with the force of the inevitable, sets the yearning aspiration at naught; a mockery of gayety in the third movement takes the form of a waltz, but once more the original theme floats into it from afar off toward the end. And in the finale still there is no escape for the sorely troubled spirit.

The orchestra, under Max Fiedler, played the symphony with such great skill and such beautiful insight into its meaning that the impression made on the great audience should be a lasting one.

Josef Hofmann played Beethoven's entrancing fourth piano concerto. Adjectives are no longer necessary in speaking of this great interpretative artist. It suffices to say merely that Hofmann played the concerto.

The rest of the symphony programme consisted of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and Brahms's Academic overture, both played with brilliant effectiveness by the orchestra.

STANDARD UNION
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

ess

e DEC 4 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Josef Hofmann Again the Soloist, Playing Liszt's Concerto.

The Boston Symphony brought its second visit to New York to end with its concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, at which Mr. Josef Hofmann was for the second time the assisting soloist. He played Liszt's E flat concerto, a work most familiar that took on new aspects of brilliancy and elegance as he played it. The symphony was Dvorak's "From the New World." Mr. Fiedler might have put more abandon, more power into the last movment. Will this symphony keep its vitality long unimpaired, or will it take its place with other of Dvorak's symphonic works that have already begun to pass from the minds of men? No doubt the affectionate remembrance of New York for a work written here, produced here, and much debated here at its first disclosure, will do something to keep it longer from the apparent fate of the symphonies in D minor and D major and the others now even less known.

So, too, the same question might be raised about Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," though that has still much impressiveness and is one of the most eloquent pieces of music by a composer who now scorns eloquence. It now seems clear and direct, though the composer is a long time getting to his point at the beginning and in getting away from it at its end. The performance of it had beauty of tone, clearness, and logical consistency, but was lacking a little in fire and temperament. The audience applauded it heartily.

Beethoven's third Leonore overture, which still lives and brooks no inquiries about its health, closed the programme. There was the greatest enthusiasm about Mr. Hofmann's playing, and he was recalled to the platform again and again.

est pupil, Josef Hofmann. [illegible] binstein had few of those qualities in his music which mark the Russians of the school of Tschaikowsky and his followers, he must none the less be classed among the great Russian composers, not merely because that was the country of his nativity, but because of the enormous influence he exerted in that country during his life. When Hofmann gave up his career as a "wonder child," he went directly to Rubinstein and was taught by him up to the time of Rubinstein's death, and if there is any one who approaches Rubinstein's performance of this splendid concerto, it is this modest, quiet, young Pole, who has rapidly forged to the front as one of the very few really great pianists of the world. The final number on the programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

m SUN

dress New York City.

te DEC 11 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Josef Hofmann Plays Liszt's E Flat Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée at Carnegie Hall yesterday resulted in the cheering condition of "standing room only." The programme listed Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," Lizst's E flat piano concerto, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. This was a feast of delightful music. The Dvorak symphony was recently played by the People's Symphony Society, but it is a work which ought to be heard often, if only to cheer up those who become depressed by the outpour of acrid modern music. It is lovely, simple and melodious from beginning to end.

As for the Strauss tone poem, there are some who hold it to be the best composition which the great realist has given us. Whether that be true or not, it is certain that it is a brilliant, picturesque and interesting piece of music and that it affords abundant scope for the display of the best qualities of the Boston orchestra.

The solo performer was again Josef Hofmann, whose performance of the Liszt concerto was a thing of beauty. His clear, delicate and fluent enunciation of the rippling passages, and his broad, vigorous and opulent utterance of the mass effects aroused the audience to real enthusiasm. The concerto is a virtuoso piece, but it can be played with musical taste and intelligence, and these were what Mr. Hofmann brought to its interpretation.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1910

Women attendants at Boston Symphony concerts, some of them, at least, have been in the habit of wearing their hats at the recitals, and this in spite of the command by Mayor Fitzgerald that the hats should be removed. Certain women paid no heed to the mayor's request, whereupon the doughty mayor approached the management and declared that, if his injunction was not obeyed he would see that the license for the hall should be cancelled. The management, thereupon, inforced the order, presenting printed requests and having them handed to owners of the non-removable hats. Some women obeyed at once, but others went to the rear of the hall and remained standing there. But the order was inforced in the seats.

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date DEC 11 1910

HOFMANN SOLOIST WITH BOSTONIANS

Large Audience in Carnegie Hall Greets Brilliant Playing with Loud Applause.

At its second concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra again presented Josef Hofmann as soloist, and there was an undeniable look of satisfaction on the faces of the large audience when he made his appearance.

While the entire programme was interesting, the attention of the house was centred on the Liszt concerto in which Hofmann played the piano part. This particular concerto (E flat major) appears to be a favorite of the pianists who have appeared with the Boston orchestra, for it has been played by almost all of them, from Paderewski, Rosenthal and De Pachmann to Adele Marguiles, Julia Rive-King and Olga Sumaroff.

However, it is doubtful if any of these artists has given a more brilliant reading than was heard yesterday. Hofmann managed the difficulties with a facility that might have denoted indifference and produced tones that suggested the softness of a 'cello or the singing of a flute. When he finished there was great enthusiasm, and he returned to the stage again and again to acknowledge the prolonged applause.

The orchestra opened the concert with Dvorak's "New World" symphony, which it gave for the first time in seven years. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the Bohemian's tribute to America was full of exquisite shading, careful and well-judged emphasis and symmetrical phrasing. Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3, completed the programme.

STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City.

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Kecker Humor war gerade nicht eine der charakteristischen Eigenschaften von Johannes Brahms' Künstlerschaft, aber der „Akademischen Fest-Ouverture" ist ungeachtet ihres überwiegend ernsten Inhalts doch ein Abglanz der fröhlich-derben Studentenzeit eigen. Dazu tragen die von Brahms benützten Studentenlieder natürlich am Meisten bei; diese feuchtfröhlichen Gesänge erregen immer Behagen, lösen häufig Jugenderinnerungen aus und verleihen dem Stück, mit dem Brahms für die Verleihung des Doktortitels der Breslauer Universität dankte, ein anheimelndes Gepräge. Auch gestern wirkten diese Citate stark, und als zum Schluß, von den Violinfiguren in Zweiunddreißigstel von den Bässen kontrapunktlich gehoben, das Bläserchor mit den dröhnenden Posaunen als das schwere Geschütz „Gaudeamus igitur" anstimmte, da war der Effekt ein großer.

Die meisterhafteste Leistung der gestrigen Veranstaltung aber war Tschaikowsky's Fünfte Symphonie, die Herr Fiedler mit strammem Rhythmus und weitausgreifendem Temperament dirigirte. Das unterdrückte Feuer, die Hoffnungslosigkeit im ersten Satz, die erst gegen Schluß einem Hoffnungsschimmer Platz macht, die weite Skala der Dynamik vom dröhnendsten Forte bis zum verflüchtigsten Pianissimo machte gewaltigen Effekt. Traumverloren, wie die weite Steppe, erschien der zweite Satz mit dem schwermüthigen Klagegesang (welch' herrliche Kantilene des Horns und der Klarinette), wogegen das Scherzo in Anmuth und zarter Melodik des reizvollen Walzers erstrahlte. Das gewaltige Ringen des Schlußsatzes gelangte ungemein breit und wuchtig zum Ausdruck, und der glänzende E-Dur-Schluß der Trompeten, deren Kraft bei aller künstlerischer Beherrschung gestern geradezu pompös und ungemein klang, brachte die Wirkung zum Höhepunkt. Begeistert klang der Beifall durch den bis zur Fassungskraft gefüllten Saal.

Glanz und Freude, auf welchen Grundton das gestrige Konzert gestimmt war, kam auch in der koloristisch ungemein scharf und genau gebrachten „Carneval Romain"-Ouverture von Berlioz zur Geltung, wenn wir uns auch das Tempo noch fortdrängender denken konnten. Wieder müssen wir hier der wundervollen Blechbläser gedenken, welche namentlich die schwierigen Staktati in lockendem Festesglanz brachten.

Als Solist spielte Herr Joseph Hofmann mit Orchesterbegleitung Beethoven's 4. Piano-Konzert, und zwar mit einer reifen Kunst und Selbstbeherrschung, die Bewunderung entfesseln mußte. Es war ein wirkliches Zwiegespräch des Pianos mit dem Orchester, das die köstlichsten Nuancen vermittelte. Hofmann wurde enthusiastisch gefeiert.

H.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

DEC 9 - 1910

Labor members	40
Nationalists	71
Independent nationalists	11
Total government coalition	397
Unionists	273

Results of Elections for New Parliament to Date.

Liberals	147
Labor members	28
Irish nationalists	45
Independent nationalists	6
Total coalition members elected	226
Total unionists elected	193
Constituencies to be heard from	251
Coalition gains	17
Unionist gains	19

LONDON, Thursday.—The fifth day of the general elections ended with the parties still running about even and with the prospect that the opposing parties are in almost precisely the same relative position they held at the start. Returns had been received up to midnight from the voting for 419 members, and the result is a unionist gain of two seats in that number over those held by that party in the last Parliament overland, and which [illegible] fatal to the composer's effect. Mr. Fiedler took the symphony throughout with even more than "a certain license" in the matter of tempo that the composer not only authorizes, but directs. He allowed himself much freedom in this matter; and freedom even to such an extent is not misplaced in this work. There were splendid sonority and gorgeous color in the performance, and its appeal to the audience was immediate.

Mr. Hofmann played Beethoven's concerto with consummate mastery and the purest artistic beauty; with an obvious affection and tenderness for the gracious and poetic charm of the work, which are as fresh and unfaded to-day as when it came from the composer's hand more than a century ago. Delicacy and crystalline purity of tone and exquisite nuance in the treatment of phrase and passage were unfailing in Mr. Hofmann's playing, which was filled with sentiment of the most intimate sort. Such a performance does not excite to turbulent enthusiasm; yet it clearly touched and delighted the audience profoundly, for Mr. Hofmann was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge applause.

The orchestra's playing of the two overtures that began and ended the concert was brilliant and substantial.

Clipping Bureau

Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 10 1910

MUSICAL.

Second Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra Brings a New Symphony.

A new orchestral work of importance among modern compositions was offered at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series last night. It was the Symphony in E minor, the second work of this class, by Rachmaninoff, the Russian contemporary composer, and had a hearing in this country a year ago, and at the November concert of the Boston Orchestra in Manhattan. The symphony is in the usual four movements, and while modern in spirit, it is conservative as to form. The composer has seemed to work with the viewpoint that musical value lies more in the quality and worth of ideas rather than in radical departure from approved standard lines of procedure in making these ideas known. Rachmaninoff has confessed to a veneration for Tschaikowsky, and this symphony is a sort of confession of it, a reflection of that romantic feeling of which Tschaikowsky was a most distinguished exponent. The symphony heard last night is, however, a composition of definite and original merit, with ideas of its own, well brought out, with a beautiful adagio as a third movement. Mr. Fiedler conducted its performance, and with players responded, with a careful regard for bringing out its every significance.

Another feature of the concert of particular interest was Josef Hofmann's playing with the orchestra of Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, and once again this pianist gave an exhibition of polished refinement in execution and authoritative mastery of interpretation that gave great pleasure to his hearers. The concert closed with the performance of the Beethoven "Leonore" Overture No. 3.

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

The next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Josef Hofmann will be the sosoist at both, playing the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4, at the first and the Liszt concerto in E flat major, No. 1, at the second. The rest of the programme on Thursday will consist of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. On Saturday afternoon Conductor Max Fiedler will play Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3.

[106]

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York City.

Date

Konzerte.

Dr. Smith, [illegible] nahe 3. Ave. Station.
Seit 20 Jahren der erste, bekannte Spezialist.
Keine Garantie.
Die beste Behandlung, die besten Medizinen, die geringsten Kosten und eine gründliche und schnelle Heilung in allerkürzester Zeit.
Alle Männer-Krankheiten,
Blut-, Haut-, Blasen-, Nieren-, Herz-, Lungen-, Leber- und Magenkrankheiten, [illegible] Mund, Zunge und Nase, offene Beine, Rheumatismus, Nervenschwäche etc., beider Geschlechter. Bevor Ihr Alle zuerst zu Dr. Smith geht, erspart Ihr Zeit, Geld und Schmerzen. Konsultation frei. Von 9—8. Sonntags 9—1.
Mai'11

DR. BONSCHUR,
Umgezogen nach 59 West 38. Str., N. Y.
Seit Jahren bekannter Spezialist für gründliche Behandlung aller Männerkrankheiten. Schnelle Entfernung und dauernde Heilung der schlimmsten Fälle. Blut-, Nieren-, Blasen-, Harn-Beschwerden usw. Stunden 9—11 Abends 7—8 Sonntags 1—1. Hütet Euch vor Leuten, welche in deutschen Anzeigen von Quacksalbern, die sich Aerzte und Spezialisten nennen. Patienten, welche streng wissenschaftliche Behandlung verlangen, sollten vorsprechen.

Publikum nach dem Neuen Theater getrieben. Die Anwesenden aber unterhielten sich sehr gut, denn Herr Walter Damrosch hatte mit seinem Wagner-Programm viel Glück. Die Excerpte aus „Rienzi", „Meistersinger", „Rheingold", „Siegfried", „Tannhäuser" und „Parsifal", die Herr Damrosch mit geschickter Hand ausgewählt hatte, machten große Wirkung und wurden lebhaft beklatscht.

In Mendelssohn Hall hörten wir letzten Freitag den Violinisten Herrn Henry Such Bach's „Prélude und Fuge" in C-Dur aus des Meisters 5. Sonate für Violine allein und Max Bruch's Zweites Violinkonzert spielen. Der Künstler verfügt über eine gute und theilweise polirte Technik, doch ist seine Intonation vorderhand zu unsicher, um dauerndes Behagen aufkommen zu lassen.

Im gestrigen Sonntags-Konzert des Metropolitan Opera House trat der neuengagirte Tenor Herr Sciaretti zum ersten Mal auf und errang namentlich nach dem temperamentvollen, klangschönen Vortrag von Verdi's "La donna è mobile" einen sehr warmen Erfolg. Das Publikum rief ihn wohl zehnmal und schien sich vorgenommen zu haben, die eiserne „No Encores"-Regel sprengen zu wollen, was aber nicht gelang. Der Sänger hat eine klangvolle, schön timbrirte und gut ausgebildete Tenorstimme und singt mit viel Geschmack, so daß es interessant wäre, ihn einmal eine dramatische Partie versuchen zu lassen. Sonst wirkten noch die Damen Morena und Flahaut und die Herren Hinckley und Hinshaw verdienstlich mit. Das Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Pasternack spielte mehrere Piècen sehr annehmbar.

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date

Music

PERHAPS, with the holiday mood of gladness and jollity approaching perhaps with the spirit of this time of year already in possession of your mind, it would hardly be well to strike any harmonic undertone of sadness.

Yet, perhaps you may pause a moment, and dally with reality, in spite of all the too Yuletidy gayety that is in the air. For there is to be a passing consideration of Peter Tschaikowsky and his fifth symphony, which was played last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and neither Tschaikowsky nor this symphony of his could be considered in any manner approaching gayety.

Tschaikowsky's life was lived beneath a pall of inward and introspective sadness. The futility of many things was an ever conscious substratum of thought with him. His own Russia passed him by, and only the veriest few saw the fire of genius in his work while he was still alive.

The fifth symphony is almost unrelieved sadness. At its very beginning there is published a theme significant of the grip of futility, and ever afterward, throughout the whole four movements of the work, this theme recurs at pregnant moments.

One hears the struggle to escape from this fateful conscious futility and its failure; a beautiful yearning melody sings its way through the second movement, but again the chief theme, with the force of the inevitable, sets the yearning aspiration at naught; a mockery of gayety in the third movement takes the form of a waltz, but once more the original theme floats into it from afar off toward the end. And in the finale still there is no escape for the sorely troubled spirit.

The orchestra, under Max Fiedler, played the symphony with such great skill and such beautiful insight into its meaning that the impression made on the great audience should be a lasting one.

Josef Hofmann played Beethoven's entrancing fourth piano concerto. Adjectives are no longer necessary in speaking of this great interpretative artist. It suffices to say merely that Hofmann played the concerto.

The rest of the symphony programme consisted of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and Brahms's Academic overture, both played with brilliant effectiveness by the orchestra.

STANDARD UNION BROOKLYN, N. Y.

ess

Every article in [illegible] at a discount of [illegible] that you can buy

Less than W[illegible]

Chester Billings

5th Avenue at 34th Str[illegible]

Furs for H[illegible]

C. G. Gunt[illegible]

Establis[illegible]

F U

Long and medium
Broadtail, Persian La[illegible]
Caracul, etc.

called Russian, for the second number will be Rubinstein's "Concerto" in D minor, No. 4, which will be played by that great master's greatest pupil, Josef Hofmann. If Rubinstein had few of those qualities in his music which mark the Russians of the school of Tschaikowsky and his followers, he must none the less be classed among the great Russian composers, not merely because that was the country of his nativity, but because of the enormous influence he exerted in that country during his life. When Hofmann gave up his career as a "wonder child," he went directly to Rubinstein and was taught by him up to the time of Rubinstein's death, and if there is any one who approaches Rubinstein's performance of this splendid concerto, it is this modest, quiet, young Pole, who has rapidly forged to the front as one of the very few really great pianists of the world. The final number on the programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date DEC 11 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Josef Hofmann Plays Liszt's E Flat Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée at Carnegie Hall yesterday resulted in the cheering condition of "standing room only." The programme listed Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," Lizst's E flat piano concerto, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. This was a feast of delightful music. The Dvorak symphony was recently played by the People's Symphony Society, but it is a work which ought to be heard often, if only to cheer up those who become depressed by the outpour of acrid modern music. It is lovely, simple and melonious from beginning to end.

As for the Strauss tone poem, there are some who hold it to be the best composition which the great realist has given us. Whether that be true or not, it is certain that it is a brilliant, picturesque and interesting piece of music and that it affords abundant scope for the display of the best qualities of the Boston orchestra.

The solo performer was again Josef Hofmann, whose performance of the Liszt concerto was a thing of beauty. His clear, delicate and fluent enunciation of the rippling passages, and his broad, vigorous and opulent utterance of the mass effects aroused the audience to real enthusiasm. The concerto is a virtuoso piece, but it can be played with musical taste and intelligence, and these were what Mr. Hofmann brought to its interpretation.

Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 30 1910

Women attendants at Boston Symphony concerts, some of them, at least, have been in the habit of wearing their hats at the recitals, and this in spite of the command by Mayor Fitzgerald that the hats should be removed. Certain women paid no heed to the mayor's request, whereupon the doughty mayor approached the management and declared that, if his injunction was not obeyed he would see that the license for the hall should be cancelled. The management, thereupon, inforced the order, presenting printed requests and having them handed to owners of the non-removable hats. Some women obeyed at once, but others went to the rear of the hall and remained standing there. But the order was inforced in the seats.

From AMERICAN

Address New York City.

Date DEC 11

HOFMANN SOLOIST WITH BOSTONIANS

Large Audience in Carnegie Hall Greets Brilliant Playing with Loud Applause.

At its second concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra again presented Josef Hofmann as soloist, and there was an undeniable look of satisfaction on the faces of the large audience when he made his appearance.

While the entire programme was interesting, the attention of the house was centred on the Liszt concerto in which Hofmann played the piano part. This particular concerto (E flat major) appears to be a favorite of the pianists who have appeared with the Boston orchestra, for it has been played by almost all of them, from Paderewski, Rosenthal and De Pachmann to Adele Margulies, Julia Rive-King and Olga Sumaroff.

However, it is doubtful if any of these artists has given a more brilliant reading than was heard yesterday. Hofmann managed the difficulties with a facility that might have denoted indifference and produced tones that suggested the softness of a 'cello or the singing of a flute. When he finished there was great enthusiasm, and he returned to the stage again and again to acknowledge the prolonged applause.

The orchestra opened the concert with Dvorak's "New World" symphony, which it gave for the first time in seven years. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the Bohemian's tribute to America was full of exquisite shading, careful and well-judged emphasis and symmetrical phrasing. Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3, completed the programme.

STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City.

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Kecker Humor war gerade nicht eine der charakteristischen Eigenschaften von Johannes Brahms' Künstlerschaft, aber der „Akademischen Fest-Ouverture" ist ungeachtet ihres überwiegend ernsten Inhalts doch ein Abglanz der fröhlich-derben Studentenzeit eigen. Dazu tragen die von Brahms benützten Studentenlieder natürlich am Meisten bei; diese feuchtfröhlichen Gesänge erregen immer Behagen, lösen häufig Jugenderinnerungen aus und verleihen dem Stück, mit dem Brahms für die Verleihung des Doktortitels der Breslauer Universität dankte, ein anheimelndes Gepräge. Auch gestern wirkten diese Citate stark, und als zum Schluß, von den Violinfiguren in Zweiunddreißigstel von den Bässen kontrapunktlich gehoben, das Bläserchor mit den dröhnenden Posaunen als das schwere Geschütz „Gaudeamus igitur" anstimmte, da war der Effekt ein großer.

Die meisterhafteste Leistung der gestrigen Veranstaltung aber war Tschaikowsky's Fünfte Symphonie, die Herr Fiedler mit strammem Rhythmus und weitausgreifendem Temperament dirigirte. Das unterdrückte Feuer, die Hoffnungslosigkeit im ersten Satz, die erst gegen Schluß einem Hoffnungsschimmer Platz macht, die weite Skala der Dynamit vom dröhnendsten Forte bis zum verflüchtigsten Pianissimo machte gewaltigen Effekt. Traumverloren, wie die weite Steppe, erschien der zweite Satz mit dem schwermüthigen Klagegesang (welch' herrliche Kantilene des Horns und der Klarinette), wogegen das Scherzo in Anmuth und zarter Melodik des reizvollen Walzers erstrahlte. Das gewaltige Ringen des Schlußsatzes gelangte ungemein breit und wuchtig zum Ausdruck, und der glänzende E-Dur-Schluß der Trompeten, deren Kraft bei aller künstlerischer Beherrschung gestern geradezu pompös und ungemein klang, brachte die Wirkung zum Höhepunkt. Begeistert klang der Beifall durch den bis zur Fassungskraft gefüllten Saal.

Glanz und Freude, auf welchen Grundton das gestrige Konzert gestimmt war, kam auch in der koloristisch ungemein scharf und genau gebrachten „Carneval Romain"-Ouverture von Berlioz zur Geltung, wenn wir uns auch das Tempo noch fortdrängender denken konnten. Wieder müssen wir hier der wundervollen Blechbläser gedenken, welche namentlich die schwierigen Staktatt in lockendem Festesglanz brachten.

Als Solist spielte Herr Joseph Hofmann mit Orchesterbegleitung Beethoven's 4. Piano-Konzert, und zwar mit einer reifen Kunst und Selbstbeherrschung, die Bewunderung entfesseln mußte. Es war ein wirkliches Zwiegespräch des Pianos mit dem Orchester, das die köstlichsten Nuancen vermittelte. Hofmann wurde enthusiastisch gefeiert.

H.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date DEC 9 - 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony Played—Josef Hofmann Soloist.

There was nothing new, strange, or debatable on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert, which it gave last evening in Carnegie Hall. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, and Brahms's "Academic" overture were the orchestral numbers. Joseph Hofmann was the soloist, who played Beethoven's G-major concerto for the piano. Had Mr. Fiedler been informed that the Philharmonic Society had played Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in the same hall only a little while before, and would he have played some other? Only a deep student of the manners and customs of conductors could solve this problem.

Whether he knew the fact or not the course he actually took satisfied his hearers greatly; for there is rarely so much enthusiasm shown over an orchestral performance as was called forth by this one. Mr. Fiedler very justly shared the applause that was bestowed upon it with the members of the orchestra, whom he summoned to rise in a body and acknowledge it with him. It was, indeed, a very fine performance, in which the glowing richness, warmth, and transparency of the orchestra's tone, even in the most massive climaxes, appeared in their perfection, and its perfect certainty and precision gave a clearness of articulation to the complicated structure of many passages where melodies are intertwined and overlaid, and where obscurity is fatal to the composer's effect. Mr. Fiedler took the symphony throughout with even more than "a certain license" in the matter of tempo that the composer not only authorizes, but directs. He allowed himself much freedom in this matter; and freedom even to such an extent is not misplaced in this work. There were splendid sonority and gorgeous color in the performance, and its appeal to the audience was immediate.

Mr. Hofmann played Beethoven's concerto with consummate mastery and the purest artistic beauty; with an obvious affection and tenderness for the gracious and poetic charm of the work, which are as fresh and unfaded to-day as when it came from the composer's hand more than a century ago. Delicacy and crystalline purity of tone and exquisite nuance in the treatment of phrase and passage were unfailing in Mr. Hofmann's playing, which was filled with sentiment of the most intimate sort. Such a performance does not excite to turbulent enthusiasm; yet it clearly touched and delighted the audience profoundly, for Mr. Hofmann was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge applause.

The orchestra's playing of the two overtures that began and ended the concert was brilliant and substantial.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau

Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 10 1910

MUSICAL.

Second Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra Brings a New Symphony.

A new orchestral work of importance among modern compositions was offered at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series last night. It was the Symphony in E minor, the second work of this class, by Rachmaninoff, the Russian contemporary composer, and had a hearing in this country a year ago, and at the November concert of the Boston Orchestra in Manhattan. The symphony is in the usual four movements, and while modern in spirit, it is conservative as to form. The composer has seemed to work with the viewpoint that musical value lies more in the quality and worth of ideas rather than in radical departure from approved standard lines of procedure in making these ideas known. Rachmaninoff has confessed to a veneration for Tschaikowsky, and this symphony is a sort of confession of it, a reflection of that romantic feeling of which Tschaikowsky was a most distinguished exponent. The symphony heard last night is, however, a composition of definite and original merit, with ideas of its own, well brought out, with a beautiful adagio as a third movement. Mr. Fiedler conducted its performance, and with players responded, with a careful regard for bringing out its every significance.

Another feature of the concert of particular interest was Josef Hofmann's playing with the orchestra of Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, and once again this pianist gave an exhibition of polished refinement in execution and authoritative mastery of interpretation that gave great pleasure to his hearers. The concert closed with the performance of the Beethoven "Leonore" Overture No. 3.

om EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

The next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at both, playing the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4, at the first and the Liszt concerto in E flat major, No. 1, at the second. The rest of the programme on Thursday will consist of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. On Saturday afternoon Conductor Max Fiedler will play Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3.

[106]

m STAATS ZEITUNG

dress New York City.

te

Konzerte.

Das Samstags-Konzert der Bostoner hatte einen ganz gefüllten Saal in Carnegie Hall gezogen und entfesselte lebhaften Beifall. Das Orchester spielte unter Herrn Fiedler's Leitung die Dvorak'sche „Neue Welt"-Symphonie, die „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3 und Strauß' „Tod und Verklärung" in der üblichen klangprächtigen und künstlerischen Weise. Der Solist war Herr Joseph Hofmann, der Liszt's Erstes Piano-Concert zu höchster Wirkung brachte. Hofmann steht heute bekanntlich als emotioneller und bravouröser Spieler ebenso hoch, denn als tief eindringender und geistig ausschöpfender. Kein Wunder, wenn er hinreißend wirkte und enthusiastisch gefeiert wurde.

Das Wagner-Konzert der N. Y. Symphonie-Gesellschaft hatte kein allzu großes Publikum nach dem New Theatre gelockt. Die Anwesenden aber unterhielten sich sehr gut, denn Herr Walter Damrosch hatte mit seinem Wagner-Programm viel Glück. Die Excerpte aus „Rienzi", „Meistersinger", „Rheingold", „Siegfried", „Tannhäuser" und „Parsifal", die Herr Damrosch mit geschickter Hand ausgewählt hatte, machten große Wirkung und wurden lebhaft beklatscht.

In Mendelssohn Hall hörten wir letzten Freitag den Violinisten Herrn Henry Such Bach's „Prélude und Fuge" in C-Dur aus des Meisters 5. Sonate für Violine allein und Max Bruch's Zweites Violinkonzert spielen. Der Künstler verfügt über eine gute und theilweise polirte Technik, doch ist seine Intonation vorderhand zu unsicher, um dauerndes Behagen aufkommen zu lassen.

Im gestrigen Sonntags-Konzert des Metropolitan Opera House trat der neuengagirte Tenor Herr Sciaretti zum ersten Mal auf und errang namentlich nach dem temperamentvollen, klangschönen Vortrag von Verdi's "La donna è mobile" einen sehr warmen Erfolg. Das Publikum rief ihn wohl zehnmal und schien sich vorgenommen zu haben, die eiserne „No Encores"-Regel sprengen zu wollen, was aber nicht gelang. Der Sänger hat eine klangvolle, schön timbrirte und gut ausgebildete Tenorstimme und singt mit viel Geschmack, so daß es interessant wäre, ihn einmal eine dramatische Partie versuchen zu lassen. Sonst wirkten noch die Damen Morena und Flahaut und die Herren Hinckley und Hinshaw verdienstlich mit. Das Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Pasternack spielte mehrere Piècen sehr annehmbar.

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date

Music

PERHAPS, with the holiday mood of gladness and jollity approaching perhaps with the spirit of this time of year already in possession of your mind, it would hardly be well to strike any harmonic undertone of sadness.

Yet, perhaps you may pause a moment, and dally with reality, in spite of all the too Yuletidy gayety that is in the air. For there is to be a passing consideration of Peter Tschaikowsky and his fifth symphony, which was played last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and neither Tschaikowsky nor this symphony of his could be considered in any manner approaching gayety.

Tschaikowsky's life was lived beneath a pall of inward and introspective sadness. The futility of many things was an ever conscious substratum of thought with him. His own Russia passed him by, and only the veriest few saw the fire of genius in his work while he was still alive.

The fifth symphony is almost unrelieved sadness. At its very beginning there is published a theme significant of the grip of futility, and ever afterward, throughout the whole four movements of the work, this theme recurs at pregnant moments.

One hears the struggle to escape from this fateful conscious futility and its failure; a beautiful yearning melody sings its way through the second movement, but again the chief theme, with the force of the inevitable, sets the yearning aspiration at naught; a mockery of gayety in the third movement takes the form of a waltz, but once more the original theme floats into it from afar off toward the end. And in the finale still there is no escape for the sorely troubled spirit.

The orchestra, under Max Fiedler, played the symphony with such great skill and such beautiful insight into its meaning that the impression made on the great audience should be a lasting one.

Josef Hofmann played Beethoven's entrancing fourth piano concerto. Adjectives are no longer necessary in speaking of this great interpretative artist. It suffices to say merely that Hofmann played the concerto.

The rest of the symphony programme consisted of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and Brahms's Academic overture, both played with brilliant effectiveness by the orchestra.

STANDARD UNION BROOKLYN, N. Y.

ess

e DEC 4 1910

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season on Friday evening, Dec. 9, at the Academy, Brooklyn will hear that famous band-play Rachmaninoff's "Second Symphony," which, as played by the Boston Symphony and interpreted by Conductor Max Fiedler, has been by all odds the musical sensation of the present season. Not since Tschaikowsky gave his "Pathetic" to the world has any symphony made such an impression on music lovers of all classes. This is all the more interesting because Tschaikowsky was a Russian, as is Rachmaninoff, and Rachmaninoff was a pupil of the great master. Moreover, Rachmaninoff frankly admits that Tschaikowsky is for him the ideal figure among moderns. It is significant, too, in connection with the extraordinary succes that has been given to the symphony, that Rachmaninoff, while full of modern spirit, has found expression for that in the classical form, and has not found it necessary to resort to strange and bizarre modes of utterance to attain his end. His melodic invention is of a very high order, and none of the modern writers for orchestra is a greater master of the various idioms of the different instruments employed than this serious Russian, who, just a year ago, was soloist with the Boston Symphony. Because of his mastery of this part of his art, his symphony "sounds" as very few modern works do, and no work in the repertory of the Boston Orchestra reveals to such a degree the wondrous tonal beauties it is capable of. The programme, in fact, might almost be called Russian, for the second number will be Rubinstein's "Concerto" in D minor, No. 4, which will be played by that great master's greatest pupil, Josef Hofmann. If Rubinstein had few of those qualities in his music which mark the Russians of the school of Tschaikowsky and his followers, he must none the less be classed among the great Russian composers, not merely because that was the country of his nativity, but because of the enormous influence he exerted in that country during his life. When Hofmann gave up his career as a "wonder child," he went directly to Rubinstein and was taught by him up to the time of Rubinstein's death, and if there is any one who approaches Rubinstein's performance of this splendid concerto, it is this modest, quiet, young Pole, who has rapidly forged to the front as one of the very few really great pianists of the world. The final number on the programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

m SUN

dress New York City.

te DEC 1 1 1910

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Josef Hofmann Plays Liszt's E Flat Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée at Carnegie Hall yesterday resulted in the cheering condition of "standing room only." The programme listed Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," Lizst's E flat piano concerto, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. This was a feast of delightful music. The Dvorak symphony was recently played by the People's Symphony Society, but it is a work which ought to be heard often, if only to cheer up those who become depressed by the outpour of acrid modern music. It is lovely, simple and melodious from beginning to end.

As for the Strauss tone poem, there are some who hold it to be the best composition which the great realist has given us. Whether that be true or not, it is certain that it is a brilliant, picturesque and interesting piece of music and that it affords abundant scope for the display of the best qualities of the Boston orchestra.

The solo performer was again Josef Hofmann, whose performance of the Liszt concerto was a thing of beauty. His clear, delicate and fluent enunciation of the rippling passages, and his broad, vigorous and opulent utterance of the mass effects aroused the audience to real enthusiasm. The concerto is a virtuoso piece, but it can be played with musical taste and intelligence, and these were what Mr. Hofmann brought to its interpretation.

Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 30 1910

Women attendants at Boston Symphony concerts, some of them, at least, have been in the habit of wearing their hats at the recitals, and this in spite of the command by Mayor Fitzgerald that the hats should be removed. Certain women paid no heed to the mayor's request, whereupon the doughty mayor approached the management and declared that, if his injunction was not obeyed he would see that the license for the hall should be cancelled. The management, thereupon, inforced the order, presenting printed requests and having them handed to owners of the non-removable hats. Some women obeyed at once, but others went to the rear of the hall and remained standing there. But the order was inforced in the seats.

m EVE. POST

ress Chicago, Ill.

DEC 1

HATS AT THE CONCERT.

We have received from one of our readers a note inclosing a copy of a modest pale-blue "dodger" that was inserted in the programs of last week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The "dodger" reads solemnly as follows:

His honor the mayor has notified the management of Symphony Hall that unless the law relating to the wearing of hats by ladies at public entertainments is obeyed at the Symphony rehearsals and concerts he may be forced to revoke the license of Symphony Hall.

This would mean the end of the Boston Symphony concerts.

It is hoped that the ladies who patronize these concerts will come to the aid of the management in this matter.

The law will be strictly enforced.

Our correspondent, after confessing that he does not attend the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, suggests that it might be a good thing to get Mayor Busse to apply to those audiences the same corrective measure which Mayor Fitzgerald applies in Boston with such sad firmness.

The cool courage of this proposal can be due only to the admission of inexperience which precedes it. Should our correspondent go but once to a Friday afternoon concert in Orchestra Hall he would understand that neither Mayor Busse, the President of the United States nor the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court would be in the least efficacious in forcing the removal of hats. Even Colonel Steward might fail—though we are not quite so sure about that as we used to be.

For the Friday concert is a good deal more than a musical performance. It is a sacred social rite. The Thomas Orchestra is a solemn enough symbol to Chicago, goodness knows. If anyone ever jumps on us for any sin, we draw back, fold our hands and stand inviolably pat on the establishment of "the orchestra." And when there is joined to this great tradition an iron-clod, brick-lined, copper-riveted law of attendance for all Society, even the rank outsider must see that the Friday afternoon rehearsal takes rank by itself as an Institution.

It is an Institution governed on an aristo-democratic basis like that of the old Greek Republics. That is, it is run by that powerful influence called "a gentlemen's agreement"—a term that is so exact technically as to excuse a little inexactness in gender when applied to the present case. The "understanding" is this: Every woman keeps her own hat on because every other woman does; there are not enough men present to bother about; it is simply a case of every woman's saving an annoying effort at the cost of a little inconvenience to a very few.

Besides, everyone wants to see everyone else's hat.

This combination is unbeatable, as has been discovered by a long line of musical critics who have broken a lance against it. Nor should we lose sight of the purely incidental fact that the uncompromising music-lovers who sit in the first rows of the balcony have discovered that our "Big Hat" theater ordinance does not apply in the remotest degree to concert halls. What "Honey Fitz" did, "Unser Fritz" could not do, no matter how deeply he might be moved by our prayers or those of our correspondent.

m Daily Citizen,

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

e DEC 10 1910

Josef Hofmann, who gave his third recital of the year recently in Carnegie Hall, began a tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, and will play twelve concerts with that organization to be given in various cities. At the completion of this brief engagement, on Dec. 17, he will go to his estate at Aiken, S. C., where he will remain until Jan. 28, when he will continue his American tour, which will take him as far west as the Pacific Coast.

Mischa Elman, the violinist, will sail from Europe the middle of this month that he may spend the Christmas holidays in this city. His first American concert of the season will take place in Providence on Jan. 2, when he is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be heard twice with that organization at concerts to be given in this city, and will also play here at two of the Sunday night concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House. Because of his many out of town engagements, some of which will take him into portions of Canada never before visited by a musician of first rank, Elman will be heard [illegible] violin recital in New York.

WORLD

ss New York City.

HOFMANN SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Tschaikowsky Symphony and Beethoven Concerto Features of the Programme.

By Reginald de Koven.

I never hear Berlioz, whose "Carneval Romaine" overture opened the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, without thinking what an astonishing man he must have been in and to his day and generation. Even to-day this overture, intended for an introduction to the second act of the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," with its lively salterello and brilliant orchestral coloring, sounds absolutely fresh and modern, and, as played last night, most effective.

But as W. S. Gilbert sagely remarks: "And isn't the day exceedingly long where all goes right and nothing goes wrong?" so it is almost a relief to intermit the regular pean of praise one sings about the Boston Orchestra. I never heard this generally incomparable body of musicians play in a manner more nearly ragged in its lack of absolute precision and oneness of feeling than in the first movement of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, which followed. Besides which the horns were uncertain and the bassoons, in the waltz, distinctly throaty, and there were also times when Mr. Fiedler did not have his men seemingly entirely with him, as at the opening of the finale.

Although I did not altogether like Mr. Fiedler's tempi in the two first movements, and thought his reading not always entirely lucid and too prone to alternate rapidly between deep gloom and febrile energy, the performance on the whole, and especially in the last two movements, was so forcible and impressive that the audience was moved to prolonged applause, the entire orchestra finally rising in response. The climax of the finale, as I thought, seemed to start in at the beginning and last all the way through.

The Beethoven A major concerto, No. 4, with its singular reminiscence of the "Appassionta" sonata in the first movement, its strong and varied andante and rollicking rondo—so much and undeservedly less familiar than the "Emperor" in E flat—was played by Hofmann with a beauty of tone, brilliance and delicacy of execution and a combined sentiment and classic fervor which carried everything before it.

Beethoven wrote three cadenzas for this concerto, not published until after his death. Which of these Hofmann played at the end of the first movement I am not certain, but probably the one marked Cadenza (ma senza cadere), as being the most difficult, though technical difficulties mean nothing to him after all. A spirited performance of Brahms's "Academic" overture closed the concert.

ess

e

BIG-HATTED WOMAN PUT OUT OF SYMPHONY HALL.

Escorted to Door of Concert House and Ejected.

BOSTON, Nov. 26.—In spite of the edict of Mayor John F. Fitzgerald that patrons of the Symphony concerts must remove their headgear, a dozen women wore their hats through most of yesterday's program. One woman who refused to remove her hat was escorted out of the hall into Huntington avenue in the rain.

One woman who wore a particularly big hat that was not easy to remove obtained the permission of Manager Ellis to stand at the back of the hall throughout the concert, giving up her reserved seat in row A. A dozen elderly women wore close-fitting bonnets. Twelve women wore large hats during the first half of the concert, and were asked to remove them; six refused. A second request narrowed the offenders to two. Finally one of these took off hers and the other was asked to go.

n EVE. SUN

ress New York City.

DEC 6 - 1910

For the first time since the express strike, the Boston Symphony Orchestra passed south yesterday with 118 pieces of baggage that nearly got lost in the local tieup of transportation last month. Manager C. A. Ellis hopes the season's second tour will be more peaceful.

After playing in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, the Bostonians will return to New York for the rest of the week.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

DEC 4 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, in Carnegie Hall this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, respectively, Conductor Max Fiedler will present nothing to shock the most conservative symphony patrons in New York. Neither programme contains a novelty, and all the works are old and well-tried friends, for even Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" may thus be named in this year of 1910. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who has the distinction of playing at ten consecutive concerts of the symphony orchestra, a compliment that has never been paid to any other virtuoso. On Thursday night Mr. Hofmann will play Beethoven's concert in C major, No. 4, and on Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's concerto to E-flat major, No. 1.

The programme for Thursday evening begins with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, which will be followed by Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, No. 5. After the intermission will come the Beethoven concerto, and the programme will be ended with Brahms's Academic Festival overture.

On Saturday afternoon the programme will begin with Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, which has not been played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in seven years. This will be followed by the Liszt concerto for piano. After the intermission will come Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and the programme will be brought to an end by the Beethoven "Leonora" No. 3 overture.

om HERALD

dress New York City.

ate

NOTED PIANIST TO BE AT INSTITUTE

Mr. Josef Hofmann Will Play at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Many interesting concerts and lectures are announced on the Brooklyn Institute programme for the coming week. Mr. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the second philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday evening, when the programme will be:—Rachmaninoff, symphony in E minor, No. 2; Rubinstein, concerto for piano in D minor, No. 4, and Beethoven, overture "Leonora," No. 3.

Daily Citizen,

ss n, N. Y.

DEC 10 1910

The series of visiting orchestra concerts under the auspices of the Pittsburg Orchestra Association was inaugurated Monday night with a brilliant performance by the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, under the conductorship of Gustav Mahler, the first appearance in Pittsburg of this, the oldest orchestra in America. Soldiers' Memorial Hall was packed to the doors by a representative audience, which manifested its keen interest in the Bach suites, with Mr. Mahler playing the harpsichord while conducting the orchestra. An admirable performance of the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony made a deep impression upon the audience, which was aroused to enthusiasm by the Wagner excerpts, which brought the concert to a dramatic close. The Boston Symphony and the Thomas orchestras are the remaining organizations for the series, the purpose of which is to stimulate musical interest in Pittsburg toward establishing a permanent orchestra of large proportions.

AMERICAN

ess New York City.

Institute Notes

Josef Hofman will be the soloist at the second of this season's Boston Symphony concerts in Brooklyn, which will be given next Friday evening in the opera house of the Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to this borough under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, with the co-operation of an auxiliary board composed of prominent women of the borough.

This week also brings the second concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Walter Damrosch, which will be given next Saturday afternoon in the opera house of the Academy.

MORN. TELEGRAPH

ss New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Walter Damrosch to Give Performance of Pierne's "Children of Bethlehem."

KARL JOERN IN VOCAL RECITAL

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, December 8, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, December 10, at 2.30 respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties whatever on either programme, all of the works to be played being familiar friends. The programme for the Thursday evening concert is as follows:

Berlioz—Overture, "The Roman Carnival."
Tschaikowsky—Symphony in E Minor No. 5.
Beethoven—Concerto for Piano in C Major No. 4.
Brahms—Overture, "Academic."
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is:

Dvorak—Symphony in E Minor No. 5, "From the New World."
Liszt—Concerto for Piano in E Flat Major No. 1.
Strauss—Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Beethoven—Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

e

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season on Friday evening, December 9, Brooklyn will hear that famous band play Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, which as played by the Boston Symphony and interpreted by Conductor Max Fiedler, is mentioned as a noteworthy orchestral feature of the season. Reports of the performance of the work elsewhere is to the effect that not since Tschaikowsky gave his "Pathetic" to the world has any Symphony made such an impression on music lovers of all classes. This is all the more interesting because Tschaikowsky was a Russian as is Rachmaninoff, and Rachmaninoff was a pupil of the great master. Moreover, Rachmaninoff frankly admits that Tschaikowsky is for him the ideal figure among moderns. The programme, in fact, might almost be called Russian for the second number will be Rubinstein's Concerto in D Minor, No. 4, which will be played by that great master's greatest pupil, Josef Hofmann. When Hofmann gave up his career as a "wonder child," he went directly to Rubinstein and was taught by him up to the time of Rubinstein's death, and if there is any one who approaches Rubinstein's performance of this splendid concerto, it is this modest, quiet, young Pole, who has rapidly forged to the front as one of the very few really great pianists of the world. The final number on the programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

m EVE. POST.

ress New York City.

1910

e

Hofmann and the Boston Orchestra.

The most enjoyable thing at last night's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Josef Hofmann's playing of Beethoven's fourth concerto, particularly in the divinely beautiful slow movement, which the Polish pianist played as if the composer himself from the spiritual world were guiding his hands.

Mr. Fiedler and his players were at their best in Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" and Brahms's "Academic" overture. Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, on the other hand, was not so well played, from either a technical or an emotional point of view, as it has been repeatedly in the same hall by our Philharmonic Orchestra, under Safonoff and Mahler—yes, Mahler. The same Mahler who once left so much to be desired in his interpretation of the Pathétique gave an inspired and memorable performance of the fifth the other day, which brought tears to the eyes in the exquisite andante cantabile. Last night this melody—almost unequalled for loveliness in symphonic literature—did not make the usual impression on those who love it most; and in the other movements the Slavic fire and impetuosity were often missing. Yet the applause was tremendous. The Boston Symphony audiences often show a strange lack of discrimination. Never in the history of this orchestra in New York was there less reason to ask the men to get up and acknowledge the applause. They were decidedly not at their best in this symphony. Nor was the conductor.

[107]

NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... NEW YORK REVIEW

Address ..... DEC - 1910

Date .....

In Boston the most famous and impeccable of American orchestras continues its highly prized ministrations. Mr. Fiedler, who is again the robust, the untamed and untamable, master of Mr. Higginson's men, has already got well into his stride for the new season. The programme which he has planned for the winter's work contains a number of promising new works. He will play (or will already have played when these notes appear), the "Macbeth" of Strauss, the "Appalachia," "Dance Rhapsody," and "In a Summer Garden" of Delius, three Dramatic Dances by Granville Bantock, the Englishman, and one of Mr. Mahler's portentous and heaven-storming symphonies. The Boston Orchestra rejoices in a new concert-master, Anton Witek, a Bohemian, who has served as concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic.

SUN

m .....

ress ..... New York City.

e ..... DEC 4 - 1910

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, December 10, at 2:30 respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties whatever on either programme, all of the works to be played being familiar friends. The programme for the Thursday evening concert is as follows:

Berlioz.....Overture, "The Roman Carnival"
Tschaikowsky.....Symphony in E Minor No. 5
Beethoven.Concerto for Piano in G Major No. 4
Brahms.....Overture, "Academic"
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Dvorak..Symphony in E Minor No. 5, "From the New World"
Liszt.....Concerto for piano in E flat Major No. 1
Strauss.Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"
Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonora," No. 3
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

AMERICAN

n .....

ress ..... New York City.

4 - 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, and on Saturday afternoon, December 10, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties whatever on either programme, all of the works to be played being familiar friends. The programme for the Thursday evening concert will include: Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Tschaikowsky's symphony in E-minor (No. 5); Beethoven's concerto for piano in C-major (No. 4), and Brahms's "Academic" overture. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be composed of Dvorak's symphony in E-minor (No. 5), "From the New World"; Liszt's concerto for piano in E-flat major (No. 1); Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's "Leonora," (No. 3), overture.

HERALD

New York City.

BROOKLYN DAILY

DEC 10 1910

Regular subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in this borough and many others were present last evening at the Academy of Music for the second concert of this season, under the leadership of Mr. Max Fiedler.

The programme was one of exceptional merit. The soloist was Mr. Josef Hofmann. The latter was heard in Rubinstein's concerto, in D minor, No. 4, for piano and orchestra. The rest of the programme consisted of two compositions, symphony in E minor, No. 2, by Rachmaninoff and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3, which concluded the concert.

TRIBUNE

s ..... New York City.

DEC 7 - 1910

IN WASHINGTON SOCIETY.

[From The Tribune Bureau.]

Washington, D[illegible] 6.—Miss Helen Taft was the guest of honor at a dinner party to-night, with Mr. and Mrs. George Whitfield Brown as hosts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra filled the New National with a distinguished audience this afternoon. Besides the box occupied by Mrs. Taft and her party, the holders were Mrs. L. Z. Leiter, who was accompanied by Mme. Jusserand; the Rev. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith and Mrs. Roland Cotton Smith, Mrs. John R. Williams and Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Miss Mae Williams, who had with her Mrs. Ballinger and other guests and the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon. A number of other diplomats and persons from resident and official society were in the audience.

From EVE. TELEGRAM

Address ..... New York City.

Date ..... DEC 9 1910

At Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler, was heard in a remarkably interesting programme. The Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, played with all the breadth of tone and wealth of contrast which this master work demands, was the principal offering of the evening.

Josef Hofmann, the soloist, played Beethoven's concerto in G major with a noteworthy precision of tone and a splendid sense of the composer's meaning. Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," as opening, and Brahms' academic Festival overture as the closing number, each played in a manner that would have gratified the respective composers could they have heard, completed a programme which was as eclectic as it was delightful.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

EVE. SUN

n .....

ress ..... New York City.

DEC 9 - 1910

When Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra come to town next week, Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening the pianist will play Beethoven's concerto No. 4, in G major, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's concerto No. 1 in E flat major.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" and Brahms's "Academic" overtures fill the Bostonians' Thursday bill.

Dvorak's "New World" symphony shares the Saturday matinée with Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration."

Brooklyn on Friday hears Rachmaninoff's Second symphony and, with Hofmann, a concerto of Rubinstein.

WORLD

New York City.

DEC 4 - 1910

Boston Symphony.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Director Fiedler has placed no novelties whatever on either programme, all of the works to be played being familiar friends. The programme for the Thursday evening concert is as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Symphony in E minor No. 5.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano in G major No. 4...Beethoven
Overture, "Academic".....Brahms

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Symphony in E minor No. 5, "From the New World".....Dvorak
Concerto for piano in E flat major, No. 1..Liszt
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"..Strauss
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.....Beethoven

---

om MORN. TELEGRAPH

ddress ..... New York City.

ate .....

The Boston Orchestra played their second concert of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday night. Josef Hofmann accompanied the orchestra at the piano. The symphony played was Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, which was interpreted for the first time in this city last season by the Philadelphia Orchestra. The symphony is in four movements and is quite modern in treatment. Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, was given much applause, which compelled Mr. Fiedler and the entire orchestra to acknowledge it by standing and bowing. In solo numbers Mr. Hofmann demonstrated his wonderful powers at the piano. They included Beethoven's Concerto in G minor, No. 4, which was enthusiastically received. The concert concluded with Beethoven's familiar overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

WORLD

ess ..... New York City.

DEC 4 - 1910

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Friday evening in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, by all odds the greatest pianist now in America. He will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, No. 4. This should be more than ordinarily interesting. Hofmann is the greatest of Rubinstein's pupils and no one plays this concerto so nearly like the master as does this young Pole.

PRESS

ss ..... New York City.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, December 10, at 2.30, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Fiedler has placed no novelties whatever on either programme, all of the works to be played being familiar friends. Here is the programme for the Thursday evening concert: Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Tschaikowsky, Symphony in E Minor No. 5; Beethoven, concerto for piano, in G major, No. 4; Brahms, overture, "Academia." Saturday afternoon's programme will comprise Dvorak's symphony in E minor No. 5, "From the New World"; Liszt's concerto for piano in E flat major, No. 1; Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

TELEGRAM

New York City.

DEC 12 1910

AT the matinee performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, Max Fiedler, and the famous organization of which he is conductor, furnished a veritable musical feast. It opened with Dvorak's New World Symphony, played as only the Boston players can, with a superb sonority, and yet with the most delicate effects when the composer indicates them. Mr. Josef Hoffmann was again the soloist in Liszt's E flat concerto, played with absolute mastery of the dashing music, in such marked contrast to the chaste Beethoven concerto which he played with equal mastery a few evenings before. Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and one of the Leonore overtures of Beethoven completed the programme.

From EVE. GLOBE

ddress ..... New York City.

ate ..... DEC 3 - 1910

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at both concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next week. Thursday evening, Dec. 8, the programme will consist of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Beethoven's G major piano concerto, and Brahms's "Academic Overture." For Saturday afternoon, Dec. 10, Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Liszt's piano concerto in E flat, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture are announced.

---

om EVE. MAIL

ress ..... New York City.

e ..... DEC 7 -

The Rachmaninoff symphony will be played once more by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This will be in Brooklyn Friday night, where Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Hofmann will play the Rubinstein concerto and the Leonore overture No. 3 will complete the programme. Carnegie hall is sold out for both Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, when Hofmann will also be the soloist.

From Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address .....

Date ..... DEC 3 1910

Daniel Gregory Mason's fifth Brooklyn Institute lecture recital on "Masters and Masterpieces of Modern Chamber Music," will have Arensky for topic and be illustrated by that composer's Trio, Opus 32, with Leonardo Brill, violin; Paul Kefer, 'cello, and Guiseppe Randegger, piano, as assisting artists. It will take place on Monday evening in the music hall, Academy of Music. On Thursday afternoon, in that hall, Mr. Mason will give the lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic Concert to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening in the opera house of the Academy.

---

ess ..... STANDARD UNION, BROOKLYN, N. Y. DEC 10 1910 church rolls.

Josef Hofmann begins a tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, and will play twelve concerts with that organization to be given in various cities.

HERALD

New York City.

DEC 11 1910

MR. HOFMANN PLAYS AGAIN.

Pianist Delights Great Audience in Concert with Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

With Carnegie Hall crowded to the doors and many persons left in the lobby unable to buy seats, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert there yesterday afternoon. Mr. Josef Hofmann, who had been the soloist with the orchestra on Thursday night, played again and won prolonged applause with his superb playing of Liszt's E flat piano concerto.

He gave a virile interpretation of the heroic work and left out none of its sentimental charm. Nothing but the "no encore" rule saved him from being compelled to play other numbers.

The orchestral part of the programme, conducted by Mr. Max Fiedler, was excellent. It included Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Mr. Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" anda Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture No. 3. All were well played.

TIMES

n .....

ress ..... New York City.

DEC 4 - 1910

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season on Friday evening, Dec. 9, Brooklyn will hear that band play Rachmaninoff's second symphony. The second number will be Rubinstein's concerto in D minor No. 4, which will be played by that master's pupil, Josef Hofmann.

The final number on the programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

SUN

om .....

dress ..... New York City.

te ..... DEC 11 1910

Gustave Mahler conducted the Philharmonic orchestra in a performance of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony on Sunday, November 13. Was that a reason why we had to hear it again from the Boston Symphony orchestra on Thursday, December 8? Was there no time for reflection?

---

n HERALD

ress ..... New York City.

e ..... DEC 4 - 1910

Mr. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the first concert he will play Beethoven's G major piano concerto, while the orchestral programme consists of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and Brahms' "Academic" overture. On Saturday afternoon Mr. Hofmann will play Liszt's E flat major concerto, and Mr. Fiedler will conduct Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, and Mr. Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

From EVE. GLOBE

Address ..... New York City.

Date ..... DEC 12 1910

ANOTHER most enjoyable concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The orchestral pieces were Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. Liszt's piano concerto in E flat was on the programme for the soloist, and in it Josef Hofmann gave a brilliant exhibition of his art. An enormous audience applauded the concert heartily.

---

n EVE. WORLD

ress ..... New York City.

e 2 1910

Josef Hofmann was the soloist in Liszt's first piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, delighting a crowded house by his masterly playing. Mr. Fiedler led the orchestra through a beautiful interpretation of Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3.

NEW YORK

...NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

In Boston the most famous and impeccable of American orchestras continues its highly prized ministrations. Mr. Fiedler, who is again the robust, the untamed and untamable, master of Mr. Higginson's men, has already got well into his stride for the new season. The programme which he has planned for the winter's work contains a number of promising new works. He will play (or will already have played when these notes appear), the "Macbeth" of Strauss, the "Appalachia," "Dance Rhapsody," and "In a Summer Garden" of Delius, three Dramatic Dances by Granville Bantock, the Englishman, and one of Mr. Mahler's portentous and heaven-storming symphonies. The Boston Orchestra rejoices in a new concert-master, Anton Witek, a Bohemian, who has served as concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic.

SUN

m .....

ress New York City.

e .....

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, December 10, at 2:30 respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties whatever on either programme, all of the works to be played being familiar friends. The programme for the Thursday evening concert is as follows:

Berlioz.....Overture, "The Roman Carnival"
Tschaikowsky.....Symphony in E Minor No. 5
Beethoven.Concerto for Piano in G Major No. 4
Brahms.....Overture, "Academic"
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Dvorak..Symphony in E Minor No. 5, "From the New World"
Liszt.....Concerto for piano in E flat Major No. 1
Strauss.Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"
Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonora," No. 3
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

AMERICAN

n .....

New York City.

ress .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, and on Saturday afternoon, December 10, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties whatever on either programme, all of the works to be played being familiar friends. The programme for the Thursday evening concert will include: Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Tschaikowsky's symphony in E-minor (No. 5); Beethoven's concerto for piano in C-major (No. 4), and Brahms's "Academic" overture. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be composed of Dvorak's symphony in E-minor (No. 5), "From the New World"; Liszt's concerto for piano in E-flat major (No. 1); Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's "Leonora," (No. 3), overture.

HERALD

New York City.

Regular subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in this borough and many others were present last evening at the Academy of Music for the second concert of this season, under the leadership of Mr. Max Fiedler.

The programme was one of exceptional merit. The soloist was Mr. Josef Hofmann. The latter was heard in Rubinstein's concerto, in D minor, No. 4, for piano and orchestra. The rest of the programme consisted of two compositions, symphony in E minor, No. 2, by Rachmaninoff and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3, which concluded the concert.

TRIBUNE

s ..... New York City.

DEC 7 - 1910

IN WASHINGTON SOCIETY.

[From The Tribune Bureau.]

Washington, Dec. 6.—Miss Helen Taft was the guest of honor at a dinner party to-night, with Mr. and Mrs. George Whitfield Brown as hosts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra filled the New National with a distinguished audience this afternoon. Besides the box occupied by Mrs. Taft and her party, the holders were Mrs. L. Z. Leiter, who was accompanied by Mme. Jusserand; the Rev. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith and Mrs. Roland Cotton Smith, Mrs. John R. Williams and Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Miss Mae Williams, who had with her Mrs. Ballinger and other guests and the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon. A number of other diplomats and persons from resident and official society were in the audience.

From EVE. TELEGRAM

Address New York City.

Date DEC 9 1910

At Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler, was heard in a remarkably interesting programme. The Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, played with all the breadth of tone and wealth of contrast which this master work demands, was the principal offering of the evening.

Josef Hoffmann, the soloist, played Beethoven's concerto in G major with a noteworthy precision of tone and a splendid sense of the composer's meaning. Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," as opening, and Brahms' academic Festival overture as the closing number, each played in a manner that would have gratified the respective composers could they have heard, completed a programme which was as eclectic as it was delihgtful.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

EVE. SUN

n .....

New York City.

ress .....

DEC 3 - 1910

When Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra come to town next week, Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening the pianist will play Beethoven's concerto No. 4, in G major, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's concerto No. 1 in E flat major.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" and Brahms's "Academic" overtures fill the Bostonians' Thursday bill.

Dvorak's "New World" symphony shares the Saturday matinée with Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration."

Brooklyn on Friday hears Rachmaninoff's Second symphony and, with Hofmann, a concerto of Rubinstein.

WORLD

New York City.

DEC 4 - 1910

Boston Symphony.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Director Fiedler has placed no novelties whatever on either programme, all of the works to be played being familiar friends. The programme for the Thursday evening concert is as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Symphony in E minor No. 5.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano in G major No. 4..Beethoven
Overture, "Academic".....Brahms

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Symphony in E minor No. 5, "From the New World".....Dvorak
Concerto for piano in E flat major, No. 1..Liszt
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"..Strauss
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

om MORN. TELEGRAPH

ldress ..... New York City.

ate .....

The Boston Orchestra played their second concert of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday night. Josef Hofmann accompanied the orchestra at the piano. The symphony played was Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, which was interpreted for the first time in this city last season by the Philadelphia Orchestra. The symphony is in four movements and is quite modern in treatment. Max Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, was given much applause, which compelled Mr. Fiedler and the entire orchestra to acknowledge it by standing and bowing. In solo numbers Mr. Hofmann demonstrated his wonderful powers at the piano. They included Beethoven's Concerto in G minor, No. 4, which was enthusiastically received. The concert concluded with Beethoven's familiar overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

WORLD

ss ..... New York City.

DEC 4 - 1910

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Friday evening in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, by all odds the greatest pianist now in America. He will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, No. 4. This should be more than ordinarily interesting. Hofmann is the greatest of Rubinstein's pupils and no one plays this concerto so nearly like the master as does this young Pole.

PRESS

ess ..... New York City.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 8, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, December 10, at 2.30, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. Fiedler has placed no novelties whatever on either programme, all of the works to be played being familiar friends. Here is the programme for the Thursday evening concert: Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Tschaikowsky, Symphony in E Minor No. 5; Beethoven, concerto for piano, in G major, No. 4; Brahms, overture, "Academic." Saturday afternoon's programme will comprise Dvorak's symphony in E minor No. 5, "From the New World"; Liszt's concerto for piano in E flat major, No. 1; Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

TELEGRAM

New York City.

...ic of Dvorak

AT the matinee performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, Max Fiedler, and the famous organization of which he is conductor, furnished a veritable musical feast. It opened with Dvorak's New World Symphony, played as only the Boston players can, with a superb sonority, and yet with the most delicate effects when the composer indicates them. Mr. Josef Hoffmann was again the soloist in Liszt's E flat concerto, played with absolute mastery of the dashing music, in such marked contrast to the chaste Beethoven concerto which he played with equal mastery a few evenings before. Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and one of the Leonore overtures of Beethoven completed the programme.

rom EVE. GLOBE

ddress New York City.

ate DEC 3 - 1910

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at both concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next week. Thursday evening, Dec. 8, the programme will consist of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony, Beethoven's G major piano concerto, and Brahms's "Academic Overture." For Saturday afternoon, Dec. 10, Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Liszt's piano concerto in E flat, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture are announced.

m EVE. MAIL

ress New York City.

e .....

The Rachmaninoff symphony will be played once more by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This will be in Brooklyn Friday night, where Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Hofmann will play the Rubinstein concerto and the Leonore overture No. 3 will complete the programme. Carnegie hall is sold out for both Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, when Hofmann will also be the soloist.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Daniel Gregory Mason's fifth Brooklyn Institute lecture recital on "Masters and Masterpieces of Modern Chamber Music," will have Arensky for topic and be illustrated by that composer's Trio, Opus 32, with Leonardo Brill, violin; Paul Kefer, 'cello, and Guiseppe Randegger, piano, as assisting artists. It will take place on Monday evening in the music hall, Academy of Music. On Thursday afternoon, in that hall, Mr. Mason will give the lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic Concert to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening in the opera house of the Academy.

STANDARD UNION,

ess ..... BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DEC 10 1910

church fund.

Josef Hofmann begins a tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, and will play twelve concerts with that organization to be given in various cities.

HERALD

New York City.

DEC 11 1910

MR. HOFMANN PLAYS AGAIN.

Pianist Delights Great Audience in Concert with Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

With Carnegie Hall crowded to the doors and many persons left in the lobby unable to buy seats, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert there yesterday afternoon. Mr. Josef Hofmann, who had been the soloist with the orchestra on Thursday night, played again and won prolonged applause with his superb playing of Liszt's E flat piano concerto.

He gave a virile interpretation of the heroic work and left out none of its sentimental charm. Nothing but the "no encore" rule saved him from being compelled to play other numbers.

The orchestral part of the programme, conducted by Mr. Max Fiedler, was excellent. It included Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Mr. Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" anda Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture No. 3. All were well played.

TIMES

1 .....

ress New York City.

DEC 4 - 1910

***

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season on Friday evening, Dec. 9, Brooklyn will hear that band play Rachmaninoff's second symphony. The second number will be Rubinstein's concerto in D minor No. 4, which will be played by that master's pupil, Josef Hofmann.

The final number on the programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

om SUN

dress New York City.

te DEC 11 1910

Gustave Mahler conducted the Philharmonic orchestra in a performance of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony on Sunday, November 13. Was that a reason why we had to hear it again from the Boston Symphony orchestra on Thursday, December 8? Was there no time for E reflection?

n HERALD

ress New York City.

e .....

Mr. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the first concert he will play Beethoven's G major piano concerto, while the orchestral programme consists of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and Brahms' "Academic" overture. On Saturday afternoon Mr. Hofmann will play Liszt's E flat major concerto, and Mr. Fiedler will conduct Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, and Mr. Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

From EVE. GLOBE

Address New York City.

Date DEC 12 1910

ANOTHER most enjoyable concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The orchestral pieces were Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. Liszt's piano concerto in E flat was on the programme for the soloist, and in it Josef Hofmann gave a brilliant exhibition of his art. An enormous audience applauded the concert heartily.

n EVE. WORLD

ress New York City.

e .....

Josef Hoffmann was the soloist in Liszt's first piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, delighting a crowded house by his masterly playing. Mr. Fiedler led the orchestra through a beautiful interpretation of Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3.

[108]

CECILIA-SYMPHONY JOIN IN BIG CONCERT

By EDITH BURNHAM.

The Cecilia-Symphony, in their first concert of the season, last evening in Symphony Hall, gave Part 1 of Bantock's "Omar Khayyam." The composer has cast the first 54 quatrains of the poem which make up Part 1 for three characters. The Beloved, sung last evening by Miss Margaret Keyes, contralto; The Poet, sung by George Harris, Jr., tenor, and The Philosopher, sung by Robert Maitland, baritone. Bantock has followed the text slavishly, omitting not nor changing so much as an adjective or article. Whether he thought in doing this that he was actually following the content as well as the context probably no one knows but himself. However, it is permitted to the listener who, reading and rereading this poem as most lovers of poetry have done, to feel greatly disappointed with the composer's interpretation. From a purely compositional standpoint it is a wonderful achievement—it keeps a double orchestra working for all that there is in them all the time, and when they have read their notes and gotten them in on time, or nearly so, they have exhausted their faculties. Or at least such it seemed last evening, for there was very little, if any, interpretative work done by the orchestra.

Music Is Disappointing.

The music itself is at times strongly interpretative, although the musical accent invariably falls where the poetical one should not, and produces a feeling of torn emotions for one trying to put himself in sympathy with both. Only in a vague way did the music as interpreted last evening suggest the entente of the poem; its unfinished harmonies and vague, groping phrases inevitably suggest a soul's wilderness, which is one interpretation of the poem; but they "groped" too much and found "nothing," and at any angle the poem is looked at, "something" is found. It has almost the double entendre of a Delphic oracle; read in one way and with the stress placed on one set of words and phrases, the blackest pessimism, exquisitely beautiful, but pessimism is the only reward, while again one may read into it at different places a supreme, eternal faith. Music, in order to express either one of these, or carry a suggestion of both, must do more than "grope." No soul can grope for one hour and 35 minutes, the length of the performance, and not draw nearer some goal. The music, too, has a restless rather than a cumulative activity; nervous, weird phrases rapidly work on one set of instruments until they can stand no more strain, and then they wildly jump on to another set of instruments and there dwell till instrument and player alike give out. The exhaustion of players by merely technical labor produces on an audience a feeling of profound respect, but nothing more.

Reads Poem Hurriedly.

In the so-called casting of his characters the composer has read the poem rather hurriedly, it would seem; for he gives to the poet lines which plainly belong to the philosopher—and we wished last night very much that he had had them, for Mr. Maitland was plainly the only one of the singers who knew very much what he was singing about—and the chorus, which in the main follows the idea of the chorus of the Greek play, which merely accentuates or concurs with the characters, at times entirely overleaps its bounds and assumes rights which the most modern writers of opera score would not allow it to have; it takes the plot entirely out of the hands of the characters.

Robert Maitland, singing The Philosopher, carried the entire burden of interpretation, besides furnishing a good share of the voice. He showed evidences of having been trained in the modern school, which will not permit a singer to sing his words meaninglessly, and he did not allow his tones to suffer for lack of attention either.

His rendering of the lines, "Think then you are Today what Yesterday you were—Tomorrow you shall not be less," had impelling force; he seemed to wake up the latent forces of the entire work and say to the audience with terrific force, "Don't you see, this is all about something, something that is tremendously big and real?" and he made them listen. His rendering of the closing four quatrains, the last two lines of which are, "You gaze today, while you are you—how then tomorrow, when you shall be you no more?" was intensely dramatic. He made one feel that there had been both wisdom and profit in the listening of meaningless singing just to wait for that moment.

Solo Work Colorless.

Miss Keyes sang "The Beloved" with good phrasing and intonation, her voice being of fine modulation and smooth throughout; but barring the work done in the two duos with "The Poet," she expressed very little meaning.

Mr. Harris has a voice which was plainly not equal to his task. The qaulity of the voice is flat, it has not body to cover even the tone of the music of this piece, setting aside the interpretation. He had evidently worked the piece out with studied care, and studied all the meaning out and away from it.

The chorus work, while accurate and tonally good, except at times in the soprano ranks, sang with unwarrantable stiffness, and lack of the interpretative. They might have been singing Whittier's "Snow Bound" or Longfellow's "Evangeline," and the result would have been the same. The composer has given the chorus some extraordinary work to do, and the mere note reading is a task in itself, but the haunting mystery of the East which breathes through these choruses, the occultism, which the orchestra accentuates by the introduction of new instruments are almost an East Indian "tum-tum" in an undercurrent, lost force in transmission.

It is a remarkable composition, and one no doubt that might easily and with profit consume a season's work on the part of orchestra and chorus—presumably with better effects.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A NEW BEGINNING IN CHORAL CONCERTS

The Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra in a Performance of Bantock's "Omar"—The Happy Signs of a Responsive Public—The Need of Better Adjustment of Orchestra and Chorus—Over-Zeal and Its Perils—The Unique Quality of the Music—Mme. Melba to Sing at the Opera House—The Balalaika Orchestra to Be Heard Here—Changes at the Globe

PERHAPS the most hopeful sign of the first concert of the allied Cecilia and Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall last evening was the presence of a considerable and interested audience. The Händel and Haydn Society has its faithful and peculiar public that suffices from season to season for its concerts. Other choral societies here have sung in recent years to diminishing audiences until they had plausible ground for the belief that they and their music had lost their hold upon the concert-going community. From this seeming disposition of the public in part sprang the alliance of the Cecilia, which was suffering most from it, and the Symphony Orchestra. As the event proved, the audience yesterday was larger than any choral concert in Boston, outside those of the Händel and Haydn Society, has assembled in several seasons. It was equally numerous in all parts of the house; and it was representative of many musical interests as well as of the established publics of the Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra. The music to be performed was wholly new to Boston; and "novelties" are assumed to attract less than established pieces. The assisting solo singers, chosen for their fitness to a particular task, were not of those that draw the merely curious into the concert-room. Yet there was the audience, clearly interested in music and performance and ready to applaud both heartily whenever it had opportunity for such appreciation. There then is still a public for choral music in Boston, and duly encouraged and pleased, as it was last night, it bids fair to increase. The reëstablishment of such choral concerts and the full results of the new alliance are not to be attained in a single performance or a single winter. There is only to go forward from promising beginnings.

The full Symphony Orchestra, except a few instruments that Mr. Bantock's "Omar" did not require, and the enlarged choir of the Cecilia, shared in the concert, and the forces concerned seemed the more numerous and imposing from the peculiar disposition of them—as it were in antiphonal groups—that the composer exacts for certain contrasts and alternations that he would gain. The interest of "Omar" is oftener orchestral than it is choral; Mr. Bantock has writen opulently, insistently, even gorgeously for his instruments; Mr. Fiedler is most experienced as an orchestral conductor; and the Symphony Orchestra is capable of a very substantial and sonorous body of tone. The chorus, on the other hand, had to sing very difficult music, to the matter and often to the manner of which it was wholly new a few weeks ago, and which has required long and laborious rehearsal. It was seated in groups and not in a compact body; it had never before sung with so numerous and vigorous an orchestra; it was undergoing its first experience, outside rehearsals, with the conducting of Mr. Fiedler. These are the extenuating circumstances of a performance that, perhaps inevitably, did not maintain the just balance between orchestra and choir, between orchestra and solo singers, or among all three. As the phrase of English politics goes, the orchestra was always the preponderant partner in the triple league, and sometimes much too preponderant. Even the fact that the liveliest interest and the most striking qualities of "Omar" are in the orchestral part of the music does not justify such ill proportioning of all the forces as often clouded the performance last night. Association, experiment and experience have still much to accomplish.

The performance, again, might have been more sympathetic, comprehending and imaginative to many aspects of Mr. Bantock's music. Mr. Fiedler was in the mood for large effects, for bold strokes, for the making of the music a rushing and a swirling stream that should eddy now and then into incisive contrast. There are moments in the music that invite this heroic and excited vein and they "came off" as excitingly last night. On the other hand, much of the music runs in the vein of meditative melancholy, of contemplative image, of lyric and intimate mood, as it must, if it is to follow the course of FitzGerald's quatrains. Of such, often, are the brief interludes with which Mr. Bantock passes from quatrain to quatrain; the orchestral embroidery and suggestion which he employs on occasion in the midst of the quatrains themselves; and the passages assigned to the tenor, who sings as The Poet, and to the soprano who sings as the Beloved. The chorus, too, has its meditative, as well as its graphic and declamatory opportunities. There was little fault to find with the solo singers; they had the quality of voice; the various intelligence; and, above all, the clearness and the significance of phrase that are essential to the music. All three of them—Miss Keyes, Mr. Harris, and especially Mr. Maitland, for the Philosopher—did the composer penetrating and imparting service. The chorus, when it was secure in its music, was as praiseworthy. It sang with quick and large expression; and it did not sacrifice therein its quality of tone. Often the orchestra wrought clearly and suggestively the delineative details with which Mr. Bantock has filled the music. It kept as well its peculiar fluidity and suppleness. Yet, somehow, in what seemed an over anxious and over strenuous performance something of its glamor, something of its charm, something of its languidly pictorial quality, and much of its contemplative and melancholy voice vanished. Page after page of it is exotically oriental, as the reader follows it in the score. Its accent is as rare and strange as that of some oriental sweetmeats. Last night, and far too often; it was only accidentally romantic and emotional.

Two months ago, when Mr. Bantock's setting of these fifty-four quatrains of the Rubaiyat was performed for the first time in America at Worcester, a long descriptive and critical article about it was printed in the Transcript. There is no need to repeat now so recent a description. The performance last night, in spite of its misunderstanding, altered none of the critical impressions that the reviewer had previously received. What he said then he can only say again now: "Mr. Bantock in his [illegible] parts, which traverse the remaining quatrains, as well as in the first—has given us the unexpected. He has taken his chorus, as he has taken his instruments, and his solo voices, for so many means to his end, to be used according to his will and ability. That end was not the incidental musical decoration of the Rubaiyat or the reflection in tones of the moods that meditation upon it might quicken within him. It was the expression, in the new medium of tones, of its substance and its images, of its epicurean and its fatalistic wisdom, of its mystical suggestions and of its Oriental picturings. He would shade all these even as the ancient Persian and the modern FitzGerald had shaded them. He would make his music do these feats and yet flow and be supple. He would keep it an integral whole organically developing out of itself, yet fuse it with almost every word and every unlabored implication of the verses. He challenged, as all courageous artists do, the accomplishment to justify the means and the methods. It does richly. . . .

The relatively sterile moments were few; the inevitable halts in a long pageant of diverse pleasures. Above and beyond them remain the languorous intensity with which the introduction wrought its atmosphere; the lyric loveliness of the Poet's hushed apostrophe to roses and to wine; the sombre and stately march of the thoughts of ancient days and vanished heroes; the leaping cries to the enjoyment of life; the passion of the duet of the Poet and his mistress (A Book of Verses) and the rest of the most familiar quatrains glowing in its own heats, fading in its languors, warm again and finally echoing its own ecstacies—songful, Italianate, if you will, but tempered with a fineness and softened to a haunting melancholy that are not Italian; the felicity of twenty little strokes, the grace of a score of details, the little eddies within eddies in less sustainedly imaginative passages; the delicate expansiveness of many a melody, especially in the Poet's regretful quatrains; the poignancy of such phrases as the "Gently, gently, brother," of the clay to the potter; the gravity that was not stolid, the mystery that was not affected, in the meditative music of the Philosopher; the adroitness and not the obviousness, in the Russian way, of Oriental suggestion; the music of phantom and of reality in the picturing of the caravan; the choral climax that proclaims the joy of life for the living of it; the mirror-like and tireless flow of the supple music. Since it is eminently human it ranges wide. If it can discourse highly of the mysteries of life, it can be finely pagan with the joy of it. From beginning to end stimulating pleasure to the emotions went hand in hand with discriminating satisfaction to the mind."

The Symphony Orchestra will depart on Sunday for the second of its monthly visits to New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, with an additional concert a week from next Monday in New Haven, where the band has not appeared for six years. Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, will go with the orchestra to play at each of the seven concerts. The programmes for the several cities contain fewer than usual of the pieces that Mr. Fiedler has recently undertaken here. Four indeed—Dvorák's symphony, "From the New World;" Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture; Beethoven's fifth symphony and Brahms's "Academic" overture—have not been played in Boston this season though, of course, they are repertory pieces. From his recent programmes here, Mr. Fiedler has taken Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Rachmaninoff's second and Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Mr. Hofmann will play three concertos—Rubinstein's in D minor; Liszt's in E flat, and Beethoven's in G major.

MELBA SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Diva Receives Warm Welcome From Large Audience.

Mme. Nellie Melba won an ovation at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. It was the first time the Australian contatrice has sung with the Symphony Orchestra in nearly four long years, and as it may be as long again before she returns, if she ever does return, the interest in her appearance was the greatest shown at any Symphony concert so far this season.

There was warm applause to welcome her when she first came forth, looking as queenly as ever, and becomingly attired in black, with pearls and diamonds and with a sumptuous hat that would have taken Gainsborough's eye. There was much warmer applause after the melodious Mozart's "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," which she sang with much the same silver tone and marvelous grace of phrase that have made her famous the world over; and after the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet" came the big and prolonged outburst the like of which is seldom witnessed at Symphony concerts. It looked for a time as if the rule against encores might for the first time be broken by a woman, but after a while the still incomparable diva made her bow in her furs and the audience calmed down. It was after 4 then, with "Der Freischuetz" overture yet to come, and 4 o'clock is about the limit for a Symphony matinee.

Melba's voice, of course, has lost some of its wonderful mellowness, but it is still a rare voice, almost celestially sweet when not forced, and it is used with an art that has long been one of the most brilliant ornaments of the lyric stage.

There was an orchestral novelty on the program, an English rhapsody by Frederick Delius, called "Brigg Fair," and based on the old folk song from which it takes its name—a thing of plaintive melodies and rich massed colorings, which interested rather than stirred the audience.

Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony opened the program most satisfactorily, for the Russian is popular here and his music is always well played by the Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Symphony orchestra leaves tonight on its second trip to give concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. On Monday evening Dec. 12, it will give a concert in New Haven in Woolsey Hall. This will be the first concert it has given in that city since the winter of 1904-05. The out-of-town concerts of the orchestra this year are breaking all records in the matter of attendance. For the two concerts in New York there is a total of about 300 seats to be sold outside of the subscription, which is the state of affairs in almost as large a degree in the other cities. It is a question whether any orchestra has taken in, in seven concerts, so much money as the Symphony did on its first southern trip and the record then made is likely to be equalled this coming week. The orchestra will get back to Boston on Tuesday morning, Dec. 13.

The program of the concerts in Boston, Dec. 16-17, will be as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 7; Rubinstein, concerto in D minor, No. 4, for piano (Joseph Hoffmann, pianist); Debussy, Rondes de Printempts (repeated by request); Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Thursday evening, Dec. 15, in Sanders Theatre, the third concert in the Cambridge series by the Symphony Orchestra, with Josef Hofmann for the assisting pianist. He will play Liszt's concerto in E-flat major, and the rest of the programme comprises Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman" and Brahms's symphony in F major.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 16, in Symphony Hall, ninth of the afternoon series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Hofmann for the assisting pianist. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, and the rest of the programme will traverse Beethoven's seventh symphony, a repetition of Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" and Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman."

Saturday evening, Dec. 17, in Symphony Hall, ninth of the evening series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Hofmann and the programme just noted.

Boston Transcript Dec 26, 1910

DELIUS AND DEBUSSY

AN INTIMATE GLIMPSE OF THE TWO COMPOSERS

Delius as He Lives in the Suburbs of Paris—A Morning of Talk with Him—Debussy and His Japanese Prints—His Memories of His Youth—His Opinions of Strauss and Wagner

BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

WHILE the initial responsibility may to some extent be attributed to the suggestive pamphlet on Delius by Max Chop, it is in reality chiefly on account of the intrinsic poetry and force of his "Paris" which Mr. Fiedler gave us last winter, that I was emboldened to write the composer himself to ask if I could pay him a visit. His reply far from being nonchalant or prohibitory, was so courteous as to include an invitation to luncheon, which I was not slow in accepting. Mr. Delius lives in the small village of Grez-sur-Loing, about eight miles beyond Fontainebleau, and to reach him involved taking an early train from the Gare de Lyon almost at the other end of Paris. The view from the compartment window was like the slow reading of a proclamation whose ultimate sense was veiled by deliberate unwindings of its scroll—first uncompromisingly and sordidly suburban, then less dubiously attractive, at last disclosing broad and suave meadows thickly sown with dull-yellow grain, alternating with neatly partitioned vegetable gardens, finally achieving a gently undulating country with gracious alternation of wood and fields dotted with terra-cotta roofed houses. I was beginning to realize the just causes of the glamor exercised on painters by Fontainebleau, Barbizon and Montigny-Marlotte (where our own George de Forest Brush once lived), when the train halted abruptly at Bourron, which is the station for Grez. A sleepy omnibus conveyed me leisurely to a typical French village of whitewashed stone houses huddled together, through narrow streets with large expanses of wall space with a minimum of windows and doors (which are taxed in France); here and there were glimpses of court-yards, bright with flowers, while a gray church tower kept picturesque guard over all. At length, I was set down before a large house with pale green doors, which in spite of its scrupulous tidiness was quite unprophetic of the interior charms to come. To my feeble pull at the bell-wire, the door opened, and I found myself being cordially welcomed in a spacious living-room by Frederick Delius. He is tall, lithe, smooth-shaven, with alert, mobile features, and an incisive directness of speech. At once he discloses a trait of independent self-sufficience, the supreme quality of real individuality to be discerned alike in the works as in the man himself. Shortly, he led the way to his work-room, which is hung with harmonious and delicately colored pictures by his wife. Protesting that my visit was in part due to a chance remark of Granville Bantock, we fell naturally to talking of Bantock's irrepressible Orientalism, his settings ranging over many Eastern poets, his varied and beautiful collection of Japanese prints, his hobby for fossil relics of primitive animals, and finally of his prepared wafers of Japanese seaweed, an exotic edible first conscientiously eaten, but now kept in reserve (so malice declares) for the unwary visitor. If the sources of Delius's and Bantock's inspiration are as far apart as their musical idioms are diverse, it is evident that the thirst for artistic liberty has been the moving spirit in each, and has continued to constitute a bond of unalterable sympathy. Indeed, it is not too much to say that these two have done more than any of their countrymen to emancipate English music from the slavery of empty convention.

Turning next to the indestructible loyalty of English audiences, when their appreciation is once won, Delius characterized their love of "The Messiah" and "Elijah" in terms of exquisite irony as the real origin of the British composer. Drifting over the topics of modern musical achievement, country by country, it was soon evident that Delius derives little encouragement from the manifestations of current activity. For instance, the "whole-toned" scale, the basis upon which Debussy, Dukas and Ravel work almost exclusively, is for him a species or artistic impasse, something which in its nature leads essentially to limitation, if not to direct curtailing of musical expression. He is not insensible to the charm and even the significance of music written in this idiom, but its lack of personal appeal was only an unconscious assertion of his own imperviousness to superficial influence. The vain contrapuntal fertility of Max Reger is alike distasteful to him, and in the later Strauss, he discovers evidence that he is the victim of his own superabundant virtuosity. Nevertheless, he is far from the orthodox English standpoint which, hard pressed in discussion, reluctantly admits a grudging approval of "Death and Transfiguration," and diffidently admits the claims of "Till Eulenspiegel" for admission into the same class. On the whole, it must be confessed that Delius's opinions on modern music tend towards the iconoclastic, but the destruction is so deftly and humorously accomplished that the more impartial standards of the critic must defer to their wit if not to their invariable justice. But, nevertheless, the composer who is to maintain an individual path in the confusion of ultra-modern musical striving, cannot be receptive to each potent voice around him, he must remain as deaf as Ulysses to the calls of the sirens. That so much of modern music is without a sympathetic appeal to Delius, constitutes a natural corollary to the proof of his own artistic independence. Proceeding according to the inner promptings of his individuality, he has remained steadily true to his own nature. Among modern [illegible] possesses another trait in common with Bantock in his admiration of Ernest Dowson, the gifted Englishman whose premature death was a definite loss to British poetry. While Bantock has given us his imaginative and picturesque Prelude to "The Pierrot of the Minute," Delius has set several poems for solos, chorus and orchestra under the title "Songs of Sadness," and he is at present engaged upon a work employing another of Dowson's poems for the text.

Leaving the music-room, we turned to the garden, getting glimpses of other delightful pictures by Mrs. Delius—a garden which should solace the orchestral colorist no less than the impressionist painter. Its brilliant flowers, apparently sown without premeditation, give a harmonious totality of which the French seem to possess the instinctive secret. There are unprecise paths leading desultorily to the dull-green, slow-flowing, Loing, on whose reedy banks may be found families out for a holiday of fishing or the landscape painter. There are fleeting glimpses of the staid church, and of a slowly disintegrating ruin. All in all, house, garden and surrounding country seem singularly fitted to be the abode of the tranquil pursuit of two kindred arts, far from the world, undisturbed to seek their aspirations in peaceful abstraction, with the beauty of garden and river scene for external incitement. From time to time, as when Covent Garden mounts "Romeo and Juliet in the Village," or when Oskar Fried, Dr. Haym and other German conductors give "Brigg Fair" or some other orchestral work as recently at Zurich, Mr. Delius ventures temporarily to musical centres, but for composition he returns to Grez as an impersonal though intensely picturesque background.

We had tea, cassis-syrup, and for a rarity graham bread at one end of the garden, and then it was time for me to go. My courteous hosts escorted me to the station, and soon the train bore me to Paris—to the world of dissension, jealousy and artistic enmity, from which I had had so grateful a day's respite. To my mind, the picture is complete; the monastic exterior of the house, its hospitable and ample living-room, the personal charm and graciousness of my hostess, her sympathy in her husband's work, and its concrete manifestation in her poetic and harmonious pictures, the ardent, earnest talk, expressive of decided personality in an ideal environment, the unusual example of a mind which does not need to appropriate and patch its idiom of expression from others. If I had not known "Paris," "Sea Drift," "Appalachia" and the "Mass of Life" I should have guessed that I had been privileged to see for a few hours, one who is among the most personal and independent of living composers.

I owe the opportunity for an interview with Debussy to the kind consideration of the eminent critic, Louis Laloy, a zealous apostle of the young master, whose admirable study on the man and his music should be accessible in an English version. I had heard that Debussy was inclined to be "difficult" to foreign visitors, but nothing could exceed his graciousness when I presented myself. I had, it appeared, interrupted gardening of some importance with his young daughter, to whom the "Children's Corner" is so apologetically dedicated. Two charming Japanese elephants in blue porcelain before the outer door prepare one for the subtle insistence on the exotic to be found in Debussy's workroom. Over one door hangs the Japanese print, of which Granville Bantock possesses a replica, which serves for the cover design of "La Mer." Other Japanese engravings hang over the upright piano, on which was a few lines of manuscript sketch too minute to be decipherable at a discreet distance, while towards the opposite corner Nicholson's portraits of Kipling and Bismarck indicate a receptivity to personality exclusive of country. Debussy afterwards explained that a foreign art was far more restful to the eye through the very absence of European tradition; its very angularity was stimulating in its repose, while even a masterpiece like da Vinci's Mona Lisa would finally obtrude its personality too insistently.

Debussy's photographs hardly do him justice; they accentuate a moodiness, with even a touch of sardonic brutality, which seems absent in the man himself. One is first of all impressed by his simplicity and directness; his utter absence of pose. One feels the presence of a genuine poet, who on one side is concretely human, on the other sensitive to all the nuances of shadowy and vague dream. His ideas are those of a master whose ordered and coherent thoughts find utterance in a language as individual and characteristic as his musical speech. Telling gesture freely emphasises his verbal expression, and often he seeks momentarily the precise word, as he is content to retain a work until its details satisfy the demands of his fastidious sensibility. Bent upon clearing up some obscurity in critical analyses of his early career, I asked him to define the more important influences of his student days. Of the teaching of Guiraud and other conservatory professors the most vivid memory seems still to be its useless didactic tyranny, the lack of a rational system of technical training. The teaching of harmony in particular was remarkable for its rigid empiricism, and the absence of attempt to inculcate underlying principle. Debussy still chafes at the absurd fetich known as "the harmony of the author" in which the chance conception of the teacher is given exaggerated preference over any individual perception of the pupil. He admits passing enthusiasms for Schumann and other kindred romanticists, but on retrospect he recalls only the sense of needless repression, and the definite consciousness, even then, of a tangible individuality which was systematically denied expansion. In contrast to the narrow type of pedagogy prevalent at the Conservatory in his apprentice days, he reverted to the epoch of Palestrina, Josquin des Près and others of the old contrapuntists, who gave their disciples abundant discipline, but of a far more practical and serviceable type. From their teaching something was to be learned, but the exacting procedure of the Conservatory was contrary to artistic development. From his years spent in St. Petersburg the sole outcome was the influence of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunof," but not in the revised edition of Rimsky Korsakoff, which was little short of vandalism. For where Moussorgsky wrote a harmony which might have been crude and angular, but vital, the experienced teacher substituted another which was smoother and more conventional, but which hopelessly spoiled the basic conception. Still the only definite influence exercised by Moussorgsky on Debussy was that of showing the path towards a greater freedom in harmonic idiom.

When I hesitatingly inquired whether he had not at one time felt the influence of Wagner, he was eager to assert that it had been but passing, and that of all the operas Parsifal exercised the most tangible sway on account of its deeply spiritual and human atmosphere. Episodically he diverged to criticise the wholesale adoption of the leading motive procedure in composition by later composers, who seemed to ignore the vast development and shades of discrimination used in the application of motives by Wagner himself. Where in the Tetralogy motives predominatingly stood for things or to depict personality, in Parsifal they were far more generally associated with ideas. This distinction, he found, had not been assimilated by modern champions of the leading motive.

To my inquiries as to his attitude towards Richard Strauss he was less disposed to be communicative. In the first place, he showed a scrupulous hesitancy in crossing the inevitable barrier which separates the French race from the German—whose methods of thought, artistic procedures, critical criteria and political convictions are unalterably opposed. The French sense of proportion, the extraordinary economy in making the most out of material, the instinct for clarity and simplicity (all typical and essential traits of the French artist), would naturally revolt at the Brobdingnagian contempt for simplicity, for severe logic, or for filing away of superfluous detail, the superabundance of idea, of exterior ornament, the chaotic conceptions of the leading modern German composers. With a picturesque sense of imagery he compared the later Strauss to a huge over-ornate railway station, in which crowds surged to and fro, hustled against one another as if in veritable battle, rushing hither and thither, but which nevertheless possessed an interest of a sublime sort of curiosity. The hearing of "Elektra" Debussy found an experience that was crushing, fatiguing and finally led to overpowering hunger. But there was one point which seemed to depart from his conceptions of artistic probity, and justly so. Strauss, in his desire to increase the profits of "Elektra" was authoritatively reported to have made a version for a smaller orchestra of seventy—in place of the original of one hundred and twenty. This was the characteristic sticking point to the French mind: either the first conception was the only one, or logically it was superfluous. Indeed, Debussy's fidelity to his creative principles was such that the existence of two versions of one work was inadmissible. Here I discovered that I had stayed imprudently close to the lunch hour, and regretfully terminated a talk full of suggestive and illuminating disclosure.

From the all too brief three-quarters of an hour interview, I carried away these prevailing impressions that Debussy is preeminently a thoughtful and sincere artist, working with conscientious scruples along a path hewn through years of doubt and misunderstanding towards a greater artistic freedom guided by characteristically French traits of order, simplicity and obedience to the inner instinct for beauty, possessing an innate respect for the classics of his own country, deploring that Couperin and Rameau are not oftener heard in Parisian concerts. In short, Debussy remains faithful according to his individual conceptions to that supreme quality so eternally the guiding light of genius, the brief answer given to Mélisande by Pelléas when she asks what they shall say to the king when her ring is lost in the fountain, "La vérité, la vérité."

MOZART'S Adagio and Fugue, with which the Symphony Concert began yesterday afternoon, is not in the least an important piece, and none too often is it interesting; since Mozart could be as routine as less talented composers. Perhaps, then, Mr. Fiedler put it wisely first on the programme; because the audience had seemingly but one preoccupation. Would the hats be generally removed? Would the obstinate be brought to submission? Would the very untractable, if there were any such, be thrust summarily from the hall? Nearly every hat, except those that were so small as to be unobjectionable or those that, being in a back row, obstructed no one, was promptly lifted from resigned heads, and the hall had an unwontedly open and agreeable aspect. The few that were obstinate yielded gradually to the persuasions of the ushers, though the process brought some awkward pauses, when Mr. Fiedler was awaiting its results. The one that was obstinate—the expert said that only a maid could possibly remove the hat—withdrew peacefully at the end of the concerto. The employee of the hall, whose cap is decked with that formidable word, "Police," had naught to do but wear it, and the only exercise for the two ordinary policemen, detailed by the watchful guardians of the public welfare, was to watch and wonder the energy that Mr. Fiedler and his men spent upon Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." Their faces were eloquent of their surprise at such labor to such ends. Paris had its "day of dupes." Boston has had its days of hats. The episode is seemingly closed. Tonight there will be a concert at which Debussy's new "Rondes de Printemps" will be performed before an audience that can give the music unperturbed attention.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

WITH Mme. Melba's name on the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with the singer making her only appearances in Boston this season and probably for a season to come, and with the united testimony of New York and Chicago that her voice is still in its golden prime, interest in her will transcend all other at Symphony Hall, a week hence. Yet Mr. Fiedler chose two of his orchestral pieces interestingly. One is "Brigg Fair," an "English rhapsody," as the title runs, upon a folk-tune that Delius clothes in his sensuous instrumentation, leads from variation to variation in his concentrated fashion and tinges with his vein of melancholy. The music is of a lighter Delius than was the tone-poem, "Paris," that made him first known here; but it keeps a like curious individuality and accent. The other notable orchestral piece is Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony that better than the "Pathetic" endures the years and that invites Mr. Fiedler's romantic largeness and fire. The "brillian. overture" to end the programme is Weber's to his opera, "Der Freischutz," and Mme. Melba's two numbers are the Countess's air from the last act of Mozart's "Figaro" and Ophelia's "Mad Scene," the surviving relic of Thomas's opera of "Hamlet."

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Cecilia-Symphony Concert

THE new association of the Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra will come to its first test in their joint concert on Thursday evening, at eight, in Symphony Hall. The orchestra has long needed a choir of high quality which it could summon in the performance of symphonic music that added voices to the instruments. The Cecilian turn has similarly needed the coöperation of an orchestra of the first rank, a conductor of high and established position, and freedom from the difficulties and embarassments of precarious independent existence. The alliance of the choral society and the orchestra bids fair thus to serve both. Already it has resulted in the increase of the Cecilia to 175 voices, in the aid of Mr. Fiedler at its rehearsals, and in the undertaking of a new piece that deserves all that the conductor, the band and the choir may bring to it. The piece is Bantock's setting of the first fifty-two quatrains of FitzGerald's version of the Rubaiyat. Originally performed in England, it was applauded as music that utilized chorus, orchestra and solo voices in imaginative, masterful, pliant and resourceful fashion to expressive ends; that clothed the verse with oriental atmosphere and equally enhanced and imparted its contemplative or passionate voice. It was as well received and similarly praised at its first performance in Worcester last September. Outside the oratorios of Elgar it is the most individual and remarkable choral piece that any of the new generation of English composers has written and the first performance of it here is an event in its kind comparable with a "première" at the Symphony Concerts. The music asks three solo voices, a soprano for the Beloved, as Bantock incarnates the speakers of the quatrains; a tenor for the Poet; and a baritone for the Philosopher. The chosen three are Margaret Keyes, George Harris Jr., and Robert Maitland.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 16, in Symphony Hall, ninth of the afternoon series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, with Josef Hofmann for the assisting pianist.

Saturday evening, Dec. 17, in Symphony Hall, ninth of the evening series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Hofmann, as just noted.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
COURIER
DEC 12 1910

SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Boston Musicians, With Josef Hofmann, Play at Woolsey Hall.

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Josef Hofman in Woolsey hall tonight, will begin promptly at 8:15, and will last about an hour and fifty minutes. The program in full is as follows:

Weber—Overture, "Obern."
Beethoven—Symphony in C minor, No. 5.
Rubenstein—Concerto for piano in D minor.
Strauss—Tone poem, "Don Juan."
Sibelius—"Finlandia."

Soloist—Josef Hoffman.

Again it should be impressed upon the public that the "rush" seats will be sold at Woolsey hall at 7:30 tonight, and the number of persons admitted will be limited to the number of seats in the gallery. Moreover, but one seat will be sold to each purchaser.

Symphony and Cecilia Produce Omar Khayyam

(From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser).

Last night an important wedding took place. The Boston Symphony orchestra married the Cecilia society. The union marks an epoch in Boston music, for great performances will probably result from the union. In spite of all its excellent work in the past, under well-equipped conductors, such as Mr. Lang and Mr. Goodrich, the Cecilia has been languishing in recent seasons. Its concerts had many empty seats even when most interesting works were given. Now all this will be changed. The orchestra needed a good chorus as an auxiliary, and the Cecilia required the prestige of the orchestra. Therefore we regard this as a love-match and believe that the contracting parties will live happily ever after. The audience last night was of good augury, larger and more alert than has recently been the case with Cecilia concerts.

Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" received its first Boston performance at this concert. Music in England is advancing rapidly. Not so long ago Bridge, Mackenzie and the hard-boiled-egg brigade of contrapuntists led everything, and Sullivan and possibly Cowen were the only drops of dew in the British musical desert. When Elgar came he seemed so advanced, by comparison, that he was hailed as the greatest phenomenon that had appeared in England since Purcell. But Elgar is not quite fulfilling his promise, while rivals and superiors are springing up all over the field which was once so barren. Delius, Coleridge-Taylor, German and, above all, Bantock, have pushed English music far from the ruts in which it lay twenty-five years ago, and two of these have possibly passed even Sir Edward Elgar.

"Omar Khayyam," of which the first part only was given last night, is, in the first place an excellent poem for musical treatment. Our art lends itself well to such a gospel of epicureanism. But there is much more than epicureanism in "Omar Khayyam." There is a keen protest of the mind, that does not accept the creeds, against the meaningless character of life, its whence and whither.

The orchestral score is a large one. It calls for three flutes, a piccolo, three oboes, an English horn, three clarinettes, a bass clarinette, three bassoons, a contrabassoon, six horns, three trumpets, three trombones, a bass tuba, kettle-drums, bassdrum, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, gong, glockenspiel, harps and organ. There were last night 100 in the orchestra and 150 in the chorus. There were three soloists. Miss Margaret Keyes was the Beloved, Mr. Geo. Harris jr. the Poet, and Mr. Robert Maitland, the Philosopher.

Many special orchestral effects are given to the string orchestras, for there are two of these in the score. This unusual division makes it possible to give many antiphonal effects, to combine muted and unmuted strings, to lessen or strengthen the dynamic force very easily, and the remarkable string effects were among the striking points of the performance last night. Mr. Fiedler, our symphony director, is now director of the Cecilia, and his work last night was commendable in his new field.

All in all then last night was an epoch night in Boston's musical annals, for it inaugurated a practically new society which ought to have a great influence upon our future musical seasons, and it presented a work which, although unequal, is the most dramatic composition that has yet come from England.

GLOBE—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1910.

MME MELBA AT THE SYMPHONY

Diva Wins Long Series of Recalls.

Heard in Aria From Mozart and in Ophelia's "Mad Scene."

"Brigg Fair" Performed Here First Time.

Mme Melba was the soloist at the eighth Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon. She sang a recitative and aria of the countess, from act 3, scene 3, of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Ophelia's Mad Scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

The orchestra played Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony (E minor), Delius' "Brigg Fair, an English Rhapsody," first time in Boston, and to close, the "Der Freischutz" overture.

There was an unusually large audience, doubtless due to the appearance of Mme Melba. Her aria from Mozart revealed the same virginal purity of tone and the same level lines of phrasing which have characterized her singing. It was the utterance of a voice beautiful by nature, preserved to marvelous freshness, but untroubled by any exacting plan of nuance.

In the Ophelia aria, however, her hearers were not disappointed. Save for an inflection and a bit of color here and there, Mme Melba did not attempt to inspire pathos for the delirious speech of a whirling brain. She sang the florid passages brilliantly, and this was enough to cause delight and a long series of recalls. Her treatment of staccato notes was peculiar, but there was a limpidity, a smoothness, a precision and ease of emission even with rapid passages, and withal an enforced tone, at times luscious in its beauty. Boston has not heard recently such a trill. Where is there one to stand beside her?

Those who expect to be reminded by the folk song, accompanying Delius' new piece, of the clumsy capers of rustic bumpkins in their clowning, their rude merrymaking, will face disappointment. There is no hesitancy in saying that "Brigg Fair" does not have the picturesque, bizarre effects, the unescapable tang of impressionism which were not to be evaded in his night piece, "Paris," heard here last year.

This man has spurned the usual and the routine. He has burrowed for his own idiom, and he speaks not as other men, but he knows his orchestra.

There is a plan in the varying pattern through which he has woven the old tune, the folk song. It does not bubble over or chortle with bucolic exuberance, but it breathes a plaint, as though in regret for the passing of the old county fair, the type known in Coventry since the Restoration and before.

